same class of merchandise.¹ In these cases it is held that the property right of a trade-mark owner extends to the whole class of merchandise, and he has a right to reserve the whole class to himself for the application of his mark; that the public are likely to be misled into the belief that the trade-mark, upon which they are accustomed to rely as a guaranty of origin and quality on one article of a class, will mean the same thing and indicate the same origin and quality when applied to all other goods of the same class. This is true, but inasmuch as the plaintiff does not make the same goods as the defendant, he is losing no sales by the acts of the defendant. The only injury to the plaintiff consists in a possible injury to his reputation by the sale of inferior goods by the defendant bearing his trade-mark, and a confusion of the public mind with reference to the identity and meaning of the plaintiff's mark. The cases are very few in which the courts have gone so far as to say the offense of infringement consists of injury to the plaintiff's property right, and to hold that a plaintiff is entitled to an injunction when it can be shown that this property right has been injured, independent of the question of deception of the public. Logically, any injury of the property right should give rise to a cause of action, and we have no doubt that in time this conclusion will be recognized. Such a case would arise where a defendant uses the technical trade-mark of the plaintiff upon goods of the same class of merchandise, but so surrounded and associated with other things, as to make deception of the public practically impossible, and yet where the use of the plaintiff's property is not only unauthorized, but injurious to him, by undermining the integrity of his trade-mark rights, confusing the mind of the public with reference to the identity and meaning of the trade-mark, and exposing him to the danger of having his reputation injured by inferior goods being sold under his trade-mark. The trade-mark is a dealer's commercial signature, and ought to be given the same protection which would be given to his signature; for, while the signature may be said to carry with it greater power of identification than the trade-mark, still this is only a matter of degree, and who is to determine this question of degree? Is a court to say in any particular case that the use of a man's name will be enjoined, and the use of his trade-is only when this false representation is directly or indirectly made, and only to the extent to which it is made, that the party who appeals to the justice of the court can have a title to relief. . . . And the imitation is such that the success of the design (to impose goods of defendant upon the public for those of plaintiff), is a probable or even possible consequence."

In Partridge v. Menck, 2 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 622; 2 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 101;

47 Am. Dec. 281; 1 How. App. Cas. (N. Y.) 558, the vice-chancellor said: "It does not suffice to show that persons incapable of reading the labels might be deceived by the resemblance. It must appear that the ordinary mass of purchasers, paying that attention which such persons generally do in buying the article in question, would probably be deceived."

1. See supra, this title, Class of Merchandise.

mark, under exactly similar circumstances and surroundings, will not be enjoined? The two ought to be interchangeable, and we submit that, in the case of a technical trade-mark, if the plaintiff's title is perfect, it should then only be necessary to show that his trade-mark has been taken without his consent and used by the defendant, to entitle him to an injunction, no matter how or in what association it may have been used by the defendant.¹

XI. EFFECT OF PLAINTIFF'S MISREPRESENTATIONS TO THE PUBLIC—

1. In General.—It is a general rule of equity jurisprudence that he who seeks equity must do equity; he must come into equity with clean hands. This maxim has been applied in trade-mark cases with great vigor, and there are many cases, where although the imitation of the plaintiff's labels and trade-marks has been of a most flagrant nature, yet the protection of equity has been denied him, in consequence of some false statement contained upon his label or on some publication issued in connection with the sale of his goods. False statements as to ingredients, maker, cures, harmlessness, purity, place of manufacture, and even words not intended to mislead, but which were capable of being misunderstood, have been held to be sufficient to disentitle a plaintiff to relief.² Unlawful acts on the part of the plaintiff, such as the

1. "Any person who shall . . . imitate any trade-mark registered under this act, shall be liable to an action for damages for the wrongful use of said trade-mark." U. S. Rev. Stat. 21; Stat. at Large, ch. 138, p. 502; Act March 3d, 1881.

In Delaware, etc., Canal Co. v. Clark, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 311, the court said: "The first appropriator of a name or device pointing to its ownership, or which, by being associated with articles of trade, has acquired an understood reference to the originator or manufacturer of the article, is injured when another adopts the same mark or device for similar articles, because such adoption is in effect representing falsely that the productions of the latter are those of the former."

In Osgood v. Rockwood, 11 Blatchf. (U. S.) 314, Blatchford, J., said: "It is apparent that the protection given by the statute is the exclusive use of the trade-mark only so far as regards that particular description of goods set forth in the filed statement as the particular description of goods to or by which the trade-mark has been or is intended to be appropriated; that the inhibition of the statute is only against the use of substantially the same trade-mark or substantially the same particular description of goods, and that the wrongful use which may be enjoined is only the affixing by another, of substantially the same trade-mark to goods of substantially the same descriptive properties as those set forth in the filed statement as the particular description of the goods for which the trade-mark has been or is intended to be appropriated." See also Kinney v. Allen, 1 Hughes (U. S.) 106.

In Singer Mfg. Co. v. Wilson, 2 Ch. Div. 434, Mellish, J., said: "Consequently when you get to a case of the first class (technical trade-mark), you have nothing more to do than to show that the trade-mark has been taken."

2. In Koehler v. Sanders, 48 Hun (N. Y.) 48, Van Brunt, P. J., said: "Although we might well base our decision in this case upon the evident fact that the plaintiffs have adopted the name of the 'International Banking Company' for the purpose of deceiving the public into the belief that such 'International Banking Company' is a corporation, organized under the laws of this state for banking purposes, and that persons dealing with it have that security which the law exacts from such corporations, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs do not come into court with clean hands, and the court ought not to lend its aid to a perpetration of such imposition, it may be proper to consider the question imitation by him of the trade-mark of another will, as a rule, disentitle him to relief and protection as against a rival.¹

involved upon its merits." This case was affirmed in 122 N. Y. 65. See also Buckland v. Rice, 49 Ohio St. 526; 131 P. & S., Am. Trade-Mark Cases.

In Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218, Field, J., said: "A court of equity will extend no aid to sustain a claim to a trade-mark of an article which is put forth with a misrepresentation to the public as to the manufacturer of the article, and as to the place where it is manufactured, both of which particulars were original circumstances to guide the purchaser of the medicine." See also Robertson v. Berry, 50 Md. 591.

In Blackwell v. Dibrell, 3 Hughes (U. S.) 151, Rives, J., said: "This is upon the ancient and familiar principles that those who do iniquity must not ask nor expect equity. It is worthy of all acceptance; it is a hoary maxim, hallowed by its age, and unlike some other sacred antiquities, as yet unsaluted by the spirit of change or reckless progress; I adhere to it."

In McNair v. Cleave, 10 Phila. (Pa.) 155, there was a suit by plaintiffs, co-partners, trading as the "Galaxy Publishing Co.," to restrain defendants from the use of the trade name "The Galaxy Publishing Co. Limited." An injunction was refused. Paxson, J., said: "The plaintiffs are not in a position to invoke the aid of a court of equity. The name which they have adopted, with their manner of using it, is a fraud upon the public. The words 'Galaxy Publishing Company' imply that they are incorporated. As if purposely to strengthen this impression, the plaintiffs add to the name just cited the words 'William McNair, president, and Charles Robson, secretary and treasurer.' . . . It may be that no actual fraud was intended, and that the adoption of the name and designation of officers was regarded by the plaintiffs as a mere device which would harm no one and might benefit them. I give them the benefit of this doubt. It does not, however, help their case. A court of equity will assist no one in carrying on such a scheme as this. The familiar rule that he who seeks equity must do so with clean hands, is decisive of this motion."

In Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co., 11 H. L. Cas. 523,

Lord Kingsdown said; "Nobody doubts that a trader may be guilty of such misrepresentations with respect to his goods, as to amount to a fraud upon the public, and to disentitle him on that ground, as against a rival trader, to the relief in a court of equity which he might otherwise claim. What would constitute a misrepresentation of this description, may in particular cases be a reasonable subject of doubt, and it was in the present case the ground of the difference between the two judgments under consideration. The general rule seems to be that the misstatement of any material fact calculated to deceive the public, will be sufficient for the purpose."

In Dale v. Smithson, 12 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 237, Hilton, J., said: "It is undoubtedly true that a court of equity will not interfere preliminarily by injunction, and protect a person in an exclusive right to a trade-mark or label manifestly devised and intended to cheat the public in the purchase of the article to which it may be attached, by representing the thing to be a different substance or compound from that of which it really consists, or by stating untruthfully its origin, properties, or qualities."

In Fetridge v. Wells, 13 How. Pr. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 385, Duer, J., said: "Those who come into a court of equity seeking equity, must come with pure hands and a pure conscience. If they claim relief against the fraud of others, they must be free themselves from the imputation. If the sales made by the plaintiff and his firm are effected, or sought to be, by misrepresentation and falsehood, they cannot be listened to when they complain that by the fraudulent rivalry of others their own fraudulent profits are diminished. An exclusive privilege for deceiving the public is assuredly not one that a court of equity can be required to aid or sanction. To do so would be to forfeit its name and character."

1. In Parlett v. Guggenheimer, 67 Ind. 542, Stone, J., said: "One defense set up by the defendants is, in fact, a quasi admission that they were simulating the trade-mark of the plaintiffs, but that the plaintiffs were simulating the trade-mark of Palmer, and therefore could not complain of them."

2. Misrepresentation as to Ingredients.—Any misrepresentation as to the ingredients of an article, such as a statement that it is pure and free from adulteration when this is not strictly true, has been held sufficient to debar a plaintiff from relief. So the use of a name which would suggest that the compound to which it is applied is composed of, or contains, a particular thing or ingredient, which it does not contain, is held sufficient to disentitle a plaintiff to relief. Thus, the use of the word "Habana" on cigar labels, when the cigars on which the labels appeared were only Havana filler, has been held to be such a deceit on the public as to disentitle a plaintiff to relief against infringement.¹

It is a plea of confession and avoidance, but it still would be a good plea if sustained by the proof; for if the evidence does show that the plaintiffs were committing, by the use of their trade-mark, a fraud on Palmer, they are in no condition to complain of the defendants' fraud on them."

In Schumacher v. Schwenke, 36 Pat. Off. Gaz. 457; 176 P. & S., Bookstaver, J., said: "When the owner of a trade-mark applies for an injunction to restrain the defendant from injuring his property by making false representations to the public, it is essential that the plaintiff should not, in his trade-mark, or in the business connected with it, be himself guilty of any false or misleading representation; for if the plaintiff makes any material false statement in connection with the property he seeks to protect, he loses, and very justly, his right to claim the assistance of a court of equity. The rule is well settled that the party claiming protection against the fraudulent conduct of another, must himself be free from the imputation of fraud. There is a third reason why this motion should not be granted. A comparison of plaintiff's label with that used on the brand of cigars known as the 'Henry Clay' cigar, will make it plain that the plaintiffs' label is as close an imitation of the 'Henry Clay' label as the defendants' is of the plaintiffs'."

In Smith, etc., v. Woodruff, 48 Barb. (N. Y.) 438, Leonard, P. J., said: "The only plausible defense arises from the allegation of the defendant, that the plaintiffs are as wicked as he is, in that they attempt to impose upon and defraud the public, while he attempts only to defraud the plaintiffs. The justice and morality of this defense is not very high, in the present instance; but this rule of law or equity has been recognized in several cases, and must be followed if the case is brought within its application. It is a defense that ought to be suggested by the court in some cases, and probably would be in all cases where the imposition is flagrant. For instance, where a quack compounds various and dangerous drugs, hurtful to the human constitution, and advertises them as a safe and sure remedy for disease; or when some charlatan avails himself of the prejudice, superstition, or ignorance of some portion of the public, to palm off a worthless article, even when not injurious, the case falls beneath the dignity of a court of justice to lend its aid for the redress of such a party, who has been interfered with by the imitations of another quack or charlatan. But the suggestion comes with a poor grace from one who has, by the imitation, been guilty of the same fraud or imposition upon the public, if such it happens to be."

1. Clotworthy v. Schepp, 42 Fed. Rep. 62. In Kruass v. Jas. R. Peebles' Sons Co., 58 Fed. Rep. 585, complainant distilled whisky and bottled it under a label which bore the statement "Old Pepper Whisky, the oldest and best brand of whisky made in Kentucky. Pepper Distillery hand-made sour mash. Established 1780. Jas. E. Pepper & Co., Distillers, Lexington, Kentucky. Every genuine barrel has our trade-mark and fac-simile signature burned on the head. Consumers should satisfy themselves that the whisky is distilled by Jas. E. Pepper & Co., Lexington, Kentucky. Bottled at the distillery warehouse and warranted perfectly pure and non-adulterated." The court said: "It is proven and admitted that James E. Pepper & Co., for the eighteen months preceding July, 1893, instead of bottling pure, unadulterated Old Pepper Whisky, has bottled a mixture of Pepper whisky and other whiskys, of which mixture thirty-five per cent. was not Pepper whisky. To bottle such a mixture and sell it under the trade label and caution notices above referred to, is a false representation and a fraud upon the purchasing public. A court of equity cannot protect property in a trade-mark thus fraudulently used. It is not material whether the foreign whisky mixed with Pepper's is as good or better whisky than Pepper's, or whether the mixture is better than pure Pepper whisky. The public are entitled to a true statement as to the origin of the whisky, if any statement is made at all. The complainant and Pepper are not to be protected in the deception of the public even if it works to the advantage of the public."

In Solis Cigar Co. v. Pozo, 16 Colo. 388, the words "El Cabio Habana," were used by the defendants to designate a brand of cigars. Suit was brought by plaintiff to restrain this as an infringement of his trade-mark. The defense was made that the use of the words was a misrepresentation on the part of plaintiff as to quality. Bissell, C., said: "With regard to the word 'Habana,' the case is not so easy of settlement. This was expressive of a quality, and an absolute representation of the material of which the cigars were made. Some sorts of deception may be practised without loss of right to the legal protection usually given this species of property. It is possible for the proof to show that the public received an erroneous impression, which would not, of itself, be sufficient to destroy the validity of the trade-mark. Neither need the deception be of such a character as to work a positive injury to the purchasers to deprive the user of his exclusive privilege. In the first case it must not concern any of the essential particulars which the trade-mark protects, and in the latter it must not be absolutely false as to any of its leading elements. . . . The whole purpose of the manufacturer was evidently to lead the public to believe that the cigar was made of that tobacco which is so much sought after and preferred by the smoking public, yet it was not wholly true. The plaintiff admitted that the cigars sold under that brand were made of Havana filler, seed binder, and Sumatra wrapper. Nothing but the filler came legitimately within the definition of Havana tobacco. . . . Such a course is in contravention of the principles observed by courts of equity in the administration of this branch of the law. . . . Judged by these rules, as they have been communicated and applied, this case had no standing in court, and the bill was properly dismissed."

In Ginter v. Kinney Tobacco Co., 12 Fed. Rep. 782; 105 P. & S., Wallace, C. J., said: "No principles are better settled in the law of trade-marks than that the use of a name or term which is likely to deceive the public in reference to the components or nature of the article to which it is applied, will not be tolerated." See also In re Dole Bros' Trade-Mark, 12 Pat. Off. Gaz. 939; Estcourt v. Estcourt Hop Essence Co., L. R., 10 Ch. App. 276; Wolfe v. Burke, 56 N. Y. 115; In re American Sardine Co., 3 Pat. Off. Gaz. 495.

In Laird v. Wilder, 9 Bush (Ky.) 131; 15 Am. Rep. 707, "Laird's Bloom of Youth or Liquid Pearl," was the label placed on the bottles of a cosmetic preparation for the complexion. Hardin, C. J., said: "But the most important and essential inquiry presented, and the only one which we need to determine, is, did the preparation compounded and sold by the appellant as a harmless cosmetic contain properties which rendered its use injurious or dangerous? We are constrained to conclude that the appellant, in putting his compound on the market as he did, with his express as well as implied assurance to the public that it was 'free from all mineral and poisonous substances,' deliberately engaged in the perpetration of a fraud, which in a court of equity should be rebuked rather than upheld or protected. To a party thus presenting himself, a court of equity, adhering to the maxim, 'He who asks equity must come with pure hands,' will not lend its aid when the object to be effected is to secure him the exclusive privilege of deceiving the public in a particular way, although in doing so it might prevent another equally guilty from committing the same wrong." See also Phalon v. Wright, 5 Phila. (Pa.) 464; Cox's Man. of Trade-Mark Cases 232; Bloss v. Bloomer, 23 Barb. (N. Y.) 604.

In Perry v. Truefitt, 6 Beav. 66, the master of the rolls said: "I do not think it is a favorable case for the interposition of this court, to say the least of it, when a party having bought a secret invented by a Mr. Leathart,

3. As to Cures.—The cases are very diverse upon this branch of the subject. If a remedy is advertised and sold as a cure for a disease, and it can be shown that it could by no possibility produce any beneficial result in the treatment of the particular disease, the trade-marks for such an article would probably be refused protection. But many excellent proprietary remedies are advertised and sold as useful in the treatment of a large number of ailments to which the remedy is in fact more or less applicable, and often more is claimed for the preparation than it will actually accomplish. In such cases, some judges have taken the high ground that it is beneath the dignity of a court of equity to occupy itself in the consideration of cases of this character.¹ Some judges, on the other hand, recognizing the fact that the proprietary medicine business is a large and reputable business, conducted to a great extent by reputable men, who sell articles which, while they have not the power to do all that may be claimed for them, are still good and useful remedies, and will in many cases render valuable assistance to those who are too poor or too careless to employ a physician, have not hesitated to protect the trade-marks for these remedies. And this seems to be the better view.

represents to his customers and the world that his 'admirable composition is made from an original recipe of the learned Von Blumenbach, and was recently presented to the proprietor by a very near relation of that illustrious physiologist.' The plaintiff states also a circumstance, not in the least degree supported by evidence, that the composition is formed of a vegetable balsamic production from Mexico. There are other things, which I do not think it necessary to observe upon, which make me think this is not a favorable case for a person to come in the first instance and claim the assistance of a court of equity, in aid of a legal right, which, however, I do not deny he may have." See also Pidding v. How, 8 Sim. 477.

1. In Kohler Mfg. Co. v. Beeshore, 59 Fed. Rep. 572, Shiras, C. J., said: "It has been more than once held in this circuit that courts of equity will not intervene by injunction in disputes between the owners of quack medicines, meaning thereby remedies or specifics whose composition is kept secret, and which are sold to be used by the purchasers without the advice of regular or licensed physicians. Fowle v. Spear, 7 Pa. L. J. 176; Cox's Man. of Trade-Mark Cases 90; Heath v. Bright, 3 Wall. Jr. (U. S.) 141. A similar view has prevailed in several state courts.

Wolfe v. Burke, 56 N. Y. 115; Smith v. Woodruff, 48 Barb. (N. Y.) 438. . . . It does not appear that the Supreme Court of the United States has, in any reported case, expressed an opinion on the right of owners of so-called patent medicines to protection by injunction. The reports do show that that court has dealt with trade-mark cases, in which proprietary medicines, whose composition was not disclosed, were involved, without condemning them as unfit to receive the protection of courts of equity. Thus, the case of McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245, is a leading case, often referred to, and related to a trade-mark of a patent medicine. So, too, in the Southern District of New York, in the case of Filkins v. Blackman, 13 Blatchf. (U. S.) 440, Judge Shipman protected the trade-mark 'Dr. J. Blackman's Healing Balsam.'

Plaintiff, proprietor of "Balm of Thousand Flowers," made the most extravagant claims regarding its curative powers. It was claimed that "it effectually cures pimples, blotches, chilblains, all kinds of eruptions, ulcers, wounds, cuts, burns, ring-worms, erysipelas, and St. Anthony's fire, and is a sovereign remedy for canker in the mouth, or elsewhere;" "a luxury, an antidote, and a cure of diseases; they [the young] will increase in

Unless some direct false statement can be proven to have been made, such as a claim of an ingredient which is not contained in the article, or that it is harmless when in fact it is harmful, or that it will cure a disorder to which it is not at all applicable, the trademarks of a proprietary medicine will be sustained, and such statements as are merely exaggerations, or that the remedy will cure a number of diseases without stating the stage at which the cure may be effected, or the length of time the treatment should be continued, or any of the essential facts which would be necessary to enable a physician to say that the claims for the compound are false, will be disregarded.¹

energy, be full of elasticity, health and beauty, and be mirrors of admiration." The court, in refusing protection, said, by Duer, J., "We cease to smile when we remember that the plaintiff, who boldly claims the aid of a court of equity, is filling his pockets by abusing the credulity of the young, the inexperienced, the weak and the ignorant, and that he resorts to misrepresentation and falsehood to induce those to purchase who would not otherwise buy, and those who buy to give a higher price than they would otherwise pay. If this is not deceiving and defrauding the public, what is?" Petridge v. Wells, 13 How. Pr. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 385; Cox's Man. 144.

In Heath v. Wright, 3 Wall. Jr. (U. S.) 141; Cox's Man. 133, plaintiff made the following claims for his patent medicine, "Kathairon," composed of castor oil and brandy—that it would infallibly cure "scald head, tetter, ringworm, erysipelas, itch, barber's itch, shaving pimples, salt rheum, chapped hands, stings, cuts, chilblains, swellings, inflammations, rheumatism," etc., and "almost instantly relieve sympathetic attacks of nervous headache," besides "restoring the hair and preventing it from turning gray." Defendant imitated it, with less exaggeration possibly, and plaintiff sought protection. Kane, J., said: "It is impossible for me to distinguish this case in principle from that of Fowle v. Spear, 7 Pa. L. J. 176; Cox's Man. of Trade-Mark Cases 90, which was before me on a similar motion some years ago. I then refused an injunction against the vendor of a patent medicine at the suit of his brother quack, who complained that his label and envelope of certificates had been imitated, on the ground that the special action of chancery could not be involved in a controversy that had so little merit to commend it on either side."

In Fowle v. Spear, 7 Pa. L. J. 176, Kane, J., said: "The bill sets forth in substance that the complainant is the manufacturer of a secret medicine, which he calls, 'Dr. Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry,' and that he sells it in bottles of a peculiar form, inclosed in wrappers, which bear certain devices and directions. On one of these wrappers, which is made part of the bill, the Balsam is described as 'a valuable family medicine for consumption of the lungs, coughs, colds, asthmas, bronchitis, croup, whooping-cough, difficulty of breathing, pains in the side or breast, liver complaints, etc.,' to which another paper, also among the exhibits, adds 'influenza, hoarseness, pains or soreness of the chest, etc.' . . . For aught that appears, it may be innocent enough; but though valuable as it is sworn to be, to the party who compounds and sells it, it is readily conceivable, that to him who buys and takes it, it may be far otherwise. It is not the office of chancery to intervene by its summary process in controversies like this; 'non prostrum tantus companionere,' looking at the incongruous group of diseases, for which the Balsam prescribes itself to public credulity, I must apply the principle of the vice chancellor's decision in Pidding v. How, 8 Sim. 477, that a complainant whose business is imposition, cannot invoke the aid of equity against a piracy of his trade-mark. The only remedy in such a case is at law."

1. Comstock v. White, 18 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 421; Cox's Man. of Trade-Mark Cases 180, was a suit by complainants, proprietors of "Dr. Morse's Indian Root Pills," to restrain defendants, formerly in partnership with them, from the use of the above

4. As to Origin or Place of Manufacture.—It has been decided in a number of cases that a false statement with reference to the origin of an article—such as Mexican Balm, East India Remedy, etc., when they had no connection with, nor were derived from, Mexico or East India respectively—is such deceit as will disentitle the plaintiff to relief against infringement. So, also, with reference to the place of manufacture; if an article is made in one place, but claimed to be derived from another, such a statement will deprive the plaintiff of relief. Thus, where the plaintiff had resided at one place, but subsequently moved his factory to another near by, but failed to state upon his label that he had made the change, or that he was manufacturing at the new place, relief was refused him. So, also, where a trader used words suggestive of the fact that the article was known and used in a foreign country, which was not true, relief was denied him.¹

trade-mark. Sutherland, J., said: "It does not appear that the pills are positively injurious; it is not to be believed that they have a tittle of the wonderful and benign curative or preventive capacity claimed for them in the eloquent pictorial advertisements of the parties; but it is not for the defendants to say that the plaintiffs are humbugging the public, and are, therefore, not entitled to any relief against them, when the defendants have been and still are engaged in the same work. As to the public, if these pills are an innocent humbug, by which both parties are trying to make money, I doubt whether it is my duty, on those questions of property, of right and wrong between the parties, to step outside of the case, and abridge the innocent individual liberty which all persons must be presumed to have in common, of suffering themselves to be humbugged."

In Fetridge v. Merchant, 4 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 156, Hoffman, J., said: "It is constantly insisted, and the position is sanctioned by some judges, that when the article in question is innocuous, or in some degree useful, no absurd panegyric or extravagant price is a reason for denying the interference. In short, as counsel once said before me, if a man should compound tallow with some high scent and beautiful coloring matter, and term it 'The Ointment of Immortality,' he has a right to appropriate so much of the public credulity as he can, to this designation."

Plaintiff, manufacturer of "Holloway's pills and ointment," sued to restrain defendant from gross simulation. Plaintiff, in his circulars and wrappers, had made extravagant claims as to the curative properties of his medicine. The master of the rolls said: "I think this as clear and as plainly avowed a fraud as I ever knew. I do not mean to say that I have any respect for this sort of medicines. I have none; but the law protects persons from fraudulent misrepresentations, and this is a species of property which the law does allow, and so long as the law recognizes it, it must be protected." Holloway v. Holloway, 13 Beav. 209.

1. Plaintiff stamped his razors "Queen's Own Co., Sheffield." Suit was brought to restrain defendant from imitation. Patterson, J., said: "The plaintiff is seeking to enjoin the defendant from using a trade-mark which he himself is not, in equity or good conscience, entitled to use, because it is a fraud upon the public. The evident purpose of the defendant's (plaintiff's, probably) stamp upon the razor and his advertisement and label, as the court below said, were 'to cause the purchasing public to believe that these razors are manufactured by a firm known as the "Queen's Own Co.," and in Sheffield, England,' when in point of fact he did not know where they were manufactured, nor by whom. The positive assertion of a thing not known to be true is as reprehensible as the assertion of a thing which is known to be untrue. . . . A person who comes into a court of equity for an injunction in a case of this kind must come with clean hands; he cannot be granted relief upon a claim to the exclusive use of a trade-mark which contains a false representation, calculated to deceive the public as to the manufacturer of the article and the place where it is manufactured." Joseph v. Macowsky, 96 Cal. 518.

Plaintiff's trade-mark for tea contained the following: "Standard He-No Tea, Kind the Chinese Drink," etc. Irving, J., said: "From these statements the casual reader of them would certainly understand that there was a kind of tea in China called 'He-No Tea,' and that this tea was the kind the Chinese drank, and that this very tea the appellees imported direct from China, and was by them guaranteed to be the pure and genuine article. We were so impressed and believed, until we knew the contrary; and we do not think the most scrutinizing reader would ever imagine it to be a tea compounded of several varieties in the city of Baltimore, as the evidence clearly and undeniably shows it to be prepared in the house of the appellees, and that it was not imported, as sold, from China. . . . It is not necessary that the appellees should have deliberately designed to deceive (and in this case they may not have so intended); if what they have said in their label is naturally calculated to deceive, and must and does inevitably deceive, then the falsehood which their label conveys must bring to them the same consequences as if willfully uttered." The bill was dismissed. Kenny v. Gillet, 70 Md. 574.

In Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218, Field, J., said: "A court of equity will extend no aid to sustain a claim to a trade-mark of an article which is put forth with a misrepresentation to the public as to the manufacturer of the article, and as to the place where it is manufactured, both of which particulars were original circumstances to guide the purchaser of the medicine."

The trade-mark of complainants, whose bitters were first made in Angostura, but at the time of the suit in Port-of-Spain, represented that the article was still made by Dr. Siegert at Angostura, now Port-of-Spain. The court, by Irving, J., said they failed to distinguish the case from Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218, and observed that, "it is a general rule of law that courts of equity, in cases of this kind, will not interfere by injunction where there is any lack of truth in the plaintiff's case; that is, where there is any misrepresentation in his trade-mark or labels." Siegert v. Abbott, 61 Md. 276; 48 Am. Rep. 101.

In Ex p. Farnum & Co., 18 Pat. Off. Gaz. 412, Marble, Commissioner, said: "Were I to admit the word 'Lancaster' to be an essential feature of the mark, the case would then seem to be open to the further objection that the use of such word would convey a false impression to the public—viz.: that the goods were manufactured in Lancaster when, in fact, they were made in Philadelphia, and that anyone making like goods in Lancaster might obtain an injunction against the use of such word by parties manufacturing elsewhere. . . . Words calculated to deceive the public as to the place of manufacture should not be allowed registration."

In Connell v. Reed, 128 Mass. 477; 35 Am. Rep. 397, Gray, C. J., said: "This is a bill in equity to restrain the defendant from infringing upon an exclusive right claimed by the plaintiffs in the words 'East Indian,' used, together with the word 'remedy' or 'remedies,' as a trade-mark upon bottles of medicine. . . . But the conclusive answer to this suit is, that the Master has found, upon evidence which appears to us to be satisfactory, that the plaintiffs have adopted and used these words to denote and to indicate to the public that the medicines were used in the East Indies, and that the formula for them was obtained there, neither of which is the fact. Under these circumstances, to maintain this bill would be to lend the aid of the court to a scheme to defraud the public."

In Palmer v. Harris, 60 Pa. St. 156; 100 Am. Dec. 557, plaintiff's trade-mark for cigars, made in New York, represented that they were manufactured in Havana. The court, by Sharswood, J., in refusing to restrain by injunction a counterfeit of the mark, said: "The maxim which is generally expressed, 'He who comes into equity must come with clean hands,' but sometimes, in stronger language, 'He that hath committed iniquity shall not have equity,' has been often applied to bills to restrain by injunction the counterfeiting of trade-marks. The ground on which the jurisdiction of equity in such cases is rested, is the promotion of honesty and fair dealing, because no one has a right to sell his own goods as the goods of another. . . . It is plain that there is no class of cases to which the maxim referred to can be more properly applied. The party who attempts to deceive the public by the use of a trademark, which contains on its face a falsehood as to the place where his goods are manufactured, in order to have the benefit of the reputation which such goods have acquired in the market, is guilty of the same fraud of which he complains in the defendant. He certainly can have no claim to the extraordinary interposition of a tribunal, constituted to administer equity, for the purpose of securing to him the profits arising from his fraudulent act."

5. As to the Maker (Assignee).—The name of the maker of an article has always been considered as the best guaranty of genuineness, hence it is that the use of a name of high reputation upon goods not made by the person whose name they bear, is an injury to the person whose name is used, and also a deception of the public, who buy the goods under the belief that they are getting the goods of the man whose name is used.¹ This case most often happens where a business formerly carried on by one man is purchased and continued by others under the name of the former proprietor, without making any change in the name or style of the concern. In some cases this has been held sufficient to forfeit a right of action,² to which the plaintiff would otherwise have been

In Hobbs v. Francois, 19 How. Pr. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 567, Bosworth, C. J., said: "The plaintiff's label is calculated to induce the belief, and probably was designed to induce the belief, that the article in the box on which it was pasted is manufactured in London; that the sole proprietors of it have their place of business at 24 Mark Lane, London; that it is intrinsically so excellent as to secure the patronage of Her Majesty, the Queen; and that the labels have paid the stamp duty required by some English statute. The truth is that it is made in New York, and that Her Majesty, the Queen, is probably ignorant of its virtues, or even of its existence. In this respect there is a manifest intention to deceive and mislead the public. . . . The plaintiff's labels, therefore, contain misrepresentations believed to be useful, and which must be known to be false; and to secure to the plaintiff by injunction an exclusive use of such a label, and the exclusive privilege of thereby deceiving the public, is an object to which a court of equity will not lend its aid. The court does not refuse its aid in such a case from any regard to the defendant, who is using the same efforts and misrepresentations to deceive the public; but on the principle that it will not interfere to protect a party in the use of trademarks which are employed to deceive the public, and to deceive them by fraudulent representations contained in the labels and devices which are claimed to constitute wholly or in part such trade-marks."

1. In Lichtenstein v. Goldsmith, 37 Fed. Rep. 359, Colt, J., said: "Again, it is said that the complainants deceive the public, in that they allow the boxes to be labeled with the names of dealers to whom the cigars are sold, or for whom they are made. But this is shown to be a custom in the cigar trade, and I do not think it results in any deception or false representation. All these cigars are in fact made at the Elk Factory, and they are so stamped, and when the public buy them, they are purchasing a genuine Elk cigar, made by these complainants; and I do not see that the additional label put on the box, in accordance with a custom of the trade, is in any just sense such a false representation as should invalidate the trade-mark." See also Samuel v. Berger, 4 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 88.

2. In Stachelberg v. Ponce, 23 Fed. Rep. 430, Colt, J., said: "The complainant, Stachelberg, obtained, by assignment from one Asher Bijur, of New York, the exclusive right to use this trade-mark ('La Normandi,' for cigars) and he subsequently conveyed the right to the firm of Stachelberg & Co., the complainants. . . . Whatever may be thought of the remaining defenses, there is one point which we think is well taken, and therefore fatal to any relief prayed for in the bill. In the use of the trade-mark, the complainants do not state that it was obtained by assignment or purchase from A. Bijur. Bijur originated the trade-mark, and it thus became a sign of the quality of the article he sold, and an assurance to the public that it was the genuine product of his manufacture.

. . . Now, in order that the public may not be deceived, it is essential that an assignee or purchaser of the original proprietor should indicate in the use of the trade-mark that he is assignee or purchaser—Sherwood v. Andrews, 3 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 588—otherwise the public are misled into purchasing the goods of another manufacturer or vendor as those of the original proprietor. . . . And so these complainants, in failing to give notice that they are the purchasers and assignees of the trade-mark from A. Bijur, are practising the same deception toward the public which they charge against the defendant. The fact that the name, 'M. Stachelberg,' is attached to the trade-mark, can no more relieve the complainants of the charge of misrepresentation as to the public than the use of the name 'E. Ponce,' or 'E. P.,' can relieve the defendant of such a charge. It is the use of the fanciful words 'La Normandi,' or words of substantial similarity, that is calculated to mislead. The supreme court, in Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218, declare that the object of a trade-mark being to indicate by its meaning and association the origin or ownership of the article, it would seem that when a right to its use is transferred to others, either by act of the original manufacturer or by operation of law, the fact of transfer should be stated in connection with its use, otherwise a deception would be practised upon the public, and the very fraud accomplished, to prevent which courts of equity interfere to protect the exclusive right of the original manufacturer."

Complainants, a corporation, having succeeded by successive assignments to the business and trade-marks of "Hegeman & Co.," continued the use of the firm name in their trade-mark. Defendants answered, charging plaintiffs with misrepresentation in not designating themselves successors. Daly, C. J., said: "And this [trade-mark containing name of maker not assignable] is equally so with a trade-mark used and recognized, as denoting that the article or product is made by a particular person, whose skill, experience, or other personal quality, or whose personal experience in the fabricating, preparation or production of it, gives to it a peculiar value, which is distinguishable from a trade-mark used as a brand of quality, or of texture, fineness, or other characteristics; or to indicate that it is made in a particular establishment or manufactory; or where a name simply denotes an established business, with whatever advantages may accrue from its long establishment, the fact that it is generally or widely known, and the confidence it inspires from its duration." Relief was denied on above ground. Hegeman v. Hegeman, 8 Daly (N. Y.) 1.

Defendant, by assignment in bankruptcy, transferred his business and trade-marks to plaintiff, and lent his name to a company manufacturing the same article. Suit was brought to restrain this use of defendant's name. The court, by Westbrook, J., in deciding that the defendant could not be involuntarily deprived of the use of his name, said: "If what the plaintiff states upon the wrappers of his bottles containing the medicine, and which has been hereinbefore set forth, is remembered, it will appear, as has also been stated, that he undertakes to sell his compound, not only under the name and alleged trade-marks which Henry T. Helmbold formerly used, and which he still claims to use under and through the corporation with which he is now connected, but upon a representation that said Helmbold superintends, personally, its manufacture, and by his own signature certifies to the genuineness of each bottle. This, clearly and confessedly, is false, and the plaintiff is entitled to no protection in a business carried on by means of untrue representations and statements. As Henry T. Helmbold is personally employed with the defendant, and whatever value his personal care and supervision give to the defendant's business fairly belongs to it, and not to the plaintiff, an order of court should not suppress the publication of the truth and allow the utterance of falsehood." Helmbold v. Henry L. Helmbold Mfg. Co., 53 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 453.

In Sherwood v. Andrews, 5 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 588, Wilson, C. J., said:

entitled, but in others it has been disregarded.¹ A general rule deducible from the authorities is, that where the trade-mark or name under which the goods are sold does not contain any direct false statement, relief will not be refused, if purchasers of the goods could reasonably understand that the goods bearing the trade-mark or trade name are of a certain standard kind or quality, or are made in a certain manner, or after a particular formula, by persons who are carrying on the same business formerly carried on by the person whose name is in the trade-mark. It has been said in some cases that a trade-mark necessarily points to the original adopter, and cannot be used by others, and certainly not unless the successor designates himself as successor of the adopter. But this rule has been doubted, and it seems to be established, that if the plaintiff is really carrying on the business of the original adopter of the mark, so that the original meaning of the mark has been preserved, and the public are not misled, his rights will be sustained, notwithstanding the fact that he does not designate himself as assignee or purchaser of the original proprietor.

"All who use trade-marks, indicating that the articles were originally manufactured or owned by others, are practising an imposition upon the public. Every assignee and purchaser, who uses the trade-mark of the original proprietor, without indicating that he is the assignee or purchaser, is in this position; and thus an article which, by reason of the skill and integrity of the original proprietor, has justly acquired a reputation which insures the sale of the article at a large profit, is, by the aid of the courts, permitted to be adulterated and sold, by some dishonest assignee of the trade-mark, as made by the original owner."

In Edleston v. Vick, 23 Eng. L. & Eq. 51, Wood, V. C., said: "It is said that the Messrs. Taylor have retired, and they no longer manufacture these pins, the plaintiff having succeeded to their trade. That is so; and for the good-will and right to use the labels and machinery for stamping them, the plaintiff has paid £2,600. I do not think that the want of title to use the label, which was urged by the defendant against the plaintiff's application, can prevail. If the plaintiff, or those under whom he claims, has used this label continuously for a certain space of time, that is enough to enable him to prevent others from using it, and making a profit out of the reputation which that label has acquired in the market. But then it is said that the use of this label by the plaintiff is a fraud . . . because it holds out that the article is manufactured by Taylor, when it is, in point of fact, manufactured by the plaintiff, Taylor having ceased to have anything to do with the business. But, to take the last point first, the firm of Taylor & Co. having originally made this article, and it being now made by the persons who have bona fide acquired the business, they are quite justified in using the name of the old firm. It would be going too far to say that this is a misrepresentation by the plaintiff, when he only uses the name which he has bought the right to use."

1. In Jennings v. Johnson, 37 Fed. Rep. 364, Colt, J., said: "The plaintiff, Jennings, was one of the firm of I. S. Johnson & Co. In stating on the label that the liniment is prepared by I. S. Johnson & Co., he merely retains the name of the firm of which he was a member. I cannot see how the public are deceived or injuriously affected by such a course. It is not uncommon, under such circumstances, to retain the old firm name. The facts in the case of Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218, were quite different. In the present case I am satisfied that a decree should be entered for the complainant, and it is so ordered."

In Hoxie v. Chaney, 143 Mass. 592; 58 Am. Rep. 149, in holding "A. N. Hoxie's Mineral Soap" and "A. N. Hoxie's Pumice Soap," to be assignable, Allen, J., said: "There may no doubt be cases where the personal skill of an artist or artisan may so far enter into the value of the product that a trade-mark bearing his name would, or at least might, imply that his personal work or supervision was employed in the manufacture; and in such cases, it would be a fraud upon the public if the trade-mark should be used by other persons, and for this reason such a trade-mark would be held to be unassignable. It is in any case a question whether the use of the trade-mark would give to the public or to purchasers a false idea as to who made the article; and a court of equity would not lend any active aid to sustain a claim to a trade-mark which should contain a misrepresentation to the public. Connell v. Reed, 128 Mass. 477; 35 Am. Rep. 397; Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218. But, on the other hand, the usages of trade may be such that no such inference would naturally be drawn from the use of a trade-mark, which contains a person's name, and that all that purchasers would reasonably understand is that goods bearing the trade-mark are of a certain standard kind or quality, or are made in a certain manner, or after a certain formula, by persons who are carrying on the same business that formerly was carried on by the person whose name is in the trade-mark."

In Kidd v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 617, Pike assigned his business and trade-mark, "S. N. Pike's Magnolia Whisky, Cincinnati, Ohio," to the predecessors of complainants, who sued to restrain defendants from imitation. It was decided by the court that the transfer of the trade-mark was valid. Field, J., said: "As to the right of Pike to dispose of his trade-mark in connection with the establishment where the liquor was manufactured, we do not think there can be any reasonable doubt. It is the primary object of a trade-mark to indicate by its meaning or association the origin of the article to which it is affixed, but when the trade-mark is affixed to articles manufactured at a particular establishment, . . . and that establishment is transferred to others, the right to the use of the trade-mark may be lawfully transferred with it. Its subsequent use by the person to whom the establishment is transferred is considered as only indicating that the goods to which it is affixed are manufactured at the same place and are of the same character as those to which the mark was attached by its original designer."

A. C. & Co. succeeded to the business of Stillman & Co., continuing the use of the trade-mark, "Stillman & Co.," on their goods. Defendants leased the mill formerly occupied by Stillman & Co. and marked their goods, "Stillman Mills." Suit was brought to restrain defendants. Durfee, C. J. (concurring), said: "There are cases in which a court of chancery refuses to protect a trade-mark, because it is an imposition on the public. The defendants contend that this is a case of that kind. I think, however, that there is little reason to doubt that purchasers who are looking for Stillman & Co.'s linseys get what they are looking for when they get the linseys manufactured by the plaintiffs. The firm of Stillman & Co. has ceased to exist, and, consequently, Stillman & Co.'s linseys, manufactured by Stillman & Co., can no longer be procured; but the plaintiffs are their successors by purchase, in the use of their firm name, and continue the same manufacture with improvement, and, therefore, I am reluctant to hold that a continuance of the old name upon their labels is intrinsically any fraud upon the public, who are interested to get the same or a better manufacture, but who, so long as they do get it, can have little care whether it comes from the original manufacturers or their successors." Carmichel v. Latimer, 11 R. I. 395; 23 Am. Rep. 481.

B. conveyed to F. the right, upon the payment of an annual royalty for ten years, to make and sell, with the trade-mark, B.'s patent medicine. To a suit by F. to restrain defendant from simulation, he pleaded misrepresentation as to maker. Shipman, J., said: "This particular trade-mark, being the name of the inventor, was personal to Dr. Blackman, in its inception, but has been permitted by him to be applied, and to be appropriated, to the same article when manufactured by Filkins Bros. Under the circumstances in which the medicine has been manufactured and sold, the use of the trade-mark does not imply that the medicine was manufactured by Jonas Blackman, but that it is the same article which he originally invented and manufactured." Filkins v. Blackman, 13 Blatchf. (U. S.) 440.

In Meriden Britannia Co. v. Parker, 39 Conn. 450; 12 Am. Rep. 401, Rogers

6. Wrongful Use of the Word "Patent."—The Revised Statutes of the United States provide that every person who uses upon anything made, used or sold by him, for which he has not obtained a patent, the name, or an imitation of the name, of any person who has obtained a patent therefor, without the license or consent of such patentee or his assigns or legal representatives; or who, with intent to imitate the mark or device of the patentee, employs the word "patent" or "patentee" or who, for the purpose of deceiving the public, employs the word "patent," or any word importing that the article offered for sale is patented when such is not the fact, shall be liable for each offense to a penalty of one hundred dollars.¹ Under this provision, the use of the word "patent"

Bros., having acquired a reputation for the manufacture of plated spoons and forks, entered the employ of complainants, who then marked their spoons and forks "1847, Rogers Bros. A 1." Suit was brought to restrain imitation. The defense was misrepresentation as to manufacturer. Carpenter, J., said: "All that the public or the trade cared to know was that the goods were the production of their (Rogers Bros.) skill and experience. That fact, as it seems to us, clearly appears. The further fact that the petitioners furnished capital and machinery, employed and paid laborers, and sold the goods, is entitled to but little weight so far as this question is concerned; although it shows that, in another sense, the petitioners were the manufacturers of the goods. We are satisfied that there is no such misrepresentation as the cases contemplate, which hold that a trade-mark which states a falsehood is not entitled to protection."

In Dixon Crucible Co. v. Guggenheim, 2 Brew. (Pa.) 321, Paxson, J., said: "The difference between 'Joseph Dixon & Co.,' as printed on the labels, and 'The Joseph Dixon Crucible Co.,' is not of such a character as to destroy the plaintiff's right to equitable relief. Joseph Dixon & Co. is the name of the firm that has been for many years lawfully engaged in the manufacture of Dixon's stove polish. Since the formation of the new company and the death of Mr. Dixon in 1868, the name on the wrapper has not been changed. There is nothing here to indicate any attempt at deception or imposition. The trade-mark designates the place truly where the goods are put up and sold, and with sufficient certainty the ownership thereof."

In Fulton v. Sellers, 4 Brew. (Pa.) 42, Strong, J., said: "Nor do we think the position tenable that the complainants are not entitled to relief because they are only assignees of the trade-mark, and use it without designating themselves assignees. We do not perceive how their using the mark after they bought it without giving notice that they are not the original owners of it, can be a fraud upon the public of which the defendant can avail himself. . . . Pirating the trade-mark of another is an infringement upon that other's rights, and the use which he may make of that right cannot be in issue when a court is asked to stay the piracy."

In Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co., 4 De G. J. & S. 137, The Lord Chancellor said: "The question then arises, what amounts to a material false representation? Suppose a partnership to have been formed a century ago under a style or firm composed of the names of the then partners, and that the partnership has been continued by the admission of new partners in an unbroken series of successive partnership trading under the same original style, although the names of the present partners are wholly different from those in the original firm; is it an imposition on the public that such partners should continue to use the style or firm of the original partnership? This question must be answered without any doubt in the negative; for it is competent by the law of England to a partnership, to adopt any style or firm which does not involve a claim to incorporation or the assumption of what belongs to others, and the practice of the trading community in this respect is so common and general that no misleading of the public can result from it."

on an article which might be the subject of a patent, whether one ever existed upon it or not, in such a manner as to convey the idea that the article was subject to the protection of the patent, would be such a false statement as would disentitle a manufacturer to relief in equity. The word "patent," may be used, however, when done in such a manner as not to convey the meaning that the article is subject to the control of a patent, but only that the design is that of a certain patent or patentee, the patent for which may have expired. It has been held in one case that where the word "patented" was used erroneously, and with no intention of deceiving the public, upon an article, the trade-mark for which had been registered, such use would not disentitle the owner of the mark to relief in equity, as against a piracy.¹

1. The following constituted plaintiff's trade-mark for tobacco, "El Cabio De R. Solis, Habana, Copyrighted." Suit was brought to restrain imitation; the defense was misrepresentation by the plaintiff, and an injunction was granted. Bissell, C., said: "The other branch of the question—deceit of the public—is not so free from difficulty. If it be conceded that the trade-mark tended to deceive the public in any material particular, the relief must be denied. Below the picture of the tobacco plant, it will be remembered, were the words 'Habana,' 'Copyrighted.' . . . The word 'Copyrighted' meant the same to everybody. It implied that the protection of the statute applicable to such matters had been secured. This was probably believed to be true, but was without foundation. The misrepresentation, however, was unimportant. It did not tend to deceive the public in respect to any of those matters with which the law concerns itself. The public might buy with the same reliance on all the representations as to the place of production and ownership, whether the marks were protected by the statute or guarded only by the appropriation and user of its owner." Solis Cigar Co. v. Pozo, 16 Colo. 388.

In Lauferty v. Wheeler, 63 How. Pr. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 488; 11 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 220, Van Brunt, J., said: "The fourth ground of defense is that the plaintiff is violating the United States statute in having the words 'patent, Sept.' upon the goods sold by him. It is to be observed that it is not claimed that the use of the word 'patent' has been resorted to by the plaintiff until very recently. It appears that application had been made on the 9th of June, 1882, for a patent for an improvement in process of manufacturing of oleomargarine butter by Henry Lauferty, and that, on the thirty-first of August, notice was received from the United States Patent Office that the application had been examined and allowed, and under this process the plaintiff has been manufacturing. It further appears that Mr. Lauferty was informed that his letters patent would be forwarded to him in September, this motion being heard in that month, and there is no evidence that prior to that time the word 'patent' was used." It was accordingly held that plaintiff was not disentitled to the relief sought.

Plaintiffs used the abbreviation "Pat." on their labels, meaning "registered," and applying to their trade-mark and not the manufactured article. In deciding that this did not disentitle them to relief, the court, by Fenner, J., said: "Defendant urges that the use of the abbreviation 'Pat.' meaning patented, in the trade-mark, is a fraud on the public and a violation of law, which deprives plaintiff of the right to redress. It is undoubtedly true that the affixing of the word 'patent' to an unpatented article, 'for the purpose of deceiving the public,' is prohibited under penalties, by the laws of the United States (U. S. R. S., § 4901); and that a representation in a trade-mark that an unpatented article is protected by a patent 'prima facie amounts to a misrepresentation of an important fact, which would disentitle the owner of the mark to relief in a court of equity, as against a pirate.' Browne on Trade-Marks, § 572; Coddington's Dig. Tr.-M. Cases, § 548; Chapman v. Shepard, 39 Conn. 450. But, to have such effect, the use of the word 'patented' must be 'with the purpose of deceiving the public,' and if such fraudulent intention does not exist, and the use of the word may be explained in any reasonable sense consistent with truth and honesty, the party will not be prejudiced. High on Injunctions, § 674; Coddington's Dig., §§ 570, 571." Insurance Oil Tank Co. v. Scott, 33 La. Ann. 946; 39 Am. Rep. 286.

The English courts have been less rigid on this subject than those of the United States, and in many cases the use of the word "patent," after the expiration of a patent on the product of the same manufacturer or factory, has been sustained by them.¹ The American rule seems to be the more logical one.

In Consolidated Fruit Jar Co. v. Darfinger, 6 Am. L. T. N. S. 511, concerning "Mason's Patent," "Mason's Improved," "The Mason Jar of 1858," Cadwallader, J., said: "The complainants deduce their asserted right under Mason, who was the patentee of certain alleged improvements in fruit jars. There has been a judicial decision against the validity of his patent; and they do not now assert its validity. But they claim a trade-mark in what I think is not sufficiently distinguishable from a claim of exclusive right in the patented privilege. In other words, the alleged trade-mark is either deceptively obscure, or purports to be for the subject of the patent, or to include it." Protection of the trade-mark in this form was therefore denied.

In Richardson's Appeal, 3 Pat. Off. Gaz. 120, Leggett, Commissioner, said: "Applicant petitions for the registration of the words 'A. Richardson's Patent Union Leather-Splitting Machine.' It appears that the leather-splitting machine he proposes to manufacture and place this alleged trade-mark upon, has been patented, manufactured, and put upon the market under the above caption during the last twenty years, and that the patent has expired. The examiner has therefore held that the word 'patent' cannot properly be sanctioned as part of this trade-mark, because it would tend to deceive the public." Registration was accordingly refused.

1. Ransome v. Graham, 51 L. J. Ch. 897. In this case plaintiffs continued to use on their plows the word "patent," the patent having been taken out in 1803. Bacon, V. C., said: "The defendants insist that the plaintiffs have fraudulently stamped the word 'patent' on their plows, and they refer to cases well-known and of unquestionable authority in which it has been decided that the fraudulent use of the word 'patent' will disentitle the person using it to relief which he might otherwise obtain.

. . . The word 'patent' was properly cast on and appeared on the face of the shares, for which, in 1803, one of the plaintiffs' predecessors obtained a patent, and upon the shares, and thenceforth only upon the shares, that word has since remained; but all the advertisements and catalogues of the plaintiffs plainly announce that they lay no claim to any patent right—they refer to a patent which had expired in 1817. They make their shares according to the invention in that expired patent, as everybody else may; but to suggest that they have in any manner claimed anything under or in respect of that patent, and that they have done this fraudulently and to deceive the public, is merely desperate and opposed to the truth of the case."

In Cheavin v. Walker, 5 Ch. Div. 850, Jessel, M. R., said: "No doubt a man may use the word 'patent' so as to deceive no one. It may be used so as to mean that which was a patent, but is not so now. In other words, you may state in so many words, or by implication, that the article is manufactured in accordance with a patent which has expired. . . . Protection only extends to the time allowed by the statute for the patent, and if the court were afterwards to protect the use of the word as a trade-mark, it would be in fact extending the time for protection given by the statute. It is, therefore, impossible to allow a man who has once had the protection of a patent to obtain a further protection by using the name of his patent as a trade-mark. . . . The defendant's label is as follows: 'S. Cheavin's Patent Prize Medal Self-Cleaning Rapid Water Filter, Improved and Manufactured by Walker, Brightman & Co., Boston, England.' This is to say, that the filter is manufactured according to Cheavin's expired patent by Walker, Brightman & Co. . . . This court ought not to interfere."

In Ford v. Foster, L. R., 7 Ch. App.

611, the plaintiff, whose trade-mark was otherwise valid, had falsely represented himself as "patentee." The court, by Mellish, L. J., in deciding that this did not disentitle him to protection, said: "Then would it be a defense to that action at law that the plaintiff has made false representations to the public that his article was patented, when in fact it was not? If the false representation was in the trade-mark itself, although I cannot find that that point has ever been decided or raised in a court of common law, yet I am disposed to think, and indeed I have a pretty clear opinion, that if that question were raised, it would be held that the fact of the trade-mark itself containing a false representation to the public would be an answer at law to an action brought for a deceptive use of the trade-mark by the defendant. . . . But where the trade is, as in this case, a perfectly honest trade, and where the trade-mark is, as in this case, a perfectly honest trade-mark, I am clearly of opinion that there is no common-law principle upon which it is possible to hold that the fact of the plaintiff having been guilty of some collateral fraud would be an answer to an action."

In Marshall v. Ross, L. R., 8 Eq. 651, plaintiffs had for forty years designated their thread as "Patent Thread." Defendants imitated it. A suit was brought to restrain the latter. James, V. C., said: "The word 'patent' may be used in such a way as not to deceive the public. For instance, the term 'patent leather boots' is in constant use, but no one supposes that it is thereby intended to convey the impression that the leather is protected by any patent. It is here stated in the bill, and verified by affidavit, that the term 'patent thread,' has been used in the trade for many years past, and is the name by which thread of a certain class is known by manufacturers and in the trade. It has, in fact, become a word of art. I am, therefore, only following the principle of the decided cases, for here there has been no such misrepresentation, designed or undesigned, as to deprive the plaintiffs of their right to an injunction."

In Morgan v. M'Adam, 36 L. J. Ch. 228, Wood, V. C., said: "The plaintiffs in this case aver themselves to be the makers of black-lead crucibles, under the style of 'The Patent Plumbago Crucible Company' . . . and the question now before me is whether the plaintiffs so averring are entitled to maintain a suit in this court to prevent any other persons calling their articles 'Patent Plumbago Crucibles,' whether they can appropriate the name of 'Patent Plumbago Crucibles,' when it turns out to be the fact that there never was any patent, either in America or in England, or in any other part of the world, for the making of these crucibles. All those who are induced to buy these crucibles thus described as 'Patent Plumbago Crucibles,' are, to a certain extent, deceived, because they are led to believe that the article is protected by a patent, and thus may be induced to purchase it from the plaintiffs under the belief that there is a patent, and that the plaintiffs, or at least some limited number of persons, are the only persons authorized to sell it; and further, they are led to believe that if they should be minded to set up any manufactory of the same kind for themselves, they would be unable to do so in consequence of the plaintiffs being the possessors, either by way of license or ownership, of a patent preventing the world at large from imitating the article which is sold by them under this particular designation."

In Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co., 11 H. L. Cas. 523, Lord Kingsdown said: "If a trade-mark represents an article as protected by a patent, when in fact it is not so protected, it seems to me that such a statement prima facie amounts to a misrepresentation of an important fact, which would disentitle the owner of a trade-mark to relief in a court of equity against anyone who pirated it. In Flarel v. Harrison, 10 Hare 467, Vice Chancellor Wood intimated his opinion that this would be so when there never had been any patent at all; but in the subsequent case of Edleston v. Vick, 11 Hare 78, he seems to doubt whether the rule would be the same if there had originally been a patent, and the statement in the trade-mark, being true when first introduced, had been continued after it had ceased to be true. I confess that I should have great difficulty in assenting to that distinction. If the word 'patent' be not so used as to indicate the existing protection of a patent, but merely as part of the designation of an article known in the market by that term (and this I collect to have been the main ground of his Honor's decision), then I quite agree in his view. In such case nobody is meant to be deceived, or is

7. Cases in Which Complainant's Rights Were Sustained Notwithstanding Apparent Deception; Purging Falsehood.—Cases have arisen in which the courts, being convinced that, although by a strict construction, a meaning might be given to the words used which would be false, there was no motive to deceive, and the likelihood of deception being very remote, have afforded relief to the aggrieved party, on the ground that his conscience was clean, although his hands might not be. These cases cannot be said to be a departure from the maxim so rigidly applied by courts of deceived; a patent may have expired, and be known to have expired fifty years ago, and yet the name of 'patent' may have become attached to the article, and be used in the trade as designating it; but if the trade-mark represents the article as protected by patent, when in fact it is not so protected, I cannot think that it can make any difference whether the protection never existed or has ceased to exist."

In Edleston v. Vick, 11 Hare 78 ("The Inimitable Patent Solid-Headed Pins"), Vice Chancellor said: "It has also been contended that the plaintiffs, by describing their manufacture as a patented article, without any explanation that the exclusive privilege of the patent had expired, were guilty of a misrepresentation, and did not, therefore, come into court with clean hands, or put forward a right which the court would respect. . . . It is no doubt to be much preferred, that no representation should be issued to the public which is not strictly true; but in a case in which the goods have become known by a description which was originally accurate in every part, if I were to hold that the continued use of this description disentitled the party to the assistance of the court, it would be going much farther than I did in refusing to interfere by injunction where the plaintiff had adopted and used the word 'patent' untruly and without foundation." An injunction was accordingly granted.

In Flavel v. Harrison, 10 Hare 467, the Vice-Chancellor said: "Plaintiff relies upon the title which he has acquired to this particular manufacture, and to the name by which it is known, that name being, as he states, 'Flavel's Patent Kitchener.' Now, it turns out that neither the plaintiff nor his father, the original inventor, ever had any patent in the article, and that it never was in fact a patented article. . . .

The plaintiff, by using this appellation, certainly misleads the public; although the extent to which any particular individual may be deceived may depend on a variety of circumstances. Everyone knows that patented articles are in proportion more expensive than articles which are open to the competition of the world; and purchasers are more readily inclined to give a higher price for an article protected by patent than if it were open to unrestricted competition. . . . I think, however, that the use of the word 'patent' operates to prevent the public from testing it as they otherwise might; they are dissuaded from examining the article with a view to imitation; and it is in evidence that persons were prevented from making that free use of it which every purchaser has a right to make of an unpatented article. The knowledge that there was no patent would enable and encourage every ironmonger who bought the article, to take it to pieces, and examine, and make copies and models of all the parts for the purpose of imitation, if he thought it likely to be useful, which he would never think of doing with regard to a patented article. . . . Here the plaintiff comes with a description for which there never was any foundation—which is, in fact, a direct misrepresentation—and he asks this court to protect him in continuing to use it." An injunction was denied, but a bill was held for an action at law.

In Sykes v. Sykes, 3 B. & C. 541; 10 E. C. L. 176, plaintiffs, manufacturers of shot-belts and powder-flasks, obtained a patent for their manufacture, which was subsequently judicially declared invalid. They continued the use of the words "Sykes Patent" as a trade-mark and sued defendants for imitation. The court, by Abbott, C.J., decided in their favor, the use of the word "patent" apparently not entering into consideration in the decision.

equity, namely: "He who seeks equity, must come with clean hands."¹

There is a class of cases in which there exists a seeming misrepresentation, but which has nevertheless received the protection of the courts. They are cases in which the name of an old firm is used by its successors in business, although no one of the names of the original founders of the business is connected with it; cases also in which a business is conducted under a fictitious name, where there is no claim to corporate existence. These cases have rested upon the ancient custom of merchants, which has existed from a very early period, of perpetuating the style of business houses of high reputation. In Massachusetts, a statute exists

1. In Société Anonyme v. Western Distilling Co., 43 Fed. Rep. 416, plaintiffs, who had succeeded to the formula for the preparation of a particular wine, formerly made by a society of Benedictine monks in France, used, as a trade-mark, "Veritable Benedictine Liqueur des Moines Benedictins de l'Abbaye de Fecamp." Thayer, J., said: "According to the view which the court takes of the case, the only question deserving of serious consideration, is whether the complainant is not precluded from obtaining equitable relief by certain representations which it makes to the public concerning the manufacture of its own liquor. It is claimed by the defendants that the société, by its labels, seals, advertisements, etc., represents that the Benedictine by it sold is manufactured by Benedictine monks, and, if this contention is sustained by the evidence, it must be conceded that complainant is without right to equitable relief. . . . Evidently the phrase, 'Liquor of the Benedictine Monks,' etc., is one that may be interpreted in several ways without doing violence to the ordinary use of language; and I am of the opinion that people of ordinary intelligence would generally regard it as a representation that the liquor in question is compounded according to a formula invented or heretofore used by the monks of the abbey of Fecamp, rather than as a representation that the monks of that abbey are still engaged in the manufacture, and that the article is of their production." Protection was, for this reason, granted.

In Ransom v. Ball, 7 N. Y. Supp. 238; 54 Hun (N. Y.) 635, Dwight, J., said: "The only defense alleged is that the plaintiff corporation had no rights which the defendant was bound to respect, or which a court of equity will interfere to protect, because its trade-mark was itself a fraud upon the public. This charge is founded upon two specifications, viz.: (1) That the plaintiff's label falsely described the medicine as 'Prepared by Dr. J. R. Miller,' and (2) that the use of the word 'Magnetic' in the name of the medicine was without foundation in fact.

The outer wrappers of the plaintiff's bottle bore the words, plainly printed, 'Prepared and sold by D. Ransom, Son & Co., Props., Buffalo, N. Y.' It was on an inner wrapper only, directly beneath the directions for the use of the medicine, that the words were printed, 'Prepared by Dr. J. R. Miller.' . . .

An intention to defraud by these means can hardly be imputed to the plaintiff, when we see that it took pains to inform purchasers of the actual facts by the inscription on the outer label, while the inscription complained of was concealed until after the medicine was purchased and the outer wrapper removed. As for the use of the prefix 'Dr.' to Miller's name, it must be said that the title is too common, and too indefinite in its meaning, to be likely to deceive anybody. It is as freely used as that of 'Professor,' and means as little. . . . It is not pretended that the liquid possessed any of the properties of magnetism, in the scientific sense of the word; nor do we think it clear that the use of the word 'Magnetic' in its title was intended to deceive the public in that respect. The word, so far as any meaning was attached to it, was probably used rather in a figurative, than in a literal or scientific sense; and there was but little danger of its being misunderstood." Protection was therefore granted.

In Buckland v. Rice, 40 Ohio St. 526; 131 P. & S., Nash, J., said: "We think that the word 'Trammer' was used by the defendants in error (plaintiffs below), so as to hold out to the public that they were making a malt extract like that made by Trammer. This was a deception. . . . There are, however, other distinctive features of the trade-marks, labels and circulars of the defendants in error which are not subject to the objection urged herein to the use of the word 'Trammer,' which the courts below were asked to and did protect by their decrees in this case. Some of these devices the plaintiffs in error wrongfully made use of, and in rendering the judgment which the district court should have rendered, we make our decree the same as that of the court below, except wherein it protects the defendants in the use of the word 'Trammer.'"

In Read v. Richardson, 45 L. T. N. S. 54, plaintiffs used on their labels "special registered trade-mark" before registration was obtained. Colton, L. J., said: "It is the name which is protected; and as far as the cases have hitherto gone, they decide simply that when a man comes to protect a label with anything like a misstatement upon it, the court will not interfere. If we thought that, prima facie, that destroyed the right of the plaintiffs, of course we ought not to grant an injunction. But all we know about it is that they had carried in an application to register this trade-mark, and before they got their certificate of registration, I do not know for how long or under what circumstances, they did use this label with these words 'special registered trade-mark.' In my opinion, that does not make it such a prima facie case against the plaintiffs as would prevent us from interfering for their protection."

In Conrad v. Joseph Uhrig Brewing Co., 8 Mo. App. 277, Bakewell, J., said: "It is contended that the law can afford no protection to plaintiff, because his so-called trade-mark or label was in itself a misrepresentation. This beer, it is said, was not Budweiser beer. That it was not Budweiser beer, in the sense that it was not made in Budweis, is true. Neither was it imported beer. But it does not appear that it was held out to the public, either as actually made in Budweis or as a foreign article. The statement on the label explains that it was not made at Budweis, but by the Budweiser process. . . .

If this was not literally true, the testimony is that it was a distinction without a difference. . . . There was no testimony tending to show any imposition upon the public by plaintiff." Protection was accordingly granted.

Misrepresentations by plaintiff, made after the institution of a suit, are collateral merely, and will not debar him from protection. Siebert v. Findlater, 7 Ch. Div. 801. Here Fry, J., said: "I cannot see that there is in fact anything in that wrapper amounting to a fraudulent misrepresentation by reason of which I ought to debar the plaintiffs from any right they would otherwise have. Further than that, it must be borne in mind that these alleged misrepresentations were made, if made at all, in a wrapper not composed till six or seven months after the institution of the action, viz., in October, 1876, and I am at a loss to see how, even supposing that they were fraudulent misrepresentations, they could be a bar to the plaintiff's right of action. It seems to me that the case of Ford v. Foster, L. R., 7 Ch. App. 611, is decisive on that point."

In Hennessy v. Wheeler, 69 N. Y. 271; 25 Am. Rep. 188, in their complaint, plaintiffs described their bottles for brandy as quart and pint bottles; but they were shown to contain much less. The court below refused them protection on the ground of misrepresentation. On appeal, Earl, J., said: "Nothing appeared upon the bottles or the trade-mark to indicate that the bottles contained quarts and pints; and there was nothing in their appearance or form to deceive or impose upon anyone. They were transparent, and anyone looking at them could see the quantity they contained. . . . It is not questioned that their brandy is a genuine article, just what it purports to be, and while in their complaint the bottles are described as quart and pint bottles, they appear to be of the ordinary sizes used in the liquor trade, and I think we may assume that the brandy in them is sold by the bottle, and not in reference to measure. Anyone purchasing knows just what he is purchasing, and the price is regulated by the size of the bottles. . . . This is, therefore, not a case where it can be said that plaintiffs came into court with unclean hands and guilty consciences, and must therefore be denied equitable relief. It is not like the cases where the trade-mark is used to deceive or prohibiting even successors to conduct business under a name which is not derived from at least one of the partners.¹

Cases sometimes arise in which a trade-mark owner, who has been guilty of misrepresentation, discovers the weakness of his position, and endeavors to overcome the evil by erasing from his labels and advertisements all false statements preparatory to bringing suit. It is a doubtful question how far this can be done with success. In one case it was allowed where done before suit was brought; but in another, relief was denied where a false statement was not altered until after suit was instituted; while in a third case it was held that the property rights sought to be protected, had been built up through the instrumentality of a long course of falsehood and misstatement, to which it owed whatever value it impose upon the public, or where it is used upon a spurious, worthless or deleterious, compound, or where the business in which it is used is carried on systematically in a dishonest and fraudulent way. In such cases courts will not lend their aid to protect trade-marks."

False statements as to editions are insufficient to disentitle plaintiff to relief when they are justified by custom of trade. Metzler v. Wood, 8 Ch. Div. 608.

The fact that the subject-matter is a proprietary medicine will not disentitle a plaintiff to relief. Ellis v. Zeilen, 42 Ga. 91.

False statements in advertisements, not used upon, or in direct connection with, the sale of an article, but in newspapers, were considered insufficient to disentitle plaintiff to relief in Curtis v. Bryan, 2 Daly (N. Y.) 212; 36 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 33.

False assumption of the title "Professor" and extravagant claims of cures were held insufficient to disentitle plaintiff to relief in Holloway v. Holloway, 13 Beav. 209.

And in Chappell v. Sheard, 2 K. & J. 117, a false suggestion of authorship was held insufficient, although the words used were actually true. See also Chappell v. Davidson, 2 K. & J. 123.

Extravagant claims of the virtues of a medicine will not disentitle plaintiff to relief. Comstock v. White, 18 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 421.

Doing business under fictitious names will not disentitle to relief except where a statute exists prohibiting it. Dale v. Smithson, 12 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 237.

In Hogg v. Kirby, 8 Ves. 213, in reference to "The Wonderful Magazine, by William Granger," a nominal author, the Lord Chancellor said: "I have considerable difficulty as to the false colors under which the original publication appears. Though this is very usual, I cannot represent it to my mind otherwise than as something excessively like a fraud on the public. But it will be better to leave that as an ingredient in the action for damages." An injunction was granted.

1. Edleston v. Vick, 23 Eng. L. & Eq. 51; Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co., 4 De G. J. & S. 137; Bowman v. Floyd, 3 Allen (Mass.) 76; 80 Am. Dec. 55; Rogers v. Taintor, 97 Mass. 291. In Oakes v. Tonsmierre, 4 Woods (U. S.) 547, Bruce, D. J., said: "On the contrary, it is but common experience that articles bearing a particular name are not regarded by the public as being the actual manufacture of the person whose name they bear. It may have been so originally, for it is only natural that the article should be associated with, and called by, the name of its first maker or vendor; but generally speaking, unless in cases of inventions or articles produced by special skill, which are usually protected by letters patent, the public do not, in fact, and are not justified in the conclusion that, because articles bear a particular name, the person of that name is in fact the manufacturer or vendor of the article."

In Skinner v. Oakes, 10 Mo. App. 45, Thompson, J., said: "But where the trade-mark consists of a name, how far it is capable of assignment is a more difficult question. We think that the answer to this question depends upon the effect which the use of the name in each particular instance is shown to have upon the minds of the public. If it leads the public to believe that the particular goods are, in fact, made by the person whose name is thus stamped upon them, or in whose name they are advertised, whereas they are, in fact, made by another person, then such a use of the name will not be protected by the courts; for to do so would be to protect the perpetration of a fraud upon the public."

1. Purging Falsehood.—Alaska Packers' Assoc. v. Alaska Imp. Co., 60 Fed. Rep. 103. Here plaintiff was assignee of Aleutian Islands Fishing and Mining Co., of Kodiak, Alaska. The label used by it contained the following statement: "Packed at Kerlick, Kodiak Island, Alaska, by the Aleutian Islands Fishing and Mining Co., of San Francisco, California." The court said: "To correct the misstatement of the label, complainant, since the commencement of the action, has attached a circular label to the top of the can, stating that the salmon is packed by it as assignee of the Aleutian Islands Fishing & Mining Company. I do not think this cures the defect of the original label. It is the facts which existed before the suit was brought which make the cause of action and entitle to relief."

In Symonds v. Jones, 82 Me. 302, defendant, Jones, assigned the goodwill of his business and trade-marks to the complainant company, continuing some time in their employ, but subsequently leaving, and again beginning the use of the trade-marks. Suit was brought to restrain him. The defense was, misrepresentation as to manufacturer on part of plaintiff. Emery, J., said: "The facts do show that the limited company . . . used the 'red' or 'yellow' labels more or less without change up to 1885, when the latter company printed across the face of such of these labels as it did use, the words 'Winslow Packing Company, successor to.' Such use of the labels, without words indicating that Jones had personally left the business, and indicating a change of ownership, would evidently mislead the public as to the manufacturer of the goods, and hence should not receive protection from the court. It would wrong Jones, as well as the public. Stachelberg v. Ponce, 23 Fed. Rep. 430; 128 U. S. 686; Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218. It is plain, that while thus using the labels, the parties complainant in interest, could not maintain a bill for an injunction against their use by the respondent. The facts further show, however, that before the filing of the bill, the proprietors of the labels refrained from using them, or made such additions to those they did use, as clearly to indicate that the ownership of the business had changed, and that the successors to Jones, instead of Jones himself, were producing the goods. At the time of filing the bill, none of the complainants were offending in this respect, but all seem to have been dealing fairly with the public. Of course they cannot have any damages, or accounting for things done by the respondent while they were themselves offending; but if they are now themselves doing equity, they may ask the court to require the respondent to do equity also."

In Seabury v. Grosvenor, 14 Blatchf. (U. S.) 262, plaintiffs, proprietors of "Benson's Caprine Plaster," had advertised it as a recognized medicine, of wonderful curative power. In refusing to grant protection, the court, by Blatchford, J., said: "The evidence is clear that the plaintiffs were systematically and knowingly carrying on a fraudulent trade. Although they may have omitted the fraudulent and deceptive and untrue language from their circulars, before this suit was commenced, yet if they have any property in the trade-mark which they claim the title to, they acquired such property by the use, for a considerable time, of such language in the circulars which accompanied the articles they sold, and in respect of which the trade-mark is claimed. . . . Courts of equity refuse to interfere in behalf of persons who claim property in a trade-mark, acquired by advertising their wares under such representations as those above cited, if they are false. It is shown that there is no such article as caprine known in chemistry, or medicine, or otherwise. The authorities are clear that, in a case of this description, a plaintiff loses his right to claim the assistance of a court of equity. Lee v. Haley, L. R., 5 Ch. App. 59; Leather Cloth Co. v. American

XII. PROCEDURE — 1. Jurisdiction — a. OF LAW AND EQUITY. — The jurisdiction of the courts of law and equity to award damages for the infringement of a trade-mark, and to enjoin its wrongful use, has been recognized by the courts of England and the United States for several hundred years. The early English practice required proof of title and infringement at law, before an injunction would issue, but with the general development of the jurisdiction of equity, the right of the chancery court to inquire into the whole case primarily and grant immediate and adequate relief was recognized; and it has never been doubted in the United States.¹ In addition to the common-law

Leather Cloth Co., 4 De G. J. & S. 142."

1. In a suit in the United States circuit court, Eastern District of Louisiana, to restrain the infringement of a trade-mark, Billings, D. J., said: "It is urged that since the decision of the Trade-mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82, this court can derive no jurisdiction from the United States statute concerning trade-marks, and therefore that the equity jurisdiction can exist only in case of fraud upon, and intended deceit of, the public by the defendants, which the solicitor urges are wanting upon the proofs in this case. The first proposition is correct. But the jurisdiction of the court is derived from the citizenship of the parties, the complainants being citizens of the State of Missouri, and the defendants being citizens of Louisiana. The equity jurisdiction of these trade-mark cases is founded upon a long line of English and American cases, even when the rights of the parties are to be determined entirely by the written and unwritten laws of the states. See Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82." Battle v. Finlay, 50 Fed. Rep. 106.

In Shaver v. Shaver, 54 Iowa 208; 37 Am. Rep. 194, Beck, J., said: "For three hundred years the common law has recognized the right of a proprietor of a trade-mark to its exclusive use, and has awarded damages for the deprivation of such use. Southern v. How, Popham 144. The right has been, without interruption, recognized and protected by the courts of England and the United States from that day to the present, in the absence of statutes declaring the existence of such right, or providing regulations for its exercise, and remedies for its deprivation. Many cases involving the subject have been decided by the courts." The judge further said: "The jurisdiction of chancery to restrain the use of a trade-mark, without the consent of the proprietor, was first recognized at a later day. In 1742 Lord Hardwicke denied it (Blanchard v. Hill, 2 Atk. 484), but within the last fifty years it has been repeatedly exercised in England and in this country. I have not found an American case denying it. It has been expressly held that the right to the exclusive use of a trade-mark, when statutes exist regulating and protecting it, does not depend upon such statutes. Derringer v. Plate, 29 Cal. 292; Filley v. Fassett, 44 Mo. 173; 100 Am. Dec. 275. . . . We may express with equal positiveness the conviction that the rule is firmly settled that chancery will, in a proper case, by injunction, protect the proprietor of a trade-mark in its exclusive use. Chancery affords protection to the exclusive use of a trade-mark upon the ground of the injury sustained by the proprietor when it is appropriated by another, and of the fraud and deception practiced upon the public. . . . Chancery will restrain the injury to the trader and public by such fraudulent acts."

In U. S. v. Roche, 1 McCrary (U. S.) 385, defendant was ordered to show cause why he should not be proceeded against for violating a decree of the circuit court restraining him from infringing a certain trade-mark. McCrary, C. J., said: "In answer to this rule, it is suggested that the Supreme Court of the United States having, in the recent cases of U. S. v. Steffens, 100 U. S. 82, and U. S. v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 82, held the existing congressional legislation on the subject of trade-marks to be unconstitutional and void, the decree of injunction above mentioned is a nullity and the defendant is not bound to obey it. Upon looking into the record, we find that the injunction suit was not a proceeding instituted under the statute, but a bill in chancery brought to protect and enforce the plaintiff's exclusive right of property in their trade-mark, as that right exists at common law. In the opinion of the supreme court above referred to it is said: "The right to adopt and use a symbol or a device to distinguish the goods or property made or sold by the person whose mark it is, to the exclusion of use by all other persons, has been long recognized by the common law and the chancery courts of England and of this country, and by the statutes of some of the states. It is a property right, for the violation of which, damages may be recovered in an action at law, and the continued violation of it will be enjoined by a court of equity, with compensation for past infringement. This exclusive right was not created by the act of Congress, and does not now depend upon it for its enforcement. The whole system of trade-mark property and the civil remedies for its protection existed long anterior to that act, and have remained in full force since its passage. These propositions are so well understood as to require neither the citation of authorities nor an elaborate argument to prove them.' It follows beyond all doubt that the validity of the decree heretofore rendered against the defendant is in no wise affected by the decision of the supreme court holding the trade-mark legislation of Congress to be unconstitutional."

In McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245, Clifford, J., said: "Protection for lawful trade-marks may be obtained by individuals, firms, or corporations entitled to the same, if they comply with the requirements prescribed by the act of Congress. . . . Equity gives relief in such a case, upon the ground that one man is not allowed to offer his goods for sale, representing them to be the manufacture of another trader in the same commodity. . . . Everywhere courts of justice proceed upon the ground that a party has a valuable interest in the good-will of his trade, and in the labels or trade-mark which he adopts to enlarge and perpetuate it. Hence it is held that he, as proprietor, is entitled to protection as against one who attempts to deprive him of the benefits resulting from the same, by using his labels and trade-mark without his consent and authority. . . . Chancery protects trade-marks upon the ground that a party shall not be permitted to sell his own goods as the goods of another; and, therefore, he will not be allowed to use the names, marks, letters, or other indicia of another, by which he may pass off his own goods to purchasers as the manufacture of another."

In Wolfe v. Barnett, 24 La. Ann. 97 (appeal from trial by jury), Howe, J. (quoting from Upton on Trade-Marks, p. 97), said: "The honest, skillful and industrious manufacturer or enterprising merchant, who has produced or brought into the market an article of use or consumption, that has found favor with the public, and who, by affixing to it some name, mark, device or symbol, which serves to distinguish it as his, and to distinguish it from all others, has furnished his individual guaranty and assurance of the quality and integrity of the manufacture, shall receive the first reward of his honesty, skill, industry or enterprise; and shall in no manner and to no extent be deprived of the same by another, who, to that end, appropriates and applies to his productions the same or a colorable imitation of the same name, mark, device, or symbol, so that the public are, or may be, deceived or misled into the purchase of the productions of one, supposing them to be those of the other."

Plaintiff was the proprietor of "Charter Oak" stoves, and R. & Co., apparently the real defendants, registered, under the state statute, the same trade-mark for stoves, claiming thereby the exclusive right thereto. Currier, J., said: "A glance at the statute, however, shows that it was intended for no such purpose. It was not designed in the slightest particular to weaken or abridge any existing rights, or any future right, to a trade-mark which might be acquired in the usual way, or to legalize, in any form or measure, piracy in trade-marks. Property in a trade-mark is acquired at common law only by appropriation and use, and then only of such names, words, and devices as may be held to be adapted to point out the true source and origin of the goods to which such marks are applied. . . . The statute has no application to the facts of the present litigation." Filley v. Fassett, 44 Mo. 168; 100 Am. Dec. 275.

In Derringer v. Plate, 29 Cal. 292, Rhodes, J., said: "At common law the remedies for invasions of trade-mark remedies, a statute exists in England requiring registration of trade-marks, and creating adequate criminal remedies for infringement.¹ In the United States, a national registration act was passed in 1881,² and many of the states have statutes creating criminal remedies for the infringement of trade-marks.³

b. OF UNITED STATES COURTS.—The United States courts have all the jurisdiction of common-law courts of law and equity in controversies between citizens of different states, or between citizens of a foreign nation and those of the United States.⁴ They are also given special jurisdiction of controversies between citizens of the same state, where the controversy arises out of the infringement of a trade-mark legally registered under the Trade-Mark Registration Act of 1881, 21 Stat. at Large, ch. 138, where the goods of the defendant in controversy, bearing the property were an action at law for the recovery of damages, and an injunction, in which case pecuniary compensation might be incidentally awarded. Several of the states have, by statute, added a criminal prosecution as a further remedy or protection. The remedies at common law are still left by our statute in those cases where the trade-mark has not been registered according to the act, for not only is the right of property recognized and affirmed as it existed at common law, and the common-law remedies are not taken away, but the protection afforded by suits at law and bills for injunctions is expressly conceded. These provisions add nothing to the rights previously possessed by the owner of the trade-mark, and are only in affirmance of the common law. But he does not have the aid of a criminal prosecution for his protection. On the other hand, those owning trade-marks, who have filed their claims and affidavits and paid the fees, have the protection according to the other class of cases, and have also that arising from the criminal prosecutions, with penalties, upon conviction, of more than usual severity."

In McAndrew v. Bassett, 4 De G. J. & S. 380, the Lord Chancellor said: "It is impossible to say that a case so circumstanced has not all the elements of a case which requires the interposition of this court. There is the deliberate imitation of a mark previously existing in the market. The thing is done in order that the rival article of the defendants' manufacture may be brought into the market in competition with that which is already there. There is nothing, in a word, which is necessary for the interposition of the court which is wanting on the present occasion."

In Kinahan v. Bolton, 15 Ir. Eq. N. S. 75, suit was brought to restrain an infringement of a trade-mark. The Lord Chancellor said: "In such suits, in order to found the jurisdiction of this court, there must be established, first, the existence of the trade-mark; next, the fact of an imitation, whether a direct imitation, or one with such variations that the court must regard them as merely colorable; and thirdly, the fact that the imitations were made without license, or anything that this court could regard as acquiescence in their use."

In Barrows v. Knight, 6 R. I. 434; 78 Am. Dec. 452, Ames, C. J., said: "It never could have been a question that a designed imitation by the defendant of a trade-mark of the plaintiff, whereby the former fraudulently passed off his goods in the market as goods manufactured by the latter and to his injury, would support an action. Indeed, such a concurrence of fraud and injury constitutes the most flagrant form of this species of wrong; and this court can with no justice be said to have intimated the contrary, when it recognized in Davis v. Kendall, 2 R. I. 570, that equity would restrain the invasion of a trade-mark as well when the consequence of mistake, as when contrived of fraud."

registered trade-mark unlawfully, are intended to be transported abroad. The jurisdiction is based upon interference with plaintiff's foreign commerce, and the United States courts have no jurisdiction, unless the wrongful use of the registered trade-mark be proven to have occurred beyond the United States or in trade with an Indian tribe.¹ The acts of Congress of 1870 and 1876,

1. In Graveley v. Graveley, 42 Fed. Rep. 265, Bond, J., said: "If it be admitted that the complainants are entitled to the exclusive use of the trade-marks mentioned in the bill otherwise than by act of Congress—a matter which, in our view of the case, it is not necessary to determine—and that the defendants have used them upon tobacco of their manufacture without the consent of the complainants, they do not derive that right of exclusive use from any statute of the United States. Their right, under the laws of the United States, is the right to use these registered trade-marks in foreign commerce, Act March 3d, 1881 (21 U. S. Stat. at Large 502). The bill in this case nowhere asserts that the defendants have used these registered trade-marks in foreign commerce, nor does the proof show a single instance of such a use on their part. Under these circumstances, since the parties to the suit are citizens of the same state, and since the only right guaranteed to complainants by the laws of the United States is the right to use exclusively their registered trade-marks in foreign commerce, which right it is not alleged the defendants have infringed, it seems the court is without jurisdiction in the matter. The complainants may be entitled to the exclusive use of these registered trade-marks at common law, or under some state statute, and, if they were citizens of different states, might possibly file this bill here; but, under the state of facts above set forth, we think the bill must be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, and it is so ordered."

In Ryder v. Holt, 128 U. S. 525; Cox Man. of Trade-Mark Cases 708, Fuller, C. J., said: "It is now assigned for error that, as defendant and complainants below were citizens of the same state, and the bill did not allege that the trade-mark in controversy was 'used on goods intended to be transported to a foreign country:' Act of March 3d, 1881, ch. 138, § 11; 21 Stat. at L. 502, the circuit court had no jurisdiction, and the decree must be reversed for that reason. The objection

In Schumacher v. Schwencke, 26 Fed. Rep. 818, suit was brought to restrain an infringement of a registered trade-mark. Both parties were citizens of the same state. Wheeler, J., said: "The courts of the United States have no jurisdiction of suits like this, unless it is given by statute under which the trade-mark was registered. Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82; Luyties v. Hollender, 21 Fed. Rep. 281. That statute limits the jurisdiction under it so that it is not conferred, 'unless the trade-mark in controversy is used on goods intended to be transported to a foreign country, or in lawful commercial intercourse with an Indian tribe.' It seems to be understood by the orator's counsel that jurisdiction is given if the trade-mark is used by the orator in foreign commerce, or upon goods intended to be transported to a foreign country. But the authority of Congress over this subject arises from the power to regulate commerce, and does not extend to the protection of trade-marks within a state. Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82. The orator may have a valid trade-mark, and an exclusive right to its use in New York; but, if so, his rights in that respect do not rest upon the laws of the United States. The registration under the statute only confers a right to it in foreign commerce, and a claim for infringement, or to be protected against infringement, cannot arise under the constitution or law of the United States, unless the infringement is upon the right to use it in foreign commerce, which can only be by using the trade-mark without right in such commerce. The jurisdiction is not conferred at all by express words of the statute; but only by providing a mode of acquiring a right, a suit for the invasion of which would arise under the laws of the United States within the act of 1875. The clause quoted from is restrictive of that jurisdiction. . . . This court appears to be without jurisdiction to restrain the use which is alleged."

creating a criminal remedy for the infringement of trade-marks, and giving the United States courts jurisdiction of such cases, have been held to be void, in that they were so framed that their provisions were applicable to all commerce, and could not be confined to that property subject to the control of Congress.¹

The jurisdiction depending upon difference of citizenship is limited to cases involving $2,000 and upwards,² but in cases based upon the registration statute, the jurisdiction is independent of the amount in controversy.³ Suit must be brought in the district of which the defendant is an inhabitant, and in the case of corporations, in the state of its organization.⁴

c. OF STATE COURTS.—The courts of law and equity of the several states of the United States have all of the common-law jurisdiction of the courts of law and equity in England,⁵ and in 22 Fed. Rep. 823; Cox's Man. of Trade-Mark Cases 695, Wallace, J., said: "But both parties are citizens of this state, and the jurisdiction invoked is, therefore, founded solely on the act of Congress for the protection of trade-marks, and can only be exercised according to the statute which invests the court with authority to hear the controversy. The complainant is here upon his statutory title to enforce his statutory rights in the enjoyment of his trade-marks, and the single question is, therefore, whether these have been invaded. If the defendant has appropriated either of these trade-marks, the complainant, as the party aggrieved, by the language of the act (section 7), 'shall have his remedy according to the course of equity to enjoin the wrongful use of such trade-mark.' . . . The defendant insists that his certificate of registry is a decision of the commissioner of patents that he is entitled to use the word 'Maizharina,' in connection with his picture, as a trade-mark, notwithstanding the complainant's trade-mark is the word 'Maizena;' which is a judicial determination, and is conclusive as between the parties. The sufficient answer to this proposition is that the act of Congress makes the registration of a trade-mark only prima facie evidence of ownership. . . . In this view, the only office of a registration is to confer jurisdiction upon the court to protect a trade-mark when the proprietor has obtained the statutory evidence of title, and the only function of the commissioner of patents is to determine whether an applicant has a presumptive right to the trade-mark."

In Luyties v. Hollender, 21 Fed. Rep. 281, Wheeler, J., said: "Rights and remedies pertaining to trade-marks, generally depend upon the laws of the state, common and statutory, and not upon the laws of the United States. Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82. The laws of the United States now in force, under which this trade-mark was registered, relate only to trade-marks specially used in commerce with foreign nations, or with the Indian tribes. Act of March 3d, 1881 (21 Stat. at Large, ch. 137, § 1). They are particularly restricted so as not to give cognizance to any court of the United States in an action or suit between citizens of the same state, unless the trade-mark in controversy is used on goods intended to be transported to a foreign country, or in lawful commercial intercourse with an Indian tribe. Id., § 11."

The act of Congress assuming to confer exclusive jurisdiction upon the federal courts in trade-mark cases, has been pronounced unconstitutional. U. S. v. Steffens, 100 U. S. 82; *Leidersdorf v. addition thereto, in many states, they have a certain criminal jurisdiction conferred by local statutes.¹

d. CRIMINAL REMEDY.—In 1870, Congress passed a trade-mark registration act.² In 1876, an act was passed providing a criminal remedy for the infringement of trade-marks registered under the acts of Congress.³ In 1879, the act of 1870 was declared void by the Supreme Court of the United States,⁴ and the court also said that the act of 1876 fell with that of 1870. In 1881, Congress passed another registration act in accordance with the suggestions of the supreme court in the decision just referred to.⁵ The circuit court of the United States,⁶ following the obiter of Trade-Mark Cases 629). "These decisions settle the question, and, beyond all doubt, settle it correctly, since Congress has no more power to deprive the state courts of jurisdiction in trade-mark cases than it would have to deprive them of power to decide controversies concerning any other species of property. A trade-mark is not within the provisions of the federal constitution respecting copyrights and patents."

6. In U. S. v. Koch, 40 Fed. Rep. 250, Brewer, J., said: "This is an indictment under the trade-mark statutes of the United States. . . . The history of trade-mark legislation is this: In 1870, Congress passed a statute providing for the registration of trade-marks—a statute general in its operation. In 1876, it passed another statute imposing penalties for trespass upon rights obtained by the registering of trade-marks. Under those statutes, indictments were found, and on a certificate of division of opinion between the district and circuit judges, cases came to the supreme court, and in what is known as the Trade-mark Cases, reported in 100 U. S. 82, the supreme court decided that the act of 1870 was beyond the power of Congress. It suggested in the opinion that under the 'commerce clause,' perhaps, Congress had the power to legislate with reference to trade-marks used in commerce between this country and foreign nations, between the states, and with the Indian tribes. Immediately thereafter the act of 1881 was passed by Congress, providing for the registering of trade-marks which might be used in foreign commerce, and commerce with the Indian tribes. It did not re-enact the penal statute of 1876, and the act of 1881 contains no direct reference to that penal statute. Now, the contention of the government is, that although the act of 1870 had no existence, never had any, having been declared beyond the power of Congress, and although by reason of that fact the penal statute of 1876 had nothing upon which it could operate, yet it stood as a valid enactment, suspended in operation until the act of 1881, providing for trade-mark registration, when it was verified, and became an act imposing penalties for trespass upon rights given by the act of 1881. In the Trade-Mark Cases, Mr. Justice Miller closed the opinion of the court with some reference to the penal statute of 1876, and his language is this: 'While we have, in our references in this opinion to the trade-mark legislation of Congress, had mainly in view the act of 1870, and the civil remedy which that act provides, it was because the criminal offenses described in the act of 1876 are, by their express terms, solely referable to frauds, counterfeits, and unlawful use of trade-marks which were registered under the provisions of the former act. If that act is unconstitutional, so that the registration under it confers no lawful right, then the criminal enactment intended to protect that right falls with it.' Now, that language is general, comprehensive, and if taken in its ordinary meaning, and as respecting a matter then rightfully before and rightfully passed upon by the supreme court, it is a decision of that court that the penal act of 1876 fell with the civil act of 1870. . . . It would not be doubted that if an act were passed giving a statutory right, and in the same act was a section imposing penalties for trespass thereupon, when the portion of the act giving the right fell, the whole statute would fall. And is the rule any different when the penal provisions are in an independent statute enacted by a subsequent legislature? Of course, statutes having reference to the same subject-matter, though enacted at different times, are to be considered as in pari materia, and this is thus laid down by Dwaris in his work on statutes (Potter's Dwaris' Statutes), p. 189: 'It is therefore an established rule of law that all acts in pari materia are to be taken together as if they were one law; and they are directed to be compared in the construction of statutes, because they are considered as framed upon one system, and having one object in view;' citing certain cases. 'If one statute prohibit the doing a thing, and another statute be afterwards made whereby a forfeiture is inflicted upon the person doing that thing, both are considered as one statute.' Stradling v. Morgan, 1 Plow. 206. That fits this case. Where the right is created by one statute, and the penalty inflicted by a subsequent, they are to be considered as one statute. . . . Again, when the act of 1881 was passed, if Congress had intended that penalty should be imposed for a trespass upon the rights conferred by that statute, or if it had intended that the act of 1876 should be revived and operate upon the act of 1881, it was very easy to say so. Its silence in this respect is cogent evidence that it did not understand or intend that the penal statute should be considered a part of present and valid law. And that assumption is strengthened by the fact that it had before it for consideration this passage from the opinion of the supreme court, in which it is broadly stated that the act of 1876 had fallen with the act of 1870. Whatever may be true as to the full meaning of that decision, or as to the general power of Congress to impose penalties for trespasses upon rights having no existence, it had before it the general affirmation by the court that the law of 1876 had fallen, and it must be assumed that if it meant that it should stand and be revived, or that any penalties should be imposed for violations of the law of 1881, it would have so stated."

In U. S. v. Braum, U. S. v. Sohn, 39 Fed. Rep. 775, Thayer, J., said: "These are indictments under section 1 of the act of Aug. 14th, 1876, to punish counterfeiting of trade-marks that have been registered in accordance with the laws of the United States. . . . The law was evidently designed to punish those who, with fraudulent intent, pirated a valid trade-mark which has been duly registered by the commissioner of patents. If a person, by any means, secures the registration of a mark, symbol, word, or device, claiming it to be a trade-mark, which, according to the rules of the common law, is not a valid trade-mark, another person who affixes the same mark, symbol, or device to his own goods, and sells them, cannot be punished under the penal statute above quoted. . . . Admission to registration under the act of March 3d, 1881, is merely an admission on the part of the government that the applicant for registration is the owner of a valid trade-mark. The certificate of registration granted by the commissioner is only prima facie evidence of that fact, but it does not conclude a third party. . . . Necessarily, therefore, in a criminal proceeding under the act of Aug. 14th, 1876, the question whether the trade-mark involved (it having been admitted to registration) is valid, is an issuable question. . . . An indictment ought to allege facts showing the existence of a valid trade-mark, as well as the fact that registration has been obtained, inasmuch as the registration does not create a trade-mark. . . . Without such averments, a criminal offense is not stated with sufficient certainty. It is claimed by defendants' counsel that the indictments are bad for various other reasons, and among the number, because the trade-mark law of July 8th, 1870, was void, Congress having no power to pass such a law, as was held in the Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82, and because at the time of the enactment of the penal act of Aug. 14th, 1876, under which the indictments are drawn, there was nothing upon which that act could operate, and it was, therefore, nugatory, and remained inoperative, even after the passage of the act of March 3d, 1881, supra. It is unnecessary, however, at this time to express any opinion concerning the novel question thus raised, as the indictments must be held bad for the reasons heretofore indicated. Demurrer sustained."

dicta of the supreme court, has held the act of 1876 to be inoperative.¹

Most of the states have statutes which provide a criminal remedy for the infringement of trade-marks; some limit the remedy to trade-marks registered under the local statute, others do not.

2. Parties—a. ALIENS (AS PLAINTIFFS).—Recent cases² in the

1. As stated in the text, the supreme court and circuit court have held that the act of Aug. 14th, 1876, is void, for the reason that it fell with the act of 1870, which was unconstitutional. This holding is based upon the ground that the act of 1870, creating the right to register, and the act of 1876, providing a remedy for infringement of registered trade-marks, were practically one statute, and when the first was declared unconstitutional the second fell with it. We are unable to yield an assent to this conclusion. If the act of 1870 was unconstitutional and void, it never existed as a valid act of Congress, and must therefore be considered as never having been passed. This leaves the question to be simply, "Had Congress the power to pass the act of 1876, entirely independent of all other legislation?" This power has never been questioned, and we have no doubt that Congress had such power. We have no doubt that if the act of 1876 had been passed in 1882, that it would be held to be entirely valid. The objections to the act of 1876 urged by the circuit court are three: First, that it has been held invalid by the supreme court. Second, that, had Congress intended it to apply to the act of 1881, they would have said so. Third, an act creating a remedy cannot be sustained independently of an existing right or statute creating a right. With reference to the first objection, it may be said that the supreme court has no power to declare a law void, if it was clearly within the power of Congress to enact it; and further, the expressions of the supreme court on this subject, in The Trade-Mark Cases 100 U. S. 82, are in the nature of dicta, for while the cases did arise on indictments under this act of 1876, the act expressly creates the criminal remedy for the infringement of trade-marks registered under the statutes of the United States, and if there was no valid statute, as the court held to be the case, there could be no valid indictment, entirely independent of the question of whether the criminal statute was void or valid. Hence, any expressions of the court with reference to the validity of the act of 1876, were mere dicta. With reference to the second objection, we would say that no intention of Congress in passing the act of 1881, can affect the question, for the reason that if every member of Congress fully believed, when the act of 1881 was passed, that the act of 1876 was void, and omitted to re-enact it in the act of 1881 intentionally, no such intention or belief on the part of Congress could in the slightest degree affect the validity of the act of 1876. If it was valid when passed, it must be valid to-day. With reference to the third question, the cases indicate that statutes passed under similar circumstances have been sustained. See Devar 529; White v. Bost, 2 T. R. 274. Suspension of an act is not a repeal of it. Brown v. Barry, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 364; Burnside v. U. S., 7 Cranch (U. S.) 382; *Rogers v. 2. In Richter v. Anchor Remedy Co., 52 Fed. Rep. 455, Acheson, C. J., said: "We do not perceive any basis for the claim that, independently of his United States registrations, the plaintiff had acquired, as against the defendants, a common-law right to the exclusive use in the United States of the word 'Anchor' and its symbol, in connection with the manufacture and sale of medical compounds. As we have seen, prior to his first registration, the plaintiff had never sold in the United States any of his medicines. Nor had he himself made any importations thereof before that registration. Hav-

United States have established the rule that a foreigner, who has never introduced his goods or conducted trade in the United States, nor used his trade-mark in connection therewith, no matter how extensive his trade-mark rights or the extent of his trade abroad, cannot be considered as having any common-law trade-mark rights in the United States, except so far as these rights may be effected by the International Convention, Article 8.¹ An alien, however, who has sold his goods and used his trade-mark in the United States, enjoys all the rights of the citizens, both as to common-law rights and under the registration statutes.² The English rule at common law was different, but since the statutes of 1875

ing, then, no trade in this country, we do not see how the plaintiff could well have here a common-law trade-mark."

2. In La Croix v. May, 15 Fed. Rep. 236, Wallace, J., said: "The fact that complainant is an alien does not affect his right of property in a trade-mark; but that fact, as it establishes the requisite diversity of citizenship between the parties to confer jurisdiction upon this (i. e. a U. S. Cir. Ct.) court, is indispensable to the cause of action alleged."

State v. Gibbs, 56 Mo. 133, was an indictment under the Missouri Act approved Feb. 22d, 1870 (Adj. Sess. Acts 1870), entitled, "An act to protect merchants and manufacturers against counterfeit trade-marks." The indictment charged the defendant with having in his possession a brand and printed wrapper for the purpose of using the same upon a certain article made by the defendant, and palming the same off as the wares of Lea & Perrin, of the city of London, England. Wagner, J., said: "There is a well-known right of property in a trade-mark, which the law will protect, and which it was not the intention of the statute to abridge. The citizens of foreign states will be protected in their rights of property in trade-marks in our courts, the same as our own citizens."

In Davis v. Kennedy, 13 Grant Ch. (Up. Can.) 523, plaintiffs were citizens of the United States and sued Kennedy for infringement of the trade-mark "Perry Davis' Painkiller." Spragge, V. C., said: "Their (the plaintiffs') right at common law, seems to be clear, the right of an alien friend standing upon the same footing as that of a subject."

Taylor v. Carpenter, 2 Woodb. & M. (U. S.) 1, was an action on the case, brought by the plaintiffs, citizens of Great Britain, against a citizen of Massachusetts, for imitating, and using the trade-marks of the plaintiffs, on thread of the defendant, and selling large quantities thereof. Woodbury, J., said: "The first inquiry under this head is, whether the subject-matter here is one over which this court has jurisdiction, and can be prosecuted here at all by an alien friend. Being an action for a tort or wrong to a foreigner, gives to this court general jurisdiction. But being an action for a particular kind of wrong, an injurious deceit to the damage of the plaintiffs, practised here, though they live abroad, is said to give them no cause of action. . . . In the next place, in this country, proceedings have been sustained in favor of aliens, as to their marks, as well as citizens, holding that the former have all the rights in such personal matters here, as citizens against forgery and deceit, and can resort to this court for their protection. . . . Here the wrong was committed, and the defendant found here. . . . I am not satisfied, then, that the judge at the trial did wrong in not charging on this point as desired by the defendants. The cannibal of the Fejees may sue here in a personal action, though having no court at home for us to resort to. . . . But an alien is not now regarded as 'the outside barbarian,' he is considered in China, and the struggle in all commercial countries has been to enlarge his privileges and powers as to all matters of property and trade. It was one of the grievances of Magna Charta, and 1883, registration is necessary to support an action,¹ except so far as a commercial name is concerned, which is protected under Article 8, of the International Convention of which Great Britain is a member.

as well as the Declaration of Independence, that the naturalization of foreigners had been too much obstructed (4 Elliott's Debates, 167). . . . The progress of civilization and commerce, and the whole character of our civilization and laws are more and more friendly to foreigners, regarding them more as brethren of one blood and origin and hope rather than barbarians and enemies. . . . Comity and courtesy are due to all friendly strangers, rather than imposition or pillage. Taking their marks and using them as and for theirs, to their damage, is like preying on a visitor, or inhospitably plundering a wreck on shore. To elevate our own character as a nation and the purity of our judicial tribunals, it seems to me we ought to go as far in the redress of and punishment of these deceptions as can be vindicated on any sound principle."

See Taylor v. Carpenter, 3 Story (U. S.) 458, where there was a bill in equity for an injunction. The plaintiffs were subjects of Great Britain, and alleged that the defendant had manufactured and sold thread of inferior quality, and put up in envelopes resembling exactly the spools, labels, devices, trade-marks and envelopes used by complainants. Story, J., said: "But in the courts of the United States, under the constitution and laws, they are entitled, being alien friends, to the same protection of their rights as citizens. There is no pretense to say, that if a similar false imitation and use of the labels of a citizen put upon his own manufactured articles, had been designedly and fraudulently perpetrated and acted upon, it would not have been an invasion of his rights, for which our law would have granted ample redress. There is no difference between the case of a citizen and that of an alien friend, where his rights are openly violated."

In Taylor v. Carpenter, 11 Paige (N. Y.) 296; 2 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 603; 42 Am. Dec. 114, the Chancellor said: "The fact that the complainants are subjects of another government, and that the defendant is a citizen of the United States, as stated in the answer, cannot alter the rights of the parties, or deprive the complainants of the favorable interposition of this court, if those rights have been violated by the defendant. So far as the subject-matter of this suit is concerned, there is no difference between citizens and aliens."

1. The Collins Co., of Hartford, Connecticut, filed a bill in England against Reeves, charging that he had imitated their marks on edge tools. Stuart, V. C., said: "The plaintiffs, if they had an exclusive right to the use of the trade-marks in question, were entitled to the protection of this court in the enjoyment of such use. Though they were aliens, they were entitled to sue in this court against any fraudulent invasion of their rights, and that notwithstanding the tools were stamped with the marks, the fraudulent use of which was complained of, were not usually sold by them in this country." Collins Co. v. Reeves, 28 L. J. Ch. 56; 4 Jur. N. S. 865.

Collins Co. v. Brown, 3 K. & J. 423; 3 Jur. N. S. 929; 29 L. T. 245, was a suit by a Connecticut corporation against a subject of Great Britain. Wood, V. C., said: "The point raised by this demurrer depends upon the question whether this is a personal right or not. If it be personal, the injured party may obtain a remedy against the defendant in the country where he resides, wherever the injury may have been done. The complaint is, that a fraud has been committed by the defendant by using the trade-mark of the plaintiff, and thus representing that the goods manufactured by himself were manufactured by the plaintiff. . . . The simple question in these cases is, 'Has the plaintiff, by the appropriation of a particular mark, fixed in the market where his goods are sold a conviction that the goods so marked were manufactured by him?' and if so, and if no one else has been in the habit of using that mark, another man has not the right to use that mark, so as to commit the fraudulent act of palming off his own goods as being the goods of the person who is known to have been in the habit of using it. . . . If a man has been in the habit of using a particular mark for his goods for a long time, during which no one else has used a similar mark, and then another person begins to use the same mark, that can only be

b. VENDORS (AS DEFENDANTS).—A vendor of a spurious article, who knows it to be spurious, is a contributor to the fraud, and makes himself liable to an action for an injunction and damages and profits. If he sells it to another, accompanied by the statement that it is spurious, he cannot relieve himself, for the purchaser may not be so frank when he comes to sell the article.¹ But even ignorance of the fact that an article is spurious will not protect a vendor against an injunction; if, however, he stops at once upon being notified, the plaintiff generally cannot recover costs.² with a fraudulent intent; and any fraud may be redressed in the country in which it is committed, whatever may be the country of the person who has been defrauded." See also Collins Co. v. Cohen, 3 K. & J. 428.

1. In Low v. Hart, 90 N. Y. 457, Rapallo, J., said: "Although the proof does not establish an infringement by the defendant to any great extent, yet we think that where it is shown that a dealer has the imitated article in his store, and offers it for sale as genuine, even though but a single sale is proved, that is sufficient to sustain an injunction against a continuance of the wrong, and that an action for such injunction will not be defeated solely on the ground that on the day it is brought, the dealer happens not to have any of the article on hand."

In Coats v. Holbrook, 2 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 586, the Assistant Vice-Chancellor said: "In this case the attempted imposition upon the public by the manufacturer of the simulated article, is too barefaced to be questioned. The defendants are merely vendors of the spurious goods, and they suppose that they are, on various grounds, exempted from the consequences which would be visited upon the manufacturer. Thus it is said that they have not used the trade-marks of the complainants; that they merely sold for McGregor on commission, in the usual course of their business, and have acted in perfect good faith. . . . Knowing all these things, they sold it, and so far as they could, put it in the way of imposing upon and swindling the community. But it is said that upon their sale to the jobber, by whom it was to be again sold to the retailer, the defendants told the jobber, truly, that it was an imitation of Coats' thread; in short, that they sold it as a spurious article. But what then? Did they imagine that the jobber would be equally frank and communicative to the retail merchants and shopkeepers, and that every one of the latter would carefully inform every customer who bought a spool, that the thread was an imitation of Coats', made in New Jersey, and only three cord instead of six? The idea is preposterous. Trade-marks, names, labels, etc., are not forged, counterfeited, or imitated, with any such honest design or expectation. McGregor's thread was labeled and stamped with Coats' name and marks, so that it might be palmed off upon the customer as being made by Coats, and every man who sold it, whether he made five per cent. or fifty per cent. by the operation, lent himself to the perpetration of the fraud."

The plaintiff Gout had been accustomed to manufacture watches for the Turkish market, and to engrave upon the inside in Turkish characters his name, and the word "Pessendede," which signifies warranted or approved. The defendant afterwards got Messrs. Parkinson to manufacture watches for him, on which there were engraved in Turkish characters the words "Ralph Gout" and "Pessendede," which the defendant consigned to Constantinople, and sold there to the prejudice of the plaintiff's trade. The vice chancellor granted an injunction, restraining Aleploghi from sending or permitting to go to Constantinople and Turkey, or to any other place, and from selling and disposing of any watches with the name of the plaintiff thereon in Turkish characters, or any watches in imitation of the plaintiff's watches. Gout v. Aleploghi, 6 Beav. 69, n.

2. In Moet v. Couston, 10 L. T. N. S. 395, the Master of the Rolls said: "If a man manufactures goods himself and puts upon them the trade-mark of another, though he may not know to whom that trade-mark belongs, he must at least know that he has himself no right to the mark. That knowledge

c. PRINTERS OF LABELS AND MARKS (AS DEFENDANTS).—A trade-mark owner has a right to prohibit any act, the direct purpose and logical result of which is to enable others to palm off spurious goods on the public as and for his goods. A printer may be enjoined from printing and selling labels, which are fraudulent copies of those of a trade-mark owner, without his consent.¹

makes him liable to account for the profits he may have realized by his conduct. But if a man buys goods from a third party, believing them to be genuine, while in fact they are spurious, it is not until he has been told that they are so, that he can be considered to be guilty of any fraud, or to be liable to render any account. In the present case the plaintiffs have failed to establish any such knowledge on the part of the defendants, and if, on the filing of the bill, the defendants had offered the plaintiffs their costs, and the plaintiffs had persevered with their suit, I should have given the defendants their subsequent costs. As it is, however, the plaintiffs can only be held to be entitled to an injunction."

1. Complainant, who was a manufacturer of cigars, and a member of the Cigarmakers' International Union of America, filed a bill to restrain defendants, who were not members thereof, from making and selling counterfeits of the union labels, with the alleged attempt to defraud complainant and the public. Thayer, J., said: "It is true that the bill does not show that the defendants have affixed any of the spurious labels to cigars of their own manufacture, or that they have sold any cigars bearing the counterfeit certificates or labels. But this is not important. From the fact that they have made and sold spurious labels and advertised them for sale the court must presume that defendants intend that they shall be used on cigar boxes by the persons who buy them, and that they manufacture and sell them for that purpose. The conduct of the defendants is equally as culpable as that of the manufacturers of cigars who buy and use the spurious labels, and the loss which complainant sustains by the use of the same on cigar boxes is as directly attributable to the persons who make and sell the counterfeit labels, as to the dealers in cigars who buy and use them." Carson v. Ury, 39 Fed. Rep. 777.

In Du Kuyper v. Witteman, 23 Fed. Rep. 871, Wallace, J., said: "Upon the allegations of the bill, the defendants are actively engaged in assisting third persons to use the complainants' trade-mark in violation of their rights. The mere act of printing and selling labels in imitation of the complainants' might be innocent, and without evidence of an illicit purpose, would not be a violation of the complainants' rights. It is otherwise, however, when this is done with the obvious purpose of enabling others by the use of the labels to palm off their goods upon the public as the goods of the complainants."

In People v. Molins (N. Y. Co. Ct.), 10 N. Y. Supp. 130 (Ct. Gen. Sess.); 7 N. Y. Crim. Rev. 51, defendant was indicted and convicted for counterfeiting a trade-mark by printing copies of the labels used by the owners of the trade-mark, and also putting on the labels the name of the printer of the original. He was found in possession of counterfeits of other labels, showing his knowledge of the fraudulent use to which the labels were to be put. See charge of presiding judge in report of case.

In Colman v. Crump, 70 N. Y. 573, plaintiffs had, seventeen years before the bringing of the action, adopted, and from that time used, as their trade-mark, and to distinguish mustard of their manufacture from all others in the markets of this country, as well as other parts of the world, the symbol or device of a bull's head; and it had become a well-known sign and mark of their mustard, and had not before then been adopted or used as a trade-mark for the same article of merchandise by any one. Since the year 1860, defendant had been engaged in engraving, printing, and selling labels designed and intended to be affixed to packages of mustard for sale and consumption, not the product or manufacture of the plaintiffs. All the labels so engraved, printed, and sold by the defendant had been and were still in use by dealers in mustard and attached to mustard other than the plaintiffs', and kept for sale in various parts of the United States. The court found the following conclusions of law, which were approved on appeal: That the plaintiffs are entitled to the exclusive use of the figure of a bull's head as a trade-mark on labels attached to mustard; that the engraving, printing, and selling of labels by the defendant, to be attached to packages of mustard, whether put up in tins, bottles, or otherwise howsoever, are violations of the plaintiffs' rights; that the plaintiffs are entitled to a perpetual injunction against the defendant, as demanded by them in their complaint.

In Farina v. Silverlock, 1 K. & J. 514; 3 Eq. Rep. 886; 24 L. J. Ch. 632, Pagewood, V. C., said: "The bill does not contain a distinct statement that the defendant sold the labels for the purpose there mentioned, but only that parties purchased them for that purpose. But if it be stated that the defendant is manufacturing that which is known to be the trade-mark which the plaintiff alone has the right to use, and the use of which on the goods of a third party would be a fraud upon the plaintiff; and that the defendant is selling such labels to any one who asks for them, and is thus scattering over the world the means of enabling parties to commit frauds upon the plaintiff, and that such frauds have been committed; that is, I think, a sufficient averment to entitle the plaintiff to an injunction. The ground of the jurisdiction being fraud, if the defendant be committing fraud, either by selling goods under the plaintiffs' trade-mark, or enabling others to do so by distributing the means of doing so, it cannot be said that this court has no power to interfere by injunction to arrest the evil at its source, without compelling the plaintiff to wait until the whole fraud is brought to a completion by the sale of the goods."

1. It has been held that the individual members, who are merely workmen, making an article for a manufacturer, cannot enforce the trade-mark rights of the association in which they are interested, and of which they are members; but that a manufacturer who is a member, or whose workmen are members, and who has used the association trade-mark and built up a valuable trade thereby, has a right to complain of a rival manufacturer or dealer who puts the same class of merchandise on the market bearing the association trade-mark without the license of the association, and thereby injures the trade of his rival. It is doubtful, however, if this view can be maintained, for since the leading case of New York, etc., Cement Co. v. Copley Cement Co., 45 Fed. Rep. 212, a trade-mark owner, to maintain an action, must have an exclusive title to the trade-mark. It might be said that the general association had the exclusive title, but of the cases which have been brought by such associations, the well-considered ones have held that the association and its members could not maintain an action, because they are not manufacturers and put no goods on the market, and the trade-mark does not and cannot point to the origin and ownership of the goods upon which it is used. The goods are not the property of the association, nor are they sold by it or its members. There is also another reason why an association, such as the cigarmakers' union, should not be allowed to use a label. It would appear to be against public policy, because it enables the members of the union and their allied trades unions to boycott an honest and equally skillful manufacturer or dealer, by instructing all members not to purchase any goods which do not bear the union label. This course of action destroys competition, and takes an unfair advantage of those who are with honesty and industry seeking to do a legitimate business in a staple article.

In Bloete v. Simon, 19 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 88, plaintiffs were members of cigarmakers' unions under the jurisdiction of the Cigarmakers' International Union of America. The number of such unions in America exceeds twenty-six thousand. The unions are voluntary unincorporated associations of practical cigarmakers. The plaintiffs sued for an infringement of the label by Simon, who sold cigars not made by the members of the union, and packed in boxes bearing a label, falsely purporting to be issued by the cigarmakers' unions, etc. The case came up on demurrer. O'Gorman, J., said: "The question is, 'Are they entitled to sue on their own behalf and that of others?' The case is provided for, either by section 1919 of the Code, or by sections 446 and 448. It is provided in section 448 that, 'Of the parties to an action, those who are united in interest must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants, except as otherwise prescribed in this act, and where the question is one of a common or general interest of many persons; or where the persons, who might be made parties, are very numerous, and it may be impracticable to bring them all before the court, one or more may sue or defend for the benefit of all.'" See also Strasser v. Moonelis, 55 N. Y. Super. Ct. 197, and People v. Fisher, 3 N. Y. Supp. 786; 50 Hun (N. Y.) 552.

In McVey v. Brendel, 144 Pa. St. 235, Williams, J., said: "The plaintiffs represent neither the Cigarmakers' International Union, the alleged owner of the label, nor Strasser, the officer whose name appears on it, but a subordinate local organization, known as No. 126 located at Ephrata, Lancaster County, Pennsylvania. No. 126 did not devise or register the label, and does not claim to own it, but asserts the ownership of the international organization, to which it is a tributary. . . . The plaintiffs represent Union No. 126, which has no other ownership in or control over the International Union's label, than any others of the hundreds or thousands of subordinate unions scattered over the United States and the Canadas. If it can maintain this bill, then each and every subordinate union can do the same thing, although no one of these devised, registered, or claims to own the trade-mark; and may prevent its use by workmen and in shops which, under the general rules of the international body, are entitled to use it. But we are not disposed to impale this case upon what may be thought to be a technical point. On the other hand, we will consider whether the International Cigarmakers' Union is a trader, whether the label in question is a trade-mark. . . . The organization that devised, registered and owns the label is neither a manufacturer nor dealer, and has no trade in which a trade-mark can be used. The second question would seem to go with the first. Trade-marks are provided for by the act of Congress of July 8th, 1870. Registration is made under it by furnishing a statement, to be recorded in the Patent Office, showing the names of the parties applying for the registration, with their residences and places of business, the class of merchandise, and a description of the goods composing the class by which the trade-mark has been or is intended to be appropriated; together with a description of the trade-mark and fac-similes of it. This provision of the act clearly contemplates an actual business conducted by the person or persons named, the adoption of a trade-mark in that business, and its appropriation to a particular "class of merchandise" produced or sold by the parties making the registration."

In Cigarmakers' Protective Union v. Conhaim, 40 Minn. 243, Gilfillan, C. J., said: "From the allegations of the complaint, it appears that cigarmakers throughout the United States, amounting to many thousand in number, have joined themselves into local associations called 'local unions,' of which this plaintiff is one, it being incorporated for the purpose of such association or union, and that the various local unions are in some way joined together, forming what is called, 'The Cigarmakers' International Union;' and that the latter and the state or local unions have devised and adopted a certain symbol, which the complainant claims to be a legal trade-mark, for the exclusive use and protection of the cigarmakers who are members of such unions, and of those manufacturers and others who employ them. . . . We gather from the complaint that anyone joining any of said local unions thereby acquires the right to use the device; and that his right continues so long as he remains a member of such union. . . . In other words, the symbol indicates only that the person using it is one of the many thousand members of the cigarmakers' union. The right in trade-marks, or the exclusive right to use certain symbols or devices placed upon goods offered for sale, is property. Hence the law affords a remedy to the owner against one who violates the right. A trade-mark consists of a word, mark, or device, adopted by a manufacturer or vendor to distinguish his productions from other productions of the same article. . . . Apply the foregoing definition and essentials of a legal trade-mark to the facts of this case, and it is apparent that the device in question cannot be a trade-mark, and the right to use, as such right is shown by the complaint, is not property, but a mere personal privilege; or, rather, the use of it on cigars is only an advertisement of the fact that the person using it is a member of one of the cigar-makers' unions. . . . It is only to indicate membership in the union. . . . It is true the members of the unions are all engaged in the same kind of business, to wit, the making of cigars. But they are not engaged in business together."

In Schneider v. Williams, 44 N. J. Eq. 391, Van Fleet, V. C., said: "This action is brought by three persons as members of a voluntary association called the Cigarmakers' International Union. . . . Action is brought to protect a right which, it is alleged, is held in common by all the members of the association (i. e., to the exclusive use of a union label). . . . It would appear to be entirely clear, that a person who desires to acquire a right to a trade-mark must do three things, each of which is indispensably requisite to the acquisition of the right. First, he must select or adopt some sign not in use; . . . second, he must apply his mark to some article of traffic; and third, he must put his article, marked with his mark, on the market. Mere adoption of a mark or sign, and a public declaration, by advertisement or otherwise, that a person will, at a subsequent time, put a particular thing on the market, marked or distinguished in a certain way, create no right. Until the thing is actually on the market, marked by the particular mark of the person intending to acquire a title, no property right in the mark arises. Tested by the principle above stated, it would appear to be so clear as to be beyond all controversy, that the complainants have not acquired such a title to the mark in question as will enable them to maintain this action. Without stopping to consider whether it is possible for a voluntary association, not composed of traders, but of skilled workmen, who put nothing on the market but their skill as mechanics, to acquire title to a trade-mark, it is sufficient for present purposes to say, that the case attempted to be made by the bill is fatally defective in an important particular. The defect is this: the bill does not show that the complainants have applied their mark or label to a vendible commodity, of which they are the owners, or in which they trade, and that they have put such commodity, marked with their mark, on the market. Such application and user constitute, according to the established law on this subject, the only foundation on which a title can rest. Without them it is impossible to acquire a title."

Weener v. Brayton, 152 Mass. 101, was an action for an infringement of a label of the International Cigarmakers' Union. Devens, J., said: "We are of opinion that the label, alleged by the bill in the case at bar to have been counterfeited, cannot be treated as a trade-mark. However disreputable and dishonest it may be falsely to represent goods made by other persons to have been made by members of the union, upon which subject there can be but one opinion, those who do not carry on any business to which the use of the label is incident, who have not applied it to any vendible commodity which has been placed upon the market, in which they deal, or of which they are the owners or manufacturers, cannot maintain a bill to restrain the use by the defendants of the label as a trade-mark. It wants many essential elements of such a mark. It does not indicate by what person articles were made, but only membership in a certain association. There is no exclusive use of it, but many persons not connected in business, and unknown to each other, may use it."

The Cigarmakers' International Union of America, an unincorporated association for mutual benefit, adopted a label purporting to be issued by the union, and to be placed on boxes of cigars made by members of the union. Complainant, who was a manufacturer of cigars and a member of the union, filed a bill to restrain defendants, who were not members thereof, from making and selling counterfeits of the union labels, with the alleged attempt to defraud complainant and the public. Thayer, J., says, after citing Cigarmakers' Protective Union v. Conhaim, 40 Minn. 246; and Schneider v. Williams, 44 N. J. Eq. 391: "In both of these cases the bill seems to have been framed upon the theory that the union label was a technical trade-mark, and that, as such, it was the property of the members of the union in the aggregate, and that any one or more members of the union; whether they were, or were not, engaged on their own account in the manufacture and sale of cigars and in the use of the label, might maintain a suit to restrain an unauthorized party from using the label. The decision in each case was adverse to such contention. The bills appear to have been filed by persons, and by an association, who were not engaged in the manufacture and sale of cigars on their own account. Hence, they were not injuriously affected by the fraudulent acts complained of, or, if they were liable to suffer a pecuniary loss to any extent, or at any time in consequence of such acts, the loss to be apprehended was indirect and speculative. It may well be conceded that the plaintiffs in those cases had no such property rights involved as would enable them to maintain, an action, even on the theory on which this decision proceeds. The case at bar differs from those cases, however, in the respect before mentioned, that complainant is himself a manufacturer of cigars, and, according to the averments of the bill, has built up a profitable trade by the use of the union label, which trade has been damaged, and is liable to be further damaged, by the fraudulent acts of the defendants." Carson v. Ury, 39 Fed. Rep. 777.

In State v. Hagen (Ind. 1893), 33 N. E. Rep. 223, Gavin, J., said: "The Cigarmakers' International Union of America is a voluntary, unincorporated association of practical cigarmakers and small manufacturers of cigars. . . . This national body adopted a label to be placed on all boxes containing cigars made by members of the union. . . . It is urged that neither this association nor its members can have any right to protection for this label, because they are only workmen, and not manufacturers or traders. . . . The cases of People v. Fisher, and Bloete v. Simon, take the position that such an association is entitled to hold and be protected in this label as a trade-mark; and it may be urged with considerable force that where the label indicates the origin of the goods, so far as the workmanship is concerned, guaranteeing that they have been made by one of a large association, which has acquired a high reputation for the skill of all its members, this is a sufficient indication of origin, without its pointing out the particular individual from whom it emanated, and that an association may acquire such a general reputation for the high character of its workmanship, as that its mark may be such an assurance of the worth of the goods as makes it a property right in the association or membership in general. . . . We do not here have occasion to determine whether, to enforce this right in equity, an action must necessarily be brought by some member who is actually engaged in manufacturing or selling on his own account, or whether any member who is actually engaged at his trade of making cigars, and is, or is liable to be, specially injured by the use of the false labels, may maintain his action in equity, although it is difficult to perceive why the latter is not, upon principle, the proper view of the law."

The plaintiffs were officers and members of the Cigarmakers' Protective Union, No. 98, of the State of Minnesota, a branch of the Cigarmakers' International Union of America, and filed a bill to restrain defendant from putting up, selling, stamping, or offering for sale any boxes containing any cigars whatever, having placed thereon a label or trade-mark in imitation of plaintiffs' label, and having thereon the words "Union Made Cigars." The defendant demurred upon the grounds that upon the face of the complaint (1) the plaintiffs have not legal capacity to sue, and (2) that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled in the lower court and appeal was taken. The four judges in the appellate court were equally divided upon the question whether the plaintiffs, by their complaint, showed themselves entitled to assert a proprietary claim or interest in the device. The order was therefore affirmed. Allen v. McCarthy, 37 Minn. 349.

1. Plaintiff was engaged in the business of packing and selling fish, and was also a deputy inspector of fish for the city of Portland, Maine. He was accustomed to inspect the fish packed by him in his business, as required by the laws of that state, and to brand upon the packages thereof, a brand, showing his name as deputy inspector and the quality of the fish contained therein. He alleged that the defendants (citizens of Mussachusetts), well knowing the facts stated above, branded a number of packages of fish with a brand precisely similar in appearance to his. The court held: "That upon the facts alleged in the declaration, the mark used by the defendant was his official brand as a public officer, and could not be his private trade-mark, in which he could claim property for his own benefit." Chase v. Mayo, 121 Mass. 343. See also Ex p. South Carolina, 64 Pat. Off. Gaz. 1395.

1. In California Fig Syrup Co. v. Improved Fig Syrup Co., 51 Fed. Rep. 296, McKenna, J., said: "Respondent urges that there is a misjoinder of parties defendant. I do not think so. The bill alleges that the respondents, Bishop et al., are using the corporation but as a means of infringement; that they are substantially the corporation. In the case of Nerve Food Co. v. Baumbach, the Star Bottling Works, a corporation, was joined with the respondent Baumbach, under the same circumstances, the corporation, namely, belonging to him."

In Armstrong v. Savannah Soap Works, 53 Fed. Rep. 124, Speer, D. J., said: "The plaintiffs have brought their bill against the defendants named, and are met by a demurrer. . . . A ground of demurrer is that the directors of the defendant corporation are joined as parties defendant, which, it is insisted, is a misjoinder. . . . The current of authority in this country seems clearly to justify the plaintiff's action in joining the directors. In the case of Poppenhausen v. Falke, 4 Blatchf. (U. S.) 493, it was held that, where persons were acting in concert in infringing a patent, although they act merely as employés of a corporation, they are liable to be sued therefor jointly in one suit. (Also cites Estes v. Worthington, 30 Fed. Rep. 465.) It is true that there is a class of agents—such as mere workmen in the employ of a manufacturer—against whom there can be no recovery, although they may have participated in the acts of infringement; but ordinarily the infringer cannot escape the responsibility by showing that he was acting for another."

In Cuervo v. Henkel, 50 Fed. Rep. 471, Lacombe, J., said: "There is no dispute as to the facts of this case. The complainant, a manufacturer of cigars, is conceded the owner of a trade-mark, which as an entirety is embodied in four separate labels placed inside and outside the boxes containing his cigars. The goods thus marked and put up have obtained a wide celebrity, and for the last twenty-five years have had an extensive sale in this and other states of the Union. The defendants do not make or deal in cigars. They manufacture cigar boxes, which they sell to cigarmakers. They also procure from lithographers labels which are almost an exact reproduction of those used by the complainant, even the signature being copied therein. . . . Nor is there anything to the suggestion that injunction will not lie against defendants, because they do not themselves make, pack, or sell the fraudulent cigars. No doubt they may make the boxes without objection. There is no trade-mark, so far as appears, in the style, size, or shape of a cigar box. But they do much more. They procure labels counterfeiting the complainant's, and assemble these labels with their boxes, with the obvious purpose of enabling others, by the use of the labels, to palm off their goods upon the public as the goods of the complainant. Complainant is clearly entitled to an injunction against all who knowingly combine together to accomplish that purpose."

In Hostetter Co. v. Brueggeman-Reinert Distilling Co., 46 Fed. Rep. 188, Thayer, J., said: "The proof does not establish that defendant has itself sold a spurious article of bitters put up in bottles made in imitation of those in use by complainant, or that it has counterfeited the complainant's labels, trade-marks, etc.; but the proof does show that defendant manufactures an article of bitters which closely resembles Hostetter's Bitters in appearance and flavor, and that it has sold the same in bulk to

3. Evidence—a. EXPERT TESTIMONY.—The question of what evidence is requisite to make out a case of infringement of a trade-mark is often a difficult one. This difficulty, however, arises in great measure from the fact that considerable confusion exists with reference to the fundamental basis of trade-mark law. If the idea of property in a trade-mark be admitted, and followed to its logical conclusion, no evidence in technical trade-mark cases should be required beyond proof of ownership of the particular trade-mark, and its use by the defendant. Generally this use can be seen by the court at a glance, and if the trade-mark of the plaintiff is found upon defendant's goods, this wrongful use of the plaintiff's property should be enjoined without further inquiry. Many judges, however, have refused to act in this summary way, and have required proof, either of actual deception of plaintiff's customers, or the probability of deception. The latter inquiry, which is the usual one, opens the door to evidence of a most unsatisfactory character. It has been decided in some cases that its customers, advising them at the time of such sales to refill bottles that originally contained Hostetter's Bitters, with the spurious article, and to put the bottles thus refilled on the market as containing genuine Hostetter's Bitters.

Under these circumstances, I think the complainant is entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant from selling a spurious article of bitters as and for Hostetter's Bitters. Customers of defendant, who have thus been advised and induced to use genuine bottles and labels in the manner above mentioned, are clearly guilty of a wrongful act which a court of equity will enjoin; and a person who counsels and advises another to perpetrate a fraud, and who also furnishes him the means of consummating the same, is himself a wrongdoer, and, as such, is liable for the injury inflicted. The defendant cannot shield itself from an injunction by the plea that it has not itself sold a spurious article in a false dress. The fact that it has advised its customers to perpetrate a fraud of that description, and that it has furnished them the spurious article, and that some of its customers have probably acted on the suggestion, is sufficient to render them liable to an injunction."

In Estes v. Worthington, 30 Fed. Rep. 465, Wallace, J., said: "No person should be made a party who has no interest in the suit, and against whom no decree can be had at the hearing; and for this reason a person who is a mere agent for another in the transactions in controversy ought not generally to be made a party defendant, unless his presence is necessary for the purposes of discovery. And it has been held in suits for infringements of patents that there is a class of agents, such as mere workmen in the employ of a manufacturer, against whom there can be no recovery, although they may have participated somewhat in the acts of infringement. But ordinarily the infringer cannot escape responsibility by showing that he was acting for another. In torts of misfeasance, like the violation of a trade-mark, agents and servants are personally liable to the injured party. All persons procuring or assisting in the commission of a trespass are principals in the transaction, and both the master who commands and the servant who does the act of trespass may be made responsible as principals, and may be sued jointly or severally for damages, as the injured party may elect. A joint action will lie against the principal and agent. . . .

It follows that the defendants, although they were only the agents or servants of Richard Worthington, in doing the wrongful acts sought to be restrained and for which damages are claimed, are responsible to the complainant, and the complainant has the right to pursue them."

In Estes v. Belford, 30 Pat. Off. Gaz. 99, Wheeler, J., said: "The infringement of a trade-mark is a trespass upon the rights of the owner by using it as a false representation that the wares of the infringer are those of the owner, for which an action of trespass experts might be called in,¹ but the later, and possibly the better rule, excludes such evidence, first, because all such evidence is the merest speculation and expression of opinion, and quite as many witnesses will be produced on one side as on the other; but the best reason for rejecting such evidence is given in a recent case,² in which it was said that everyone in such a case must give an opinion based upon the effect that the articles and marks of the contending parties may make upon their minds, and if the parties be of a standard of intelligence, such as on the case would lie at common law, in which all participating would be principals and proper defendants."

In Sawyer v. Kellogg, 7 Fed. Rep. 720, Bradley, J., said: "All who are concerned in the commission of a tort are alike amenable to the party injured."

In Maltby v. Bobo, 14 Blatchf. (U. S.) 53, Johnson, J., said: "The defendant presents no denial of any of the alleged facts, by affidavit or otherwise; but only alleges, by way of plea, that, in selling the nail pullers mentioned in the bill, he was acting as salesman for one Dickerman, the owner of the nail pullers, and that he had no interest in the nail pullers, or in the sale of them, except as the employé of Dickerman, to dispose of the same. . . . A wrongdoer cannot set up that he is doing wrong on account of the third person, as a bar to his own responsibility. The principal, also, may be liable, if the injured party elects to look to him; but the person who is actually doing the wrong cannot escape liability."

1. In Williams v. Brooks, 50 Conn. 278; 47 Am. Rep. 642, Pardee, J., said: "For the purpose of proving that the defendants' ounce packages of hair-pins so closely resembled those of the plaintiffs as to mislead an ordinary purchaser and consumer, the plaintiffs offered the testimony of several persons, who were or had been wholesale dealers in hair-pins in New York and Philadelphia, as experts. The committee received the evidence, notwithstanding the defendants' objection. We see no error in this."

In Mitchell v. Henry, 15 Ch. Div. 181, Cotton, L. J., said: "In the present case, however, the question seems to me to be essentially a question for experts, for when the goods are placed side by side there is great difficulty in arriving at a conclusion whether the triple thread used by the defendants and the selvaige altogether is not calculated to deceive. . . . But there is a conflict of testimony between the expert witnesses, and there is, so far as I am concerned, a difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion, and I think the better course is to let the motion stand to the hearing, and then, after cross-examination of the witnesses, and after hearing the evidence in court, the court can decide whether the defendants' goods are so manufactured as to be calculated to be passed off as the goods of the plaintiffs." Thesiger, L. J., said: "With great respect to the master of the rolls, I cannot come to the same conclusion merely by looking at the exhibits themselves. In the first place, although the selvaige of the dyed goods is not anything approaching to pure white, yet, at the same time, I cannot say that it is not such as might reasonably be described by the trade generally, and not merely by the particular manufacturers residing in Bradford, as a white selvaige. Secondly, although the defendants are using a mottled thread made up of three distinct colors, instead of a mottled thread made up of two distinct colors, yet I cannot say, by the evidence of my own eyes, whether the three-fold thread used by the defendants might not, even to the eyes of an expert, be a colorable imitation of the two-fold thread used by the plaintiffs. It appears to me that that must be a matter of evidence, and evidence of experts." See also Cope v. Evans, L. R., 18 Eq. 145.

2. In Radam v. Microbe Destroyer Co., 81 Tex. 122, Collard, J., said: "We doubt the propriety of taking the opinion of an expert in such a case. He was called on for his opinion as to whether persons of ordinary intelligence and care would be deceived by the trade-marks of the parties, or the packages and the trade-marks, into the belief that they were the same. We do not see how the evidence of an expert could aid the court in determining this queswill justify them in speaking as experts, they are entirely unfit to testify with reference to the impressions the marks would make upon the minds of persons of ordinary and presumably less intelligence than themselves. This line of argument brings us, however, to the question of "How competent are the judges, who are presumed to be of more than ordinary intelligence, to pass upon these questions?" This only shows how utterly unsatisfactory this method of proof is, and how little reliance is to be placed upon it, or in fact upon the opinions of the judges, when based upon nothing more than their individual opinion of whether deception is likely or not. In cases of technical trade-marks, therefore, much the safer rule is to eliminate all question of the deception of the public and to rest entirely upon the ground of property. In cases of unfair competition in business, the motive and intention to deceive is the first inquiry, and after that is established, an inferior class of evidence is required to show the likelihood of deception. The question of injury of the plaintiff will, as a general rule, be presumed in technical trade-mark cases, and in cases of unfair competition the same evidence which will establish likelihood of deception will also establish probability of injury sufficient to maintain the action.

tion, or how there could be an expert in such a matter. What ordinary intelligence might think of facts before the eye, it seems to the writer, should be left to the judgment of ordinary intelligence, with at least as much confidence as to one calling himself an expert. Such evidence has, however, been admitted and approved. Williams v. Brooks, 50 Conn. 278; 47 Am. Rep. 642; reported in American Trade-Mark Cases, p. 661. . . . Identity of design might require an expert's testimony—an expert in designs—but that is not the question here. Expert testimony is resorted to for the purpose of informing the court or jury upon subjects not commonly understood; but where the nature of the inquiry appeals to the common understanding and ordinary intelligence of mankind, it would be improper to admit opinions of experts or other persons. Shelly v. Austin, 74 Tex. 612. This witness was not called as an expert, and his opinion was not admissible, nor would it have been, in our judgment, if he had been an expert. All the facts were before the court—the trade-marks, the labels, the jugs, and the packages, as presented for sale in the market; it was his province to decide what impression would be made by them upon persons of ordinary intelligence and care. In such a case, an expert should not be allowed to decide for him. Cooper v. State, 23 Tex. 331; Turner v. Strange, 56 Tex. 142; Houston, etc., R. Co. v. McGehee, 49 Tex. 481; McKay v. Overton, 65 Tex. 85; Shelly v. City of Austin, 74 Tex. 612; 1 Whart. on Ev. 436. Similar testimony was offered by plaintiff by other witnesses, which was met by the same ruling. The assignments of error involve the same principles that have been above disposed of. It is useless for us to repeat them or the reasons in favor of the court's ruling. All such testimony was inadmissible, and there was no error in rejecting it."

In In re Jelley, L. T., 51 Ch. 640, n, Jessel, M. R. said: "You can always get as much evidence on one side as you can on the other; one set of experts say that the marks are alike, and the other set say they are not; one side say that they are practically indistinguishable in the stamping, and the other side say that if the stamping is carefully and well done they may be distinct; whereas, in practice, they are particularly well struck, and one must, therefore, have regard not merely to the theory on the subject."

In Cook v. Starkweather, 13 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 392, Monell, J., said: "Upon the trial, the devices of the respective parties were produced, upon barrel heads branded and prepared as for sale. A considerable amount of testimony was taken as to the effect of the defendants' devices. Dealers in whisky were examined who, upon inspection of the two devices, gave their opinions. The plaintiffs' witnesses stated their opinion to be that the public would, and the defendants that it would not, be misled or deceived by the defendants' devices; and that description of evidence may be said to have been fairly balanced. There is nothing much more difficult than to decide upon the kind of evidence which is proper in this class of cases. The best evidence, of course, would be instances of actual deception. But if none such can be furnished, the opinions of witnesses, formed from a mere inspection of the genuine and the imitation, are of little weight. They may or may not be deceived, but they are wholly unable to do more than express an opinion as to the effect in the community, the force or correctness of which is not increased or strengthened by the peculiar business in which they are engaged. An expert can easily detect a counterfeit bank-bill, but his opinion as to whether the public could detect it is not entitled to any more weight than the opinion of any other person."

b. DISCOVERY.—Discovery in trade-mark cases is seldom resorted to, except where the defendant seeks to develop a defense to an action of infringement by requiring the plaintiff to disclose secrets with reference to his processes of manufacture or the ingredients of his article. In some cases such discovery has been permitted, but only in cases where the plaintiff has himself opened the door to the inquiry by introducing evidence which made the inquiry pertinent; such, for instance, as a calculation of the cost of manufacture without disclosing ingredients or proportions. In cases, however, where the inquiry is resorted to by the defendant simply for the purpose of seeking to force the plaintiff to disclose his trade secrets or dismiss his bill, the courts have refused to require the plaintiff to answer. A defendant has been required to answer and disclose the names of his customers, to whom he has sold goods bearing an infringing trade-mark, so as to give the plaintiff who is successful against him the means of following his customers.¹

In Lee v. Haley, L. R., 5 Ch. App. 155, Giffard, L. J., said: "The first thing to be observed in cases of this description is, that it would not be safe for any plaintiff to come into court until he could prove instances of persons having been actually deceived, for the court would have to try a hypothetical case, and a number of people would be brought forward by the defendant to say, and probably truly, that the thing done would never have deceived them, and in their opinion was not calculated to deceive. I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs were quite justified in waiting until they could collect a sufficient number of cases to prove to the court that the proceedings complained of actually do deceive the public."

1. In Humphries v. Taylor Drug Co., 39 Ch. Div. 693, Kekewick, J., said: "He says, not only is the use by the defendant of this trade-mark calculated to induce divers persons to buy the defendant's goods as and for the plaintiff's, but he also says that it has in fact induced divers persons to do so. The defendant then asks, 'Who are those divers persons?' The question I have to decide is, whether he is entitled to be told who those divers persons are. The courts have uniformly endeavored to prevent the plaintiff, or the defendant, as the case may be, from prying into the brief of their opponent or finding out what is to be the evidence which is to be produced at the trial. On the other hand, the courts have uniformly said that the plaintiff, or the defendant, is entitled to be told any and every particular which will enable him to properly prepare his case for the trial, so that he may not be taken by surprise, or may, if he sees he has been wrong, give way at once."

In Tetlow v. Savournin, 15 Phila. (Pa.) 170, the case being before an

4. Demurrer.—There are two classes of trade-mark infringement cases:—one in which the offense consists of the use by the defendant of a trade-mark claimed to be that of a plaintiff or a colorable imitation thereof, without fraud or intention to deceive; and a second in which the defendant, by the use of trade-mark, labels, wrappers, or general dress or marking of goods, seeks to perpetrate a fraud upon the plaintiff and sell his goods unlawfully as and for those of the plaintiff. In the former case, the question of examiner, the plaintiff was asked by his adversary of what ingredients his goods were composed, which he, under instruction of counsel, declined to disclose, whereupon this rule was taken. Counsel for the rule claimed the right to show what substances were contained in the cosmetic made by the plaintiff, in order that the court might judge whether it was such a preparation as ought to be protected. No one can give the information better than the man who makes it. Counsel against the rule replied that the whole commercial value of such proprietary manufactures depends upon secrecy as to their composition, and protested against depriving a man of his property by such a proceeding as this. If these questions must be answered, every manufacturer will be at the mercy of any one who desires to extort from him an account of his process, for an attempt to restrain an infringer would result in a disclosure of all that makes the invention valuable. The unreported case of Brooks v. Schofield, C. P., No. 4, Dec. T., 1877, was referred to as in favor of the objection. In Burnett v. Phalon, 21 How. Pr. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 100, a similar question was allowed, but only on the ground that the plaintiff, in his examination in chief, had opened the subject, and had thus made the question relevant on cross-examination.

In Orr v. Diaper, 4 Ch. Div. 92, Hall, V. C., said: "The plaintiffs applied to the defendants to give them the names of the persons who shipped the goods with those counterfeit marks upon them. The defendants would not give the names, but required more particulars. . . . In this case the plaintiffs do not know, and cannot discover, who the persons are who have invaded their rights, and who may be said to have abstracted their property. Their proceedings have come to a deadlock, and it would be a denial of justice if means could not be found in this court to assist the plaintiffs."

App. 90, James, L. J., said: "It is important to adhere to the rule of the court, that where the defendant cannot protect himself from giving discovery, there should be a full discovery of anything which is reasonably material to the plaintiff's case at the hearing, and which may be produced without any overwhelming amount of injury to defendant. Generally speaking, as the lord chancellor, if I may venture to say so, well expressed it, the court does not weigh in golden scales the materiality or immateriality of the discovery in considering whether the rule is to be applied—that he who discovers at all must discover fully; but, as he goes on to say, there are cases in which it is important that the court should so weigh it, namely, cases in which the discovery is such that the plaintiff, though failing at the hearing, may afterwards use in a way prejudicial to the defendant. In such cases it is important to consider whether the discovery is material for the purpose of enabling the plaintiff to establish his case at the hearing, or material only for the subsequent purposes of the suit, in case the plaintiff should succeed. I am not at all disposed to grant discovery, where I am satisfied that it is likely to be injurious to the defendant, and am not satisfied that there is any real prospect of its being of material service to the plaintiff at the hearing. Upon that ground, I think the vice chancellor's order in this case should be varied by not compelling the defendants to discover the names of customers, nor to discover the prices at which the goods were sold to them or bought from anybody else. . . . I think that the plaintiffs also have a right to see what directions were given to the defendants with respect to those marks. That may have a very considerable bearing, if not immediately on the relief, certainly upon the costs to be given at the hearing. Then the defendant seeks to avoid discovery as to what the circumstances were under which the marks were put on the cloth.

similarity of marks, and likelihood of the deception of the public, may be raised and decided on demurrer,¹ then, in the latter case the fraudulent intention and acts are of the essence of the offense, and to admit those by demurrer is to admit the charge; hence, a case of this kind cannot be decided on demurrer. A demurrer to a bill or declaration will submit to the court the question of infringement on inspection; but as a demurrer confesses fraud and intention to deceive on the part of the defendant, if these are alleged, but slight imitation is necessary to entitle the plaintiff to have the demurrer overruled, and then an injunction will issue.²

I cannot see what possible harm such discovery can do the defendants if plaintiffs fail at the hearing, and it may materially help the plaintiffs; and so with regard to what the marks were which were actually put on, and what directions were given as to that. Then, as to the names of the people to whom the goods were sent, it does seem to me that there can be no harm in the defendant showing the names of the places in Portugal (he admits they all went there), to which the goods were sent. It is not like the case of a trade secret of any kind."

In Moore v. Craven, L. R., 7 Ch. 96, n, Lord Hatherley, L. C., said: "The court does not, when discovery is a matter of indifference to the defendant, weigh in golden scales the question of materiality or immateriality; but where the nature of the discovery required is such that the giving of it may be prejudicial to the defendant, the court takes into consideration the special circumstances of the case, and whilst, on the one hand, it takes care that the plaintiff obtains all the discovery which can be of use to him, on the other, it is bound to protect the defendant against undue inquisition into his affairs."

In Burnett v. Phalon, 21 How. Pr. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 100, Moncrief, J., said: "This court has held that one of the plaintiffs offering himself as a witness, and testifying on behalf of the plaintiffs, and having been asked and answered on his direct examination the question, 'What profits have been realized by your firm on each dozen of the article sold?' was bound upon the cross-examination to have answered the question, 'In making up your estimate of profits as you have given, what materials do you calculate the cost upon?'"

In Desmond's Appeal, 103 Pa. St.

126; 49 Am. Rep. 118, the court said: "The original bill declares 'that the said medicines have been and are distinguished by the names of "Samaritan's Gift," and "Samaritan's Root and Herb Juices," and that the said names are the trade-marks of the same, together with certain labels and wrappers hereto annexed, marked "Exhibit A," and by the said trade-marks the same are distinguished from all other compound medicines.' It does not aver an imitation or similarity in the appearance of the labels and wrappers. An examination of the two shows they are quite dissimilar in names and appearance. It is true each has the word 'Samaritan,' but in such different form and combination of words as to preclude one medicine being taken for the other. We do not think the amended bill removes the difficulty of the appellant."

2. In LaCroix v. May, 15 Fed. Rep. 236; 113 P. & S., Wallace, J., said: "The theory of the demurrer is that the complainant's statutory title upon allegations of the bill is invalid. It is not necessary to decide the questions raised, because, as the demurrer is to the whole bill, the bill is sufficient, if all the allegations concerning a registration of the trade-mark were eliminated."

In Leidersdorf v. Flint, 50 Wis. 401; 71 P. & S., Lyon, J., said: "It may well be that two trade-marks are so entirely dissimilar that a court can properly say on demurrer that one is not and cannot be an infringement of the other, and this, although the pleading demurred to avers that it is an infringement and misleads the public. But to justify such a ruling the dissimilarity should be so marked as to leave no doubt in the mind of the court."

In Enoch Morgan's Son's Co. v. Hunkele, 16 Pat. Off. Gaz. 1092, Nixon, J., said: "The defendant insists

5. Preliminary Injunction.—Where the title of the plaintiff is clear and the infringement reasonably clear, and there has been no unreasonable delay in bringing suit, a preliminary injunction will be granted.¹ If, however, there be a denial of plaintiff's that there are such differences in his mode of using and combining the colors on the wrapper that no careful purchaser need be deceived, if he exercise ordinary care and prudence. This may be true, and in the absence of fraud, and upon the merits, the court may not be willing to hold that an infringement has been shown. But the fraud has been confessed by the demurrer, and such confession entitles the complainant to an injunction. The counsel for the defendant says that the demurrer was filed after duly considering the authority of Ellis v. Zeilin, 42 Ga. 91, and Barrows v. Knight, 6 R. I. 434; 78 Am. Dec. 452, and yet it was held in both of these cases, that where a fraudulent intent was admitted, the imitation need only be partial to sustain the action." The demurrer was overruled. See also Miller Tobacco Manufactory v. Commerce, 45 N. J. L. 18; 46 Am. Rep. 750.

In Ellis v. Zeilin, 42 Ga. 91, Lochrane, C. J., said: "To this bill the defendants filed a demurrer, and it is upon the judgment of the court below, overruling the demurrer, that error is assigned, and the question now comes before this court. Our judgment is invoked upon the facts admitted by the demurrer as they are alleged to exist in the bill; and one main distinguishable criterion in all cases of this character is the intention of the parties in using the similarities of trade-marks claimed by another, which, by the pleadings, is admitted to be 'to take advantage of the reputation' of the manufacture of Zeilin & Company. The language is, 'that the said Ellis is imitating the form and style of the package and wrapper used by your orator as aforesaid to take advantage,' etc. . . . We do not think there was equity in this bill on the mere question of similarity in the trade-marks. But, as the demurrer admits that what was done was done intentionally to take advantage of the reputation of his 'Simmon's Liver Medicine,' we cannot hold the judge below erred in restraining the bill for a hearing to let the whole matter be determined upon its merits."

In Barrows v. Knight, 6 R. I. 434; 78 Am. Dec. 452, Ames, C. J., said: "The declaration further alleges, in substance, that the defendant, well knowing the plaintiff's said mark, and for the purpose and with the effect of such deception, did stamp the words 'Roger Williams' upon cotton cloth not manufactured by the plaintiff, and to his serious injury. Certainly, under the rule, so well settled, that a partial imitation of a trade-mark, if calculated to deceive, will support an action, this is a sufficient allegation of an invasion of the plaintiff's rights. The court cannot, as a matter of law, decide that such partial use of the designation of his goods appropriated by the plaintiff was not designed, calculated, and effectual to carry out the fraud charged, and must leave that, as well as the prior allegation, to be settled upon the evidence by the jury. The demurrer is therefore overruled; but under the agreement of the parties, suggested at the argument, the defendant has leave to withdraw his demurrer without costs, and to plead over to the merits."

1. In G. G. White Co. v. Miller, 50 Fed. Rep. 277, Colt, C. J., said: "A glance at the two marks shows that the defendants have taken bodily the picture or representation which forms the complainant's trade-mark, and appropriated it to their own use. To my mind the infringement is so clear that it requires no further discussion; and, if there is any defense to this motion, it must rest upon some other ground. . . . The granting of a preliminary injunction depends upon the special circumstances of each case. This case has been fully tried upon affidavits. I do not see what new proof could be brought forward by either side at final hearing. There is little dispute of fact, and the question is mainly one of law, namely, whether the two marks are so similar that the defendants should be enjoined from the use of the one they have adopted. In a case of this character, if the court has no doubt on the question of infringement, an injunction should be granted at this stage of proceedings, unless there are special circumstances which take the case out of the general rule. I do not find any such special circumstances in this case. The defendants contend that it would work irretrievable injury to them to grant this motion, but this position is not supported by the proofs."

In Price Baking Powder Co. v. Fyfe, 45 Fed. Rep. 799, Nelson, J., said: "A motion is made for a preliminary injunction to restrain the use of the word 'Cream' in connection with the words 'Baking Powder,' which is manufactured and put upon the market by the defendant, and, as is alleged, in packages having labels and wrappers similar in design to those upon the goods of complainant, and exact enough to deceive. . . . The complainant is certainly entitled to protection in the use of this word, in connection with the baking-powder it manufactures, unless it is adopted and used as descriptive of the article, its ingredients or characteristics. . . . Although this decision was prior to that of the United States Supreme Court in the Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82, the court in Illinois could not have upheld the trade-mark if the word 'Cream' was descriptive of the quality of the article. While this decision is not conclusive and binding on this court, it is persuasive and of great weight, and on a motion for a preliminary injunction, especially when it sustains the impression of the court on the hearing, is decisive. It is unnecessary to consider the other ground urged, that the form in which the article manufactured by the defendant is put upon the market, its wrappers and labels and other devices, are of a similitude exact enough to warrant the relief asked. Motion granted, with leave to defendant to move to dissolve the injunction at the next June term of this court after the answer is filed."

In Symonds v. Greene, 28 Fed. Rep. 834, Wheeler, J., said: "This is a motion for a preliminary injunction to restrain the use of the word 'Eureka,' in trade, in connection with steam and hydraulic packing. There is no question but that the orator commenced using that name for packing made by him in 1875, and has continued that use since that time, nor but that the defendants use that name in connection with that kind of packing, not of the orator's make, in trade; nor but that a firm known as Sellers Bros. gave that name to a kind of steam-packing patented by William Beschke in 1872, at Philadelphia, and used it in connection with that packing until early in 1874; nor but that the profits on the sales of defendants are much less than $500. . . .

On the whole case as it now stands, the orator appears to be entitled to the injunction asked. Motion granted."

In Hill v. Lockwood, 62 Wis. 507; 154 P. & S. (Super. Ct.), Lyon, J., said: "The learned counsel for the defendant invokes the rule that 'It is only when the legal title is clear that a court of equity will interfere by injunction to restrain the use or colorable infringement of a trade-mark.' We are of the opinion that the allegations of the complaint show a clear legal right in the plaintiff to the exclusive use of the trade name 'Clysmic,' and hence that the injunction was properly allowed in the first instance. . . . We believe it the safer and better course to let the injunction stand until the proofs are in. The court can then determine the facts intelligently, but cannot do so on these affidavits alone."

In Read v. Richardson, 45 L. T. N. S. 54, James, L. J., said: "The defendants say that they have not had a sufficient opportunity of testing the evidence, and have not had an opportunity of bringing evidence to contradict what the plaintiffs say as to the name, or the nickname, which the plaintiffs say their beer has acquired. The case will have to be fully disposed of at the hearing, if the parties are still minded to carry on the litigation to that extent. What we have now to consider is the balance of inconvenience and convenience in dealing with the thing in the meantime, before it is heard. If the plaintiffs should happen to be right at the hearing, and we should in the meantime, upon this interlocutory application, confirm the view of the master of the rolls, that the plaintiffs are not entitled to an interlocutory injunction, the injury to them would be irremediable and incalculable. Their particular trade-mark, their particular reputation, in the meantime would be utterly destroyed. Upon the balance of convenience and inconvenience, it seems to me better that the defendants should abstain from doing that which is a novelty, and that they should not during the litigation interfere with the names the plaintiffs say they have got." Brett, J., said: "There is another question as to the convenience and inconvenience of granting an interlocutory injunction. The plaintiffs having established a trade, the evidence is to be taken to show very strongly that their beer had acquired the name in the trade; and what my lord has said seems to be perfectly true, that if the defendants were allowed to interfere with them in carrying on that trade (on the supposition that they are right) up to the hearing, and then up to an appeal to the House of Lords, by that process the defendants could destroy the plaintiff's trade beyond remedy, whereas, according to the defendants' own showing, and according to their own allegation, stopping them from using the dog's head would do no injury to them if their allegation be correct." Cotton, L. J., said: "As to the question of convenience or inconvenience in granting the injunction, I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that, if there is a prima facie case made out by the plaintiffs, although it is not as fully made out as it possibly might have been, we ought to grant the injunction. The plaintiffs, in obtaining an injunction upon an interlocutory application, must give an undertaking as to damages. If there is no injunction granted, and they are in the right, the trade name, which they say is valuable to them, it seems, when they come to protect it, will be absolutely gone before they can ascertain their rights. Therefore, if the plaintiffs have made out a prima facie case, the strong balance of convenience and inconvenience is in favor of granting the injunction."

In Carroll v. Ertheiler, 1 Fed. Rep. 688, Butler, J., said: "He knew it to be the recognized designation of the plaintiff's tobacco, which had become popular with consumers and the trade. Did he not expect the public to be influenced thereby and his business increased? An affirmative answer cannot well be avoided. If he did not, however, the injunction will do him no harm, for he has not yet had time to establish a reputation of his own under this name. . . . A preliminary injunction as prayed for will be granted."

In Robertson v. Berry, 50 Md. 591, Miller, J., said: "In determining whether this order shall be affirmed or reversed, this court is confined to the case made by the bill and exhibits, without reference to the averments of the answer which appears in the record. McCann v. Taylor, 10 Md. 418."

In Enoch Morgan's Son's Co. v. Hunkele, 16 Pat. Off. Gaz. 1092; 31 P. & S. Am. Trade-mark Cases, Nixon, J., said: "The defendant insists that there are such differences in his mode of using and combining the colors on the wrapper, that no careful purchaser need be deceived, if he exercise ordinary care and prudence. This may be true, and, in the absence of fraud, and upon the merits, the court may not be willing to hold that an infringement has been shown. But the fraud has been confessed by the demurrer, and such confession entitles the complainant to an injunction. The demurrer is overruled, and twenty days' time is given to the defendant to answer the complainant's bill on the merits." See also Hennessey v. Rohmann, 36 L. T. N. S. 51.

In Frese v. Bachof, 13 Blatchf. (U. S.) 234, Johnson, J., said: "To a preliminary injunction the plaintiffs are not, on this branch of the case, entitled. Neither party has any exclusive right in the article known as Hamburg tea, which appears to be a compound known in the German books of medicine; nor do the plaintiffs at present appear to have any special right in respect to the form, size, and color of the packages, the labels upon which are sufficient to distinguish, even to a careless observer, the one from the other. A preliminary injunction must issue against the defendant, restraining him from the use of the name of 'J. C. Frese & Co.,' and from that of the trade-mark, or label, 'J. C. Frese & Co., Hopfensack, 6 Hamburg,' on packages of Hamburg tea, and the residue of the injunction asked for is denied."

In Lee v. Haley, L. R., 5 Ch. App. 155, Giffard, L. J., said: "Then, further, in cases of delay, we must consider whether the nature of the injunction is such that if it is granted the defendant will have been injured by the delay. It has been strongly urged here that if this injunction is sustained the defendant's trade will be stopped, but that is not so; his trade will not be stopped in the least, he will only be restrained from selling under this particular name. . . . Considering the nature of the injunction, such an amount of delay as has taken place here would, even if unaccounted for, be immaterial. . . . I think this injunction has been properly granted upon the well-known principles of this court, which are applicable to all cases of this description, viz., that it is a fraud on the part of a defendant to set up a business under such a designation as is calculated to lead and does lead other people to suppose that his business is the business of another person. That being so, this application must be dismissed with costs."

1. In Portuondo v. Monne, 28 Fed. Rep. 16, Wheeler, J., said: "The plaintiff shows that he has used the symbols mentioned in his bill of complaint to designate cigars made by him; and that the defendants make use of the same. But the affidavits of defendants show that the same symbols were used by others upon cigar boxes before, or about the time the plaintiff began to use them. These affidavits make it doubtful whether the plaintiff has so had the exclusive use of the symbols that the use of them by the defendants serves to pass their cigars as those of the plaintiff. This question cannot safely be determined upon the affidavits, but should be established by evidence regularly taken in due course. The plaintiff does not appear to be entitled to a preliminary injunction. Motion denied."

2. Green v. Rooke, L. J. N. C. 1872, p. 54. In Leclancha Battery Co. v. Western Electric Co., 21 Fed. Rep. 538, Wheeler, J., said: "The orator seeks by motion for a preliminary injunction, to have the defendant restrained from using the words 'Pile Leclancha' and 'Disque,' and the orator's style of label, upon batteries of the defendant's manufacture. . . . As the medals were awarded to the patented batteries, the representation of them upon the labels would be indicative of the reputation of these batteries rather than of their origin. Under these circumstances and authorities, the question whether these things all together amount to an unlawful representation of the source of the batteries, is so doubtful, that the granting of a preliminary injunction does not appear to be warranted."

In Selchow v. Baker, 93 N. Y. 59; 45 Am. Rep. 169, Rapallo, J., said: "In the case of McHenry v. Jewett, 90 N. Y. 58, this general rule was qualified to the extent of holding that where it clearly appears that the complaint shows no cause of action, a preliminary injunction is unauthorized, and the granting of it is an error of law which may be reviewed in this court on appeal. The principle established in the case above cited does not apply where a doubtful question of law arises upon the complaint. The decision of such a question would be deferred until the hearing of the case upon its merits, and would not be summarily disposed of on a motion to dissolve the injunction. The case must be very clear to justify this court in deciding the merits of the controversy on a mere motion, and it would ordinarily decline, in a case presenting any serious question, to deprive either party of the privilege of having the merits of his case deliberately heard and passed upon on appeal from the final judgment."

3. In Fairbanks v. Jacobus, 14 Blatchf. (U. S.) 337, Johnson, J., said: "In trade-mark cases, it is by no means of course to grant preliminary injunctions, even where the plaintiff's case seems to be made out; and I shall, therefore, leave the further consideration of the case to the final hearing, when the question as to the defendant's claim of right to the use of the words 'Fairbanks' patent' and the other questions of fact just referred to, and the unexplained circumstances and terms of the writing claimed to have extinguished the right of Chamberlain, can, if necessary, be further considered. The motion for an injunction must be denied, and the order heretofore made, granting an injunction till the decision of the motion, must be vacated."

4. In Brown v. Doscher, 20 N. Y. Supp. 900; 66 Hun (N. Y.) 626, Lawrence, J., said: "No case was made out in the court below for the granting of an injunction pendente lite. The second wrapper of the defendant cannot, we think, be regarded as such an imitation of the plaintiff's wrapper as to be likely to deceive a purchaser of ordinary care and caution; and as to the first wrapper adopted by the defendant, but abandoned by him before the motion was heard, we deem it sufficient to say that, in view of the allegations in the defendant's affidavits, that the plaintiffs were themselves guilty of attempting to mislead the public, by a statement upon the label used by them that their form of cake and title were protected by a trade-mark secured, which statement is shown by the papers to have been false, the plaintiffs have not shown such a superior equity as entitles them to a preliminary injunction. We think that the rights of both parties can be more accurately determined and adjudicated upon the trial of the action than upon a hearing on affidavits, and are therefore of the guilty of laches in bringing suit,¹ the preliminary injunction will be denied.

In Lies v. Daniel, 82 Ga. 272, Blackley, C. J., said: "The question of fact, whether the cigar boxes held for sale and being sold by the defendant, with the marks, devices and designs thereon, are such colorable imitations of the complainant's goods as to be likely to deceive or mislead purchasers to the injury of complainants, being for the jury on final hearing of the bill, and irreparable damage not being probable, there being no charge that the defendant is insolvent, there was no error in denying an interlocutory injunction. Injunctions in restraint of trade should be sparingly granted before final decree. Foster v. Blood Balm Co., 77 Ga. 216. Judgment affirmed."

In Foster v. Blood Balm Co., 77 Ga. 216, Blackley, C. J., said: "We are, however, satisfied that in this case, the injunction, if to be granted at all, ought to await the result of a trial upon the merits. It is a grave matter to petrify in an instant a living business by a mere interlocutory order. If the use of a particular label is important to the complainants, so is it to the defendants. And, at last, the facts have to be found by a jury; the chancellor, under our system, has no power to settle them in vacation or even in term. Any injunction which he, unaided by a jury, could grant, would be only a temporary expedient. It would prevent neither the delay nor the expense of a jury trial. At the trial, it will be for the jury to say by their verdict, not only whether the label used by the defendants resembles the complainant's, but whether the imitation is such as to deceive, and whether its use, if continued, will probably have that result. . . . It is not shown that the defendants are insolvent, or that for any cause the denial of a preliminary injunction will produce irreparable damage. There would be much more danger of such damage to the defendants from a mistaken grant of an injunction at this stage of the proceedings than there is to the complainants from the refusal to grant it. We think the judge below acted wisely and prudently in forbearing to interfere. He not only exercised a sound discretion, but, so far as we can discern, made a perfectly accurate decision—the very one he ought to have made."

In Mitchell v. Henry, 15 Ch. Div. 181, James, L. J., said: "Probably a large percentage of purchasers would not be deceived, but there is such a conflict of evidence that in my opinion the matter cannot be safely dealt with upon an interlocutory application when the witnesses have not been cross-examined. In order to come to a satisfactory conclusion, it is necessary to know what the witnesses would say when they are using their own words in answer to questions not leading, whereas we have before us only affidavits which are answers in the solicitor's words to questions the most leading possible. Then, with regard to the balance of convenience and inconvenience, it seems to me by far the most convenient course that no injunction should be granted, and that the motion should stand over to the hearing, the defendants undertaking to keep an account." Cotton, L. J., said: "I will say a few words as to the reason why I think we cannot interfere by granting an injunction. If there is a conflict of testimony on the question whether or no goods are calculated to deceive or to be passed off as those of the persons by whom they are not manufactured, the court very often is in a position to judge by its eyes where the truth lies and what ought to be the result. In the present case, however, the question seems to me to be essentially a question for experts. . . . But there is a conflict of testimony between the expert witnesses, and there is, so far as I am concerned, a difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion, and I think the better course is to let the motion stand to the hearing, and then, after cross-examination of the witnesses, and after hearing the evidence in court, the court can decide whether the defendant's goods are so manufactured as to be calculated to be passed off as the goods of the plaintiff. On that ground I think that we ought not to grant any interlocutory injunction, but that the motion should stand over to the hearing, the defendants being put on an undertaking to keep an account."

1. In Estes v. Worthington, 22 Fed. Rep. 822, Wallace, J., said: "The only

6. Decree and Permanent Injunction.—Injunctions have been granted in trade-mark cases to restrain:

doubt as to the complainants' right to a preliminary injunction is suggested by the fact that the various publishers of such books since 1876 have been permitted without prosecution to apply the word to their publication of juvenile books in this country, and have used it as a trade-mark in hostility to the real proprietors; and among them were the complainants themselves, who did so for two or three years before they purchased the right of Johnstone. Laches in prosecuting infringers has always been recognized as a sufficient reason for denying a preliminary injunction; sometimes, apparently, by way of discipline to a complainant who has manifested reluctance to burden himself with the expense and vexation of a law-suit, and delayed legal proceeding until his patience was exhausted. See Bovill v. Crate, L. R., 1 Eq. Cas. 388. When delay of the owner of a patent or trade-mark to prosecute infringers has been of a tendency to mislead the public or the defendant sought to be enjoined into a false security, and a sudden injunction would result injuriously, it ought not to be granted summarily, but the complainant should be left to his relief at final hearing."

In Isaacson v. Thompson, 20 W. R. 196; 41 L. J. Ch. 101, Bacon, V. C., said: "The present application cannot be granted. The plaintiff admits that he was aware that the objectionable styles were written over and upon the defendant's shops as long ago as February and November, 1870, and the other cases of deception that have been adduced were committed between February, 1870, and May, 1871. The information collected by May was sufficient. Parties seeking an injunction must come forward speedily. If done in time, the application might have been acceded to. The motion will stand to the hearing, and if the plaintiff dismisses his own bill before the hearing, the defendant's costs will be costs in the cause."

1. Parlett v. Guggenheimer, 67 Md. 543.

In Johnston v. Orr-Ewing, L. R., 7

App. Cas. 219 n, the injunction, as varied by the House stood as follows: "To restrain the defendants, Robert Johnston & Co., their servants, workmen, and agents, from affixing, or causing to be affixed, to any Turkey-red yarn not dyed by the plaintiffs, Archibald Orr-Ewing & Co., the ticket marked B, and from using two elephants on any ticket used on Turkey-red yarn, without clearly distinguishing such ticket from the plaintiffs' ticket, mentioned in the pleadings, being the exhibit marked A, referred to in the said depositions, or so as to represent or induce the belief that any of the said yarn was dyed by the plaintiffs." See also Caruncho v. Stephenson, 25 Sol. J. 929.

In Read v. Richardson, 45 L. T. N. S. 60 (Ct. of Appeal), the following order was made: "The plaintiffs by their counsel undertaking to abide by any order this court may make as to damages, in case this court shall hereafter be of opinion that the defendants have sustained any by reason of this order which the plaintiffs ought to pay, this court doth order that the defendants, E. Richardson and Co., their servants and agents, be restrained from using the figure of a dog's head upon any labels, tickets, or wrappers affixed or applied to bottles of beer or stout sold for exportation, or exported by the defendants to any of the Australian colonies or New Zealand, and from selling for exportation or exporting to any of the said colonies any bottles of beer or stout, having affixed or applied thereto any such label, ticket, or wrapper, until judgment in this action or further order; and it is ordered that the plaintiff's costs of this motion be their costs in the action."

In Sawyer v. Horn, 4 Hughes (U. S.) 239, Morris, J., said: "We have come to the conclusion in the case before us that the respondent should be enjoined from putting up his goods in the manner in which he has been doing, as shown by the exhibits, or in any other manner so simulating the form, color, labels and appearance given by the complainant to his goods as to mislead purchasers, into mistaking one for the other." See also Carroll v. Ertheiler, 1 Fed. Rep. 688; Dreydoppel v. Young, 14 Phila. (Pa.) 226.

In Robertson v. Berry, 50 Md. 591, Miller, J., said: "This appeal is from an order granting an injunction restraining the appellant from publishing and circulating a certain almanac for the year 1879, known as 'T. G. Robertson's Hagerstown Almanack,' with the same emblems, devices, marks, representations, title and back, outside pages, style, shape, and general appearance, as have characterized the publications of the same for previous years, and from printing, publishing and circulating any other almanac in colorable imitation of the almanac of the complainants, known as 'J. Gruher's Hagerstown Town and County Almanack,' and calculated to deceive and impose upon the public, and to create in their minds the belief that such almanac is really and truly the almanac of the complainants. . . . The order appealed from will, therefore, be affirmed. . . . The averments of the bill are sufficient to justify the granting of the injunction prayed for."

In Consolidated Fruit Jar Co. v. Thomas, Cox's Man. of Trade-Mark Cases 665, Nixon, J., said: "There is no difficulty about this case in regard to the infringement. The embarrassment arises in determining to what extent the injunction should go, or what it should include. . . . The court is of the opinion that the complainants are entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant pendente lite from the use of the monogram on the fruit-jar caps, and on the ends of the boxes, and from circulating the printed circulars so closely resembling the circulars of the complainants, and it is ordered accordingly."

In India Rubber Co. v. Rubber Comb, etc., Co., 45 N. Y. Super. Ct. 258, Sedgwick, J., said: "The judgment should have been confined to the use of an imitation, colorable or other, of the picture of a factory, used by plaintiffs. This is, however, hardly more than a matter of form, which could have been corrected upon suggestion, on the settlement of the judgment. The judgment should be modified by striking out the absolute prohibition of the use of a picture of a factory, and confining the imitation to a picture like that used by the plaintiffs."

In Siegert v. Findlater, 7 Ch. Div. 801, Fry, J., said: "The injunction will, therefore, be to restrain the defendants, their servants and agents, from using the words 'Angostura Bitters,' or the word 'Angostura,' on any bitters or other fluids contained in bottles, not made by the plaintiffs, so as to induce the belief that such bitters or fluids are made by the plaintiffs, and further, from selling or offering for sale any bitters or other fluids in the bottles, in the wrappers, and in the general form in which the defendants were selling the bitters called by them 'Angostura Bitters,' at the commencement of this action, or in any other wrappers or form contrived or designed to represent and induce the belief that the bitters or fluids sold by the defendants, and not made by the plaintiffs, are the goods of the plaintiffs."

In Apollinaris Co. v. Norrish, 33 L. T. N. S. 244, Bacon, N. C., said: "An injunction is granted accordingly, restraining the defendants, their servants or agents, from selling, etc., 'any mineral or other waters not being the genuine Apollinaris Water, under the name of Apollinaris Water or London Apollinaris Water, or under any other name of which the word Apollinaris so forms part as to be calculated to deceive the public.'" In Ford v. Foster, L. R., 7 Ch. App. 611, James, L. J., said: "The form of the injunction will be to restrain the defendants from applying the mark or title of 'Eureka' to any shirts manufactured by them or to any shirts sold by them, unless manufactured by the plaintiffs, and from selling any shirts already marked with the mark and title 'Eureka,' unless such mark or title has been applied with the sanction of the plaintiff; and from issuing any boxes or packages on which the mark or title of 'Eureka' shall be applied to shirts not of the plaintiff's manufacture; and from affixing or using any label or card or other mark containing the word 'Eureka' to or upon any shirts not of the plaintiff's manufacture."

Second. The use of the same collocation of words, names, descriptions, size, shape, and color of package.¹

Third. In Wotherspoon v. Currie, L. R., 5 H. L. Cas. 523, it was said: "Injunction granted restraining the respondent, his servants and agents, from using the word 'Glenfield' in or upon any labels affixed to packets of starch manufactured by or for him, and from in any other way representing the starch manufactured by or for him to be 'Glenfield Starch,' and from selling or causing the same to be sold as 'Glenfield Starch,' and from doing any act or thing to induce the belief that starch manufactured by or for him, the respondent, is 'Glenfield Starch,' or starch manufactured by the appellants; the respondent to pay the costs of the appellants in the court below." See also Stephens v. Peel, 16 L. T. N. S. 145.

In Swift v. Dey, 4 Rob. (N. Y.) 614, Robertson, C. J., said: "The injunction must, therefore, be continued against the employment by the defendants of the words 'Parlor Match,' inclosed in a lozenge-shaped frame or design, similar to that in the label of the plaintiffs, in any label used by them in the sale of matches; and also of the word 'Diamond,' or the words 'Diamond State,' in any labels used to designate such matches, and of any strip or border on their labels similar to that on which such word 'State' is printed in the labels of the plaintiffs; and from selling any matches with labels having such prohibited insignia of ownership thereon."

In Seixo v. Provezende, L. R., 1 Ch. App. 194, Wood, V. C., said: "Injunction to restrain the defendants, etc., from affixing or causing to be affixed to any casks of wine shipped to their orders the brand or marks of a crown and the word 'Seixo,' or any other combination of marks or words so contrived as, by colorable imitation or otherwise, to represent the marks or brands of the plaintiff, and from employing any marks or words which shall be so contrived as to represent, or induce the belief, that such wines are Crown Seixo, or the produce of the Quinta do Seixo, or otherwise using the word 'Seixo,' without distinguishing the same from the wine produced by the Quinta do Seixo." Affirmed by Lord Cramworth, V. C. See also Williams v. Johnson, 2 Bosw. (N. Y.) 1; Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. Spear, 2 Sandf. (N. Y.) 601.

In Farina v. Silverlock, 1 K. & J. 509, Wood, V. C., said: "Injunction to restrain the defendant, his workmen, etc., from printing or selling, or exposing for sale, or procuring to be printed or sold, any label similar to those in use by the plaintiff, as in the bill in this cause mentioned, or containing copies of the signature, or address, or flourish, seal or stamp, or other marks invented and used by the plaintiff, as therein mentioned, or any signature, address, flourish, seal, or other mark merely colorably differing therefrom, or any other papers or labels so printed or contrived as, by colorable imitation or otherwise, to represent or lead to the belief that Eau de Cologne prepared by other parties was Eau de Cologne prepared by the plaintiff." See also Franks v. Weaver, 8 L. T. 510.

In Knott v. Morgan, 2 Keen 219, Langdale, M. R., said: "To restrain the defendant, Robert Morgan, his servants and agents, from running, or in any manner using or causing to be used, for the conveyance of passengers, his omnibus in the bill mentioned, or any other omnibus, having painted, stamped, printed or written thereon the words or names 'London Conveyance,' or 'Original Conveyance for Company,' or any other names, words, or devices painted, stamped, printed, or written thereon, in such manner as to form or be a colorable imitation of the names, words, and devices painted, stamped, printed, or written on the omnibuses of the plaintiffs; and let the defendant pay to the plaintiffs their costs of this application."

1. In Landreth v. Landreth, 22 Fed. Rep. 41, Dyer, J., said: "An injunction, pendente lite, will issue, restraining the defendant from placing on the bags

1. In Massam v. Thorley's Cattle Food Co., 14 Ch. Div. 748, James, L. J., said: "An injunction will be granted to restrain the defendant company, their servants, workmen, agents and travelers, and representatives respectively, from selling, exporting, or shipping, or causing, or procuring, or allowing to be sold, shipped, or exported, and from in any manner representing, or causing, or procuring to be represented, any goods manufactured by the defendant company as the manufacture or goods of the late Joseph Thorley, or of the plaintiffs, his trustees and successors in business; and also from in any manner representing, or causing or procuring to be represented, or doing anything which shall lead to the belief, that the defendant company have been or are carrying on the business of the late Joseph Thorley, or are the successors in business of the late Joseph Thorley; and also from affixing, or permitting or causing to be affixed, to any goods or articles manufactured or bought, or procured, or sold, or shipped, or exported by the defendant company, or otherwise using or employing, or permitting to be used or employed, any labels, wrappers, or marks used by the late Joseph Thorley and the plaintiff, his trustees and successors in business, or so contrived and prepared as to represent or lead to the belief that the goods or articles manufactured, or sold, or shipped, or exported by the defendant company are the goods or manufacture of the late Joseph Thorley or of the plaintiffs; and also from employing, using, or circulating, or causing to be employed, used, or circulated, any circulars, pamphlets, notices, or advertisements of the late Joseph Thorley or of the plaintiffs, or which shall in any manner represent or lead to the belief that the defendant company have been or are carrying on the business of the late Joseph Thorley, or that they are his successors in business." In Lee v. Haley, L. R., 5 Ch. App. 155, there was an order by Malins, V. C., "restraining him from continuing to use, and from exhibiting or using, the name 'The Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company,' in Pall Mall, or any other name or style so framed as to be a colorable imitation of the name or style in which the plaintiffs' branch business mentioned in the bill was carried on, or as to deceive the public, or lead to the belief that the business carried on by the defendant was the same as the business carried on by the plaintiffs under the name or style of 'The Guinea Coal Company,' or was in any way connected therewith." In Prince Albert v. Strange, 2 De G. & S. 717, the court said: "By the decree it was declared, that the plaintiff was entitled to have delivered to him the impressions (by the answer of Judge admitted to be in his possession), of such of the several etchings in the pleadings mentioned, as in the catalogue and in the pleadings were stated to have been etched by the plaintiff; that is to say [they were described by reference to the numbers in the catalogue], and it was ordered that Judge should, within four days after the service of the decree, deliver up the impressions above specified on oath, and leave them with the clerk of records and writs, at the record office. And it was ordered that the defendant Strange should, within four days after service of the decree, deliver to the clerk of records and writs, at the said office, the twenty-three copies of the catalogue, being the same as were mentioned in the decree in the other suit, of even date. And the decree contained similar directions as to six copies of the catalogue admitted by Judge to be in his possession. And the clerk of records and writs was ordered to destroy these copies of the catalogue, giving notice to the solicitors of the several parties of the time and place at which he intended to do so. And it was ordered that the defendants, their servants, etc., should be restrained from making, or permitting to be made, any engraving or copy of such etchings, or any of them; and from publishing the same; and from parting with or disposing of them, or any of them, except in obedience to the decree; and from selling, or in any manner publishing the catalogue, or any work being or purporting to be a catalogue of the etchings made by the plaintiff. And the plaintiff, waiving any costs against Strange, it was ordered that Judge should pay the plaintiff's costs to the 22d of May, 1849, when Judge obtained the order to defend in forma pauperis. Liberty to apply was reserved.

order was made declaring that "the defendants, their agents, etc., be restrained from publishing or exposing to sale, any copy or copies of the defendant's said work, and from printing, publishing, or exposing to sale, any other work or publication as or being a continuation of the plaintiff's work, or of the defendant's work, which had been so published as such continuation, as aforesaid; and from printing all or any part or parts of the plaintiff's said work; and that the injunction should be continued as to any letters, etc., admitted by the answer to have been received from correspondents by the defendant, while publishing for the plaintiff."

1. In Weston v. Hemmons, Cox's Man. of Trade-Mark Cases 517, Molesworth, J., said: "The plaintiff being the inventor of a secret medicine, called 'Weston's Wizard Oil,' and the defendants having manufactured this medicine by agreement with him, after the termination of the agreement the defendants continued to use the recipe and name. Injunction granted to restrain the defendants from using or imparting the secret recipe, and from using the name, except in respect of medicines manufactured before the termination of the agreement; but the order to be discharged if the plaintiff should fail to pay for any ingredients, etc., purchased by the defendants for the purpose of the medicine, and which would have been charged in account against the plaintiff if the connection had continued."

In Morison v. Moat, 9 Hare 267, Turner, V. In Thorley's Cattle Food Co. v. Masam, 14 Ch. Div. 781, Malins, V. In James v. James, 41 L. J. Ch. 358, an order was made by Romilly, M. R., to "restrain the defendant from using the name of Robert James singly, instead of Robert Joseph James, or R. J. James; also from stating or inserting in his advertisement or circular any words or expressions asserting or suggesting that the ointment manufactured and sold by the plaintiffs is spurious and not genuine."

The injunction which I am about to grant to the plaintiffs in this case must be guarded and limited, so as not to interfere with the right of the defendant and others to use this name in the way which I think they have a right to use it. I shall restrain the defendant from using the words 'Cromac Springs' in connection with his trade or business as a manufacturer or seller of mineral waters, so as to represent that his said waters are so manufactured or sold by the plaintiffs at their works in the bill mentioned, called 'The Cromac Springs,' or from using the words 'Cromac Springs' as the name of defendant's place of business, so as to represent as aforesaid."

In Braham v. Beachim, 7 Ch. 1. In Edelsten v. Edelsten, 1 De G. J. & S. 196, the prayer of the bill was, that an account might be taken of the gains and profits made and obtained by the defendants by the sale of wire having tallies or labels attached thereto with the plaintiff's trade-mark, or a trade-mark in imitation of, or only colorably differing from that of the plaintiff stamped or impressed thereon; and that the defendants might be ordered to pay to the plaintiff the amount of such gains and profits. That the defendants might be restrained by injunction from attaching to wire not the manufacture of the plaintiff any tally or label with the plaintiff's trade-mark, or any mark in imitation thereof, or only colorably differing therefrom, stamped or impressed thereon, and from otherwise using the plaintiff's trade-mark, or any mark in imitation thereof, so as to denote or represent that the said wire was the "Anchor Brand Wire," or was the manufacture of the plaintiff, and from selling or offering for sale, or procuring to be sold any wire not being of the plaintiff's manufacture, bearing a tally or label attached thereto with the plaintiff's trade-mark, or a mark in imitation thereof, or only colorably differing therefrom, stamped or impressed thereon, or otherwise in any manner having the said trade-mark or a mark in imitation thereof, or only colorably differing therefrom, attached thereto. That the defendants might deliver up to be canceled all tallies, labels and papers in their possession, or in the possession of their servants or agents, bearing the said trade-mark so in colorable imitation of the plaintiff's as therein before mentioned, and also all tallies, labels and papers in their possession, or in the possession of their servants or agents, having the plaintiff's trade-mark or any mark in imitation thereof, or only colorably differing therefrom, stamped or impressed thereon, and also all dies for stamping or impressing the same; and that the defendants might pay all the costs of the suit. A decree was made in the terms of the prayer of the bill, which was affirmed by the chancellor. See also Foster v. Megevand, Pemberton (3d ed.) 239; Ford v. Foster, Seton (4th ed.) 236; Henderson v. Jorss, Seton (4th ed.) 236; *Upmann v. 2. In Lever v. Goodwin, 4 L. R., P. C. 492; 36 Ch. Div. 1; 57 L. T. 583, Cotton, L. J., said: "It is well known that, both in trade-mark cases and patent cases, the plaintiff is entitled, if he succeeds in getting an injunction, to take either of two forms of relief: he may either say, 'I claim from you the damage I have sustained from your wrongful act,' or 'I claim from you the profit which you have made by your wrongful act.' Mr. Healey contended that the only profit which the plaintiff could call for was that profit which arose from the sale of this soap, where the ultimate purchaser bought it, not as the defendant's, but as the plaintiff's soap. But, in my opinion, that is mistaking the whole gist of this action. The defendants, as I understand, do not sell anything to retail purchasers; what they sell, they sell to middlemen, that is to say, to people who purchase from them as wholesale merchants, and who are going to sell it by retail; and the complaint against the defendants is this: 'You have dressed up your soap in such a dress that those middlemen to whom you sell it are enabled, by its having that deceptive dress upon it, to sell it to the ultimate purchasers as the soap of the plaintiffs.' The profit for which the defendants must account is the profit which they have made by the sale of soap in that fraudulent dress to the middlemen. It is immaterial how the middlemen deal with it. If they find it for their benefit not to use it fraudulently, but to sell the soap to the purchasers from them as Goodwin's, that cannot affect the question, whether the sale by the whole business, when calculated as a business man would estimate the profit of any mercantile or manufacturing business, allowing all reasonable and proper deductions, the amount to be recovered will be the whole profit of the defendant's business in the infringing article.¹ If the plaintiff elects to take damages, it lies with him to show by distinct evidence the actual damage which he has suffered. The courts will not presume that the plaintiff would have made all the sales made by the defendant, but if plaintiff's sales have fallen off approximately to the same extent as defendant's have increased in the same region, this will be sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover this loss.² If the plaintiff has been guilty of laches in bringing suit, he may have an injunction, but cannot have an account for infringement prior to the filing of his bill.³ defendants to those middlemen of this soap in a fraudulent dress was a wrongful act. It still remains a wrongful act, because it put into the hands of the middlemen the means of committing a fraud on the plaintiffs, by selling the soap of the defendants as the soap of the plaintiffs."

1. Edelsten v. Edelsten, 10 L. T. N. S. 780.

2. Tonge v. Ward, 21 L. T. N. S. 480. In Leather Cloth Co. v. Hirschfeld, L. R., 1 Eq. 299; 13 L. T. N. S. 427; 14 W. R. 78, there was evidence to prove that the defendants manufactured several different qualities of leather cloth, and that they had at times sold pieces of cloth of three qualities impressed with the pirated trade-mark; but no evidence could be obtained by the plaintiffs, or was offered by the defendants, to show on what number of pieces the mark had been impressed. There was evidence to show what number of pieces of the different qualities was sold by the defendants, and the profit made by them on such sales, and it was shown that the prices were lower than those which used to be received by the plaintiffs for the goods marked with their marks, and that the profit was less. The Vice-Chancellor said:—"The plaintiffs had their election to have taken an account of profits or of what damages had accrued, and preferred the latter alternative; they now require the court to assume that they would have sold all the pieces of cloth which the defendant actually did sell. But how can the court assume that the persons who bought what the plaintiffs aver were inferior articles at an inferior price, would necessarily, if they had not done so, have bought the superior article at the higher price? Surely this would be an absurdly strong assumption, and that in the absence of any evidence that any of the purchasers had at any time been customers of the plaintiffs. But even supposing that such an assumption were possible, why is the court to assume that, even if the purchasers would have bought the higher-priced article, they would have bought it of the plaintiffs? There were or there may have been persons licensed by the plaintiffs to use their trade-mark and to sell goods manufactured by their process, or there may have been, and doubtless were, persons who had purchased from the plaintiffs, with a view of selling again. How can the court assume that the supposed purchasers would have passed by all these persons and have purchased direct from the plaintiffs? Yet this is what the court is called on to infer from the mere fact that certain goods were sold by the defendants, and that some of those goods were marked with imitations of the plaintiffs' marks. Principle would seem to determine that no such assumption can be made, and that it lies on the plaintiffs to prove some distinct damage from the use of their trade-mark by showing the loss of custom or something of that kind, which has not been done in this case. I must therefore hold that the plaintiffs have suffered no damage by the defendants' use of their trade-mark." See also Rodgers v. Nowill, 5 M. G. & S. 109; 17 L. J. C. P. 52; 11 Jur. 1039; 10 L. In the United States the rule is even more liberal: where a trade-mark is proven to have been infringed, the owner is entitled to recover the entire profit realized by the defendant on the sale of the article bearing the infringing mark, or upon his work in connection therewith; but defendant is only accountable for sales actually made, or for work actually done for an infringer. Where a lawful and unlawful business are so mixed that the actual expense of conducting the unlawful business cannot be ascertained, the expenses of the general business will not be allowed as deductions.¹ Plaintiff may also recover such actual damages to

J. Ch. 680, James, L. J., said that the question remains as to what ought to be done with respect to the account. Having regard to this, that what we are doing is establishing a legal right, and giving an equitable remedy ancillary to and consequent upon that legal right, and having regard to the fact that the plaintiff did certainly make a misrepresentation which he was not justified in making, in his advertisements and invoices to the effect that the shirt was protected by patent; having regard to that, and having regard also to the fact that the plaintiff seems not to have been very vigilant in endeavoring to ascertain who were interfering with his trade, and having regard also to the probability that the extent of the trade of the defendants would by no means be a measure of the injury done to the plaintiff himself, because the plaintiff has not anything like such an extensive trade as the defendants; having regard to all these circumstances, we are of opinion that the account should not begin from an earlier period than the filing of the bill and that the plaintiff is entitled to the ordinary account from the filing of the bill.

1. In Société Anonyme v. Western Distilling Co., 46 Fed. Rep. 921, Thayer, J., said: "The chief contention in this case arises over the refusal of the master to make allowance for certain expenses, in his computation of the profits realized by the defendant by imitating complainant's labels, brands, trade-marks, etc. . . . While it is customary in the computation of profits in this class of cases to make allowance for expenses, yet the expenses so allowed must be expenses necessarily incurred in the unlawful venture, which would not have been incurred but for engaging in such venture. When an unlawful business is carried on in connection with the defendant's regular business, and the same agencies are employed in doing that which is lawful and that which is unlawful, no rule of law of which I am aware requires any deduction for expenses in estimating the profits of the unlawful business."

In El Modelo Cigar Mfg. Co. v. Gato, 25 Fla. 886, Mitchell, J., said: "In the case at bar the bill prays for discovery, an accounting of profits, injunction, damages, and general relief, and the only ground of objection to the bill raised by the second ground of defendant's demurrer is that the bill prays damages. That a man whose trade-marks have been infringed upon, as in this case, is entitled to compensation for the infringement, is unquestionable; and it strikes us that it makes no difference whether the compensation to which the complainant is entitled is called 'profits' or 'damages.' What is an accounting, but the method by which to ascertain the complainant's damages or compensation for the wrong and injury done him by the defendants? . . . A party whose trade-mark has been violated is entitled to recover all profits realized by the wrongdoer from sales of the spurious article, and also damages resulting from such violation. . . . The owner of a trade-mark is entitled to nominal damages for the violation of his trade-mark, although it is not shown that he has sustained actual damages, and although the defendant's articles are not inferior in quality to his own."

In Benkert v. Feder, 34 Fed. Rep. 534, Sawyer, J., said: "The boots and shoes sold were not manufactured by defendants, but purchased from other manufacturers at the East, and then sold by them with the simulated trade-mark of plaintiff stamped upon the soles and on the inside of the boot top. . . . The defendants insist that the measure of damages or profits should be limited to the difference in price for which the goods would sell with the trade-mark upon them and the price for which the same goods would sell without it. I am unable to adopt any such rule. It would be exceedingly indefinite, and equivalent to giving no damages or profits at all. How would it be possible for anyone to say how much less a pair of boots or shoes would sell without, than with the trade-mark upon it? There would be no definite measure of compensation for the injury. One who deliberately and knowingly uses another's trade-mark, commits a palpable and unmitigated fraud, for which there is no possible excuse. He seeks to avail himself of the good reputation of another's goods.

. . . . To adopt as the measure of compensation for such injuries the difference between the price for which the spurious goods would sell without the trade-mark and for which they will sell with it imprinted thereon, would be a mockery of justice. In my judgment, the infringer should at least account for the entire profits made upon the goods wrongfully sold with the trade-mark impressed thereon. . . . There may also be damages beyond the mere profits resulting to the owner of the trade-mark infringed, which he may recover. . . . The trade-mark sells the whole article, however inferior or injurious in that particular, and prevents the sale of the owner's goods of equal amount; at least, that is the fraudulent purpose, and the natural tendency, whether always accomplished or not; and the injured party should have at least the whole profit resulting from the wrongful act, and such I understand and hold the rule to be. The damage may be much more arising from destroying the reputation of the owner's goods. . . . Let reference be made to a master to ascertain and report the amount of profits and damages."

In Atlantic Milling Co. v. Rowland, 27 Fed. Rep. 24; P. & S. Am. Trade-Mark Cases 1063, Wheeler, J., said: "The final decree establishes the right of the orator to the use of the word 'Champion' as a trade-mark for flour; that the defendants have infringed upon that right; and that the orator is entitled to recover of them the profits to the defendants, and damages to the orator, due to the infringement. . . . It is argued that the evidence does not show that the orator would have made this profit if the defendants had not. This might be true, and not affect the rights of the parties. If the defendants made profits by their invasion of the orator's rights, the orator is entitled to them, whether the same profits would have been made by the orator or not, and not to any more if they would, for the same profits could not be made by both."

In Sawyer v. Kellogg, 9 Fed. Rep. 601; P. & S. Am. Trade-Mark Cases 564, Nixon, J., said: "This is a motion to strike from the decree entered in the above case the clauses which direct an accounting and the payment of costs.

"1. As to the accounting. The counsel for the defendant rests his application to strike out on two grounds: First, because the proofs show that the defendant is not the person liable to account to the complainant. The evidence is that the defendant was largely engaged in packing blues on his own account and for others in the trade; that all the blues covered by the infringing trade-mark were put up by him for the firm of James S. Barron & Co. . . . who placed the same upon the market; that he made no sales to any one of the articles thus packed, but received pay from his employers solely for the work and labor of packing. The bill of complaint prays for an injunction, and for profits and damages. Having been adjudged an infringer of the trade-mark of the complainant, an injunction has been issued against him. Under the above state of facts, should he be compelled to account for profits and damages? We have no doubt about the propriety of the reference or of the liability of the defendant, if it can be shown on the accounting that profits were made by his work and labor, or that damages resulted to the complainant therefrom. If he did not sell, the profits on the sales are not chargeable to him; but if any profits came to him for preparing the article for those who did sell, they belong to the complainant, and the object of the accounting is to ascertain that fact. And if the defendant has damaged the complainant by the unlawful use of his trade-mark, the nature and extent of the damage is a proper subject of inquiry. Second, because the complainant has forfeited his right to an account by laches in bringing his suit. In England the rule is stringent in trade-mark cases that lack of diligence in suing deprives the complainant in equity of the right either to an injunction or an account. Our courts are more liberal in this respect. A long lapse of time will not deprive the owner of a trade-mark of an injunction against an infringer, but a reasonable diligence is required of a complainant in asserting his rights, if he would hold a wrongdoer to an account for profits and damages. This rule, however, applies only to those cases where there has been an acquiescence after a knowledge of the infringement is brought home to the complainant. Such is not the present case. Although the defendant began the packing of bluing in the packages complained of early in the year 1878, there is no evidence that the complainant knew it until a short time before the suit was brought." In Graham v. Plate, 40 Cal. 593; 6 Am. Rep. 639, Crockett, J., said: "It clearly appears in proof, that the defendant has made a profit of $1,770 by the sale of pistols made in imitation of the Deringer pistol, and bearing Deringer's trade-mark stamped thereon without his consent; and the court rendered a judgment for this amount against the defendant. It is insisted, on behalf of the defendant, that the profit realized by him from sales of the spurious article, under the simulated trade-mark, is not a proper measure of damages. It is conceded, that this is the proper rule in an action for damages for the infringement of a patent. It is said that the patentee, having the exclusive right to manufacture and vend the patented article, is entitled, legally and equitably, to all the profits made by any one from the manufacture and sale of it in violation of the rights of the patentees; but that one, who has acquired an exclusive right to use a particular trade-mark, has not thereby acquired an exclusive right to make and vend the commodity to which the trade-mark is affixed; that any one has the right to make and vend the same commodity, in exact imitation of that made by the owner of the trade-mark, and that the offense consists, not in imitating the commodity, but the trade-mark only. Hence, it is argued, the profit made by a sale of the commodity ought not to be a measure of the damages; but the party is entitled to only such damages as resulted from a piracy of the trade-mark; and the profit realized by a sale of the commodity does not establish the amount of this damage, which may be greater or less than the amount of the profit. It is evident that the profit realized by the wrongdoer is not the only measure of damages. The spurious article may have injured the credit of the genuine one, and the profits of the owner of the trade-mark may have been greatly reduced, whilst the wrongdoer has made little or no profit. But whilst the profit made by the latter does not limit the recovery, the owner of the trade-mark is entitled to all the profit which was in fact realized. In sales made under a simulated trade-mark, it is impossible to decide how much of the profit resulted from the intrinsic value of the commodity in the market, and how much from the credit given to it by the trade-mark. In the very nature of the case it would be impossible to ascertain to what extent he could have effected sales and at what prices, except for the use of the trade-mark. No one will deny that, on every principle of reason and justice, the owner of the trade-mark is entitled to so much of the profits as resulted from the use of the trade-mark. The difficulty lies in ascertaining what proportion of the profit is due to the trade-mark, and what to the intrinsic value of the commodity; and as this cannot be ascertained with any reasonable certainty, it is more consonant with reason and justice that the owner of the trade-mark should have the whole profit than that he should be deprived of any part of it by the fraudulent act of the defendant. It is the same principle which is applicable to a confusion of goods. If one wrongfully mixes his own goods with those of another, so that they cannot be distinguished and separated, he shall lose the whole, for the reason that the fault is his; and it is but just that he should suffer the loss rather than an innocent party, who, in no degree, contributed to the wrong. I think, therefore, there was no error in awarding to the plaintiff the whole profit made by the defendant. This view of the law appears to be supported by authority. . . . But if there were no authorities on the point, every consideration of reason, justice and sound policy, demands that one who fraudulently uses the trade-mark of another should not be allowed to shield himself from liability for the profit he has made by the use of the trade-mark, on the plea that it is impossible to determine how much of the profit is due to the trade-mark, himself as he is able to prove by direct evidence;¹ and in any case he may recover nominal damages and costs. Exemplary or and how much to the intrinsic value of the commodity. The fact that it is impossible to apportion the profit, renders it just that he should lose the whole."

In Stonebraker v. Stonebraker, 33 Md. 269, Brent, J., said: "The decree of the court below is correct in so far as it proceeds to restrain and enjoin the appellants. But that part of it which directs an account, is in some respects, erroneous. Samuel Stonebraker and Hoffman, by the terms of dissolution of the partnership between themselves and Henry Stonebraker, . . . reserved the right to sell under these trade-marks the stock on hand or in the hands of agents at the time of dissolution, and for the sales of such stock, no matter by whom made, whether by themselves or their vendees, no account can be demanded. The other parties, Passano, Abraham Stonebraker and the Clotworthys, not being bound by any contract to the contrary, had the right under the law, as we have stated it, to manufacture the medicines or preparations to whatever extent they chose, and no accounting for such, as they manufactured simply, can be required of them. Their liability to account is limited to sales, under the prohibited use of the protected trade-marks, of such articles as were not part of the stock referred to. The decree is undoubtedly erroneous in requiring an account, as by its terms it clearly does, from these parties, of articles which they have manufactured and not sold, and should more clearly except from all accounting, by any of the parties, for sales of such articles as constituted part of the stock on hand and held by the Stonebrakers and Hoffman at the time of the dissolution of that firm."

The case of Peltz v. Eichele, 62 Mo. 179, was a suit for the defendant's breach of his covenant that he would not engage in the manufacture of matches for a stipulated time. The principles which controlled the decision are closely analogous to those involved in trade-mark cases. Hough, J., said: "The object in purchasing the good-will undoubtedly was to retain the old customers of A. Eichele & Co., and the labels or wrappers bearing the name of the firm, or other brands or marks, by which the goods manufactured by that firm might be identified, are quasi trade-marks. But there is no allegation that the good-will transferred to the plaintiffs was in any way injured or impaired by defendant having used his trade-mark or labels. The profits made by the defendant, therefore, to which the plaintiffs claim they are entitled, are not the profits made on articles, the exclusive right to manufacture and sell which belonged to the plaintiffs, nor the profits derived from the use of the label or trade-mark, the exclusive right to which was in the plaintiffs, though the exclusive right to make the goods on which it was used, was not in the plaintiffs; but the profits realized from the general decline and diversion of the plaintiff's business, occasioned by defendant. If plaintiffs lost less than defendant made, they cannot recover the whole of defendant's profits; if plaintiffs lost more than defendant made, they would not be limited to defendant's profits. What the plaintiffs have lost by the defendant's breach of covenant, and not what the defendant has gained thereby, is the legal measure of damages in this case. If the plaintiffs had manufactured matches to the utmost capacity of their factory, and sold all they made at unreduced prices, notwithstanding the defendant may have, in violation of his covenant, engaged in the same business in St. Louis and realized large profits, the plaintiffs could only have recovered nominal damages, for, in that case, they would have lost nothing.

. . . In ascertaining the amount of this damage, the profits made by the defendant constitute an element; but only such profits made by the defendant as the plaintiffs have lost by reason of the wrongful act of the defendant complained of in the petition. In ascertaining the profits lost to the plaintiffs, the profits made by the defendant may properly be given in evidence in connection with the diversion of customers from plaintiffs to defendant, and the amount of their purchases, the product of the plaintiffs' factory and the amount of their sales, and the reduction in price of the articles sold, if any, in

In Hostetter v. Vowinkle, 1 Dill. (U. S.) 329, Dillon, C. J., said: "The law is well settled that a party who has appropriated a particular trade-mark to distinguish his goods from other similar goods, has a right or property in it which entitles him to its exclusive use. This right is of such a nature that equity will protect it by injunction from invasion, and if it has been invaded, the wrongdoer is liable for the damage he has thereby caused the party whose trade-mark he has adopted or illegally imitated; which damage will ordinarily be the loss of profits caused by the illegal or fraudulent infringement. . . . Applying these principles to the present case, the defendants are liable to the plaintiffs, not only in respect of the bitters which they sold prior to Oct. 1st, using the plaintiff's trade-mark in full, but for those which they sold after making the alterations above mentioned, such as changing the name 'Hostetter' to 'Holstetter,' etc. From the evidence of one of the defendants, I find that he admits sales at least to the extent of two hundred dozen bottles. The evidence shows that the sales of the plaintiffs, in Omaha, fell off during the time the defendants were manufacturing and selling their imitation bitters to even a greater amount than this. I am satisfied that the plaintiffs' sales have been lessened at least to the extent of the two hundred dozen bottles, and that their profits would have been, on each case of one dozen bottles, the sum of four dollars, which would make in all the sum of eight hundred dollars. A decree will be entered for this amount and also making perpetual the injunction."

In Marsh v. Billings, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 332; 54 Am. Dec. 723, Fletcher, J., said: "Upon the evidence in the case, the jury should have been instructed, that if they were satisfied by the evidence that the plaintiffs had made the agreement with the lessee of the Revere House as stated, they had, under and by virtue of that agreement, an exclusive right to use the words 'Revere House,' for the purpose of indicating and holding themselves out as having the patronage of that establishment . . . that if the defendants used these words, . . . that would be a fraud on the plaintiffs, and a violation of their rights, for which this action would lie, without proof of actual or specific damage; that if the jury found for the plaintiffs, they would be entitled to such damages as the jury, upon the whole evidence, should be satisfied they had sustained; that the damages would not be confined to the loss of such passengers as the plaintiff could prove had actually been diverted from their coaches to those of the defendants; but that the jury would be justified in making such inferences, as to the loss of passengers and injury sustained by the plaintiffs, as they might think were warranted by the whole evidence in the case."

In Thomson v. Winchester, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 216; 76 Am. Dec. 733, Shaw, C. J., said: "The court are of opinion, that if the defendant made and sold medicines, calling them 'Thomsonian Medicines,' and sold them, or placed them in the hands of others to sell, as and for the medicines made and prepared by the plaintiff, so that persons purchasing the same supposed and believed that they were purchasing the medicines made and prepared by the plaintiff, it was a fraud upon the plaintiff, and an injury to his rights, for which the law will presume some damage. Such a case, therefore, being proved, the plaintiff will be entitled to recover nominal damage, at least, and something more, if he can make it appear to the satisfaction of a jury that he has sustained more than nominal damage."

1. In Addington v. Cullinane, 28 Mo. App. 241, Lewis, P. J., said: "There was a jury trial (below) and a verdict in favor of plaintiffs for three hundred and fifty dollars. . . . The court (below) gave for the plaintiffs the following instruction: 'If they (the jury) find for the plaintiffs, the measure of damages of the plaintiffs is the actual net profits made by the defendants on the goods sold by them prior to Sept. 3d, 1886, unless the jury further believe, from the evidence, that the act or acts of the defendants were willful and malicious; then the jury may find exemplary damages in addition to the above.' If the plaintiffs had demanded an accounting of the profits made by the defendants, on the equitable ground that those profits were made by the use of the plaintiffs' property, the instruction might have been substantially applicable. But in a common-law action for damages, in cases of this class, such a method of arriving at the plaintiffs' rights has never been sanctioned. In 3 Sutherland on Damages, pp. 630, 631, the law is explained . . . thus: 'The compensation to the owner of a trade-mark, for the injury he suffers from a wrongful and unauthorized use of it by another, is ascertained and computed on substantially the same principles as damages for infringements of patents and copyrights. . . . The net profits may be recovered in equity, as profits made by the use of the plaintiff's property, and the defendant, as constructive trustee, compelled to account for them. But at law only damages can be recovered, and they will be measured by the plaintiff's loss and not by the defendant's gain; the profits are there held not to be the measure of damages, nor an element of them, where there is any other method of ascertaining and measuring them.

Nor will the proof of the defendant's profits warrant a legal presumption that the plaintiff's loss is a corresponding amount.' Another elementary writer says, in the same connection: 'But the damages must be proved from the evidence. A mere possible injury furnishes no ground of damages. . . . The patentee may sue at law for the damages which he has sustained, and those damages he is entitled to recover, whether the defendant has made any profits or not. In trade-mark cases, the rule is much the same.' Browne on Trade-Marks, §§ 505, 507. In Leather Cloth Co. v. Hirschfield, L. R., 1 Eq. 298, it was held that the law would not presume that the plaintiffs would have sold the amount of goods sold by the defendant; but the burden of proof was on the plaintiffs to show special damage by loss of custom or otherwise. Peltz v. Eichele, 62 Mo. 161, was a suit for the defendant's breach of his covenant that he would not engage in the manufacture of matches for a stipulated time. The principles which controlled the decision were closely analogous to those involved in the present case. Said the court: 'What the plaintiffs have lost by the defendant's breach of covenant, and not what the defendant has gained thereby, is the legal measure of damages in this case.' It was there in proof that the plaintiff's sales had been reduced about one-half after the defendant embarked in the business in violation of his covenant. There seems to be no disagreement among the authorities on this question. In the present case, even if the erroneous instruction had not been given, the plaintiffs could have recovered no more than nominal damages, since there was no testimony tending to show that they had sustained any actual loss by the facts proved."

In Taylor v. Carpenter, 2 Woodb. & M. (U.S.) 21; 11 Paige (N. Y.) 292; 2 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 603, Woodbury, J., said: "On the question of damages, however, in respect to giving 'exemplary' ones, there is some doubt, whether the charge was in the exact form deemed proper under modern analyses and decisions on this point. . . . That the jury should have given more than nominal damages, I have no doubt, and I have as little doubt that there were materials enough in the case, from which to estimate actual damages, such as the probable extent of sales by the defendant under these marks, and the loss of sales and profits therein by the plaintiffs. The jury would, in a case like this, if a known and deliberate imitation, often renewed and very prejudicial to the plaintiffs, not be very nice in their data and inferences, but be sure to give enough to cover all losses, and prove an ample indemnity. . . . Not 'smart money' or 'vindictive damages,' but full atonement for the wrong done. . . . In a case like this, if in any, no reason exists for giving greater damages than have actually been sustained or what have been called compensatory."

1. In Low v. Fels, 35 Fed. Rep. 361, Butler, J., said: "The complainants are not entitled to an account. For nearly four years prior to the date of suit they had notice that their trade-mark was in common use by dealers in soaps in this country, and did nothing to prevent it until about the time of filing this bill. . . . There is no evidence of fraud on the respondent's part. He did not even know of the complainants' existence, or of the existence of the rights they set up. To hold him liable to account for his past sales, and

8. Costs.—The English rule as to costs is framed with great strictness for the purpose of preventing litigation and protecting an innocent defendant. The chancellors, as well as the common-law judges, take wide latitude in awarding costs, and seem to regard it as a duty on the part of the plaintiff to at least notify an infringing defendant of his intention to bring suit, and if the defendant at once abandons the use of the mark and offers to make all reparation, the plaintiff will be allowed an injunction, but at his own cost. In some cases, however, it has been damages to the complainants, in view of such laches, would be unjust."

In Menendez v. Holt, 128 U. S. 514, Fuller, C. J. (affirming Holt v. Menendez, 23 Fed. Rep. 869), said: "Counsel in conclusion earnestly contends that whatever rights appellees may have had were lost by laches, and the desire is intimated that we should reconsider McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245, so far as it was therein stated that, even though a complainant were guilty of such delay in seeking relief upon infringement as to preclude him from obtaining an account of gains and profits, yet, if he were otherwise so entitled, an injunction against further infringement might properly be awarded." After stating the rule of reasonable diligence and applying facts of case the court further said: "It is idle to talk of acquiescence, in view of these facts. Delay in bringing suit there was, and such delay as to preclude recovery of damages for prior infringement; but there was neither conduct nor negligence which could be held to destroy the right to prevention of further injury."

In Holt v. Menendez, 23 Fed. Rep. 869; 32 Pat. Off. Gaz. 136; P. & S. Am. Trade-Mark Cases 986, Coxe, J., said: "Upon the question of laches, however, I am constrained to say that the complainant's conduct has been such that the relief granted must be limited to an injunction. Ryder commenced using the brand in 1869, and has used it continuously since. That the complainants knew of this, certainly as early as 1871, is not disputed. That they protested at all is denied. Certainly there was no vigor or courage shown by them until just prior to the commencement of this suit, in 1882. That they did not consent is true, but it is equally true that, for men who believed their rights invaded, their course was inconsistent and misleading. Ryder might well have imagined that they did not intend to call him to an account. The circumstances were such as to justify the belief on his part that he was licensed, by silence, to use the trade-mark. It would be inequitable to compel him to pay for its use during the long years that the complainants slept upon their rights. In endeavoring to reach a just result, the court should not overlook the fact that the delay in commencing the suit was unreasonable, and that some of the evils of which the complainants complain are attributable to their own laches in this regard."

In McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 257, Clifford, J., said: "Cases frequently arise where a court of equity will refuse the prayer of the complainant for an account of gains and profits, on the ground of delay in asserting his rights, even when the facts proved render it proper to grant an injunction to prevent future infringement. . . . Relief of the kind is constantly refused, even where the right of the party to an injunction is acknowledged because of an infringement, as in case of acquiescence or want of fraudulent intent. . . . Acquiescence of long standing is proved in this case, and inexcusable laches in seeking redress, which show beyond all doubt that the complainant was not entitled to an account nor to a decree for gains or profits."

In Weed v. Peterson, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 178, Learned, J., said: "Now, without going over in detail the cases on this subject, it will be found that they all speak of 'imitation of trade-marks,' 'adoption of trade-marks,' 'colorable resemblances,' and the like; implying in all instances that the acts of the party charged with doing a wrong are intentional. To illustrate: if a manufacturer had adopted and for a long time used a trade-mark, so that he had acquired an undoubted right to protection, and another manufacturer, in ignorance of this fact, should accidentally 'adopt precisely the same mark, there would be no intentional injury.

held, and it seems the better rule, that a plaintiff has an undoubted right to begin suit at once, and if defendant at once submits and offers to pay costs to that time, as well as allow an injunction to issue as prayed, and the plaintiff rejects this offer, he does so at his peril; and if an account of profits and damages is subsequently denied, as it is likely to be when an innocent defendant at once submits, the plaintiff will be required to pay all costs from the date of defendant's offer. If, however, the defendant contests the plaintiff's claim to an injunction, he must pay costs, when a permanent injunction issues.¹

The rightful owner of the trade-mark, by giving to the other person notice of his right, could place the latter in the wrong in respect to anything thereafter done in violation of the owner's rights. But as to all previous acts, it could not be said that there was any 'imitation,' or 'adoption,' or 'colorable resemblance.' There would have been, previous to such notice, none of that intent to palm off the manufactures of one man for those of another, which appears in all cases on this subject. The case is still stronger where the defendants not only are ignorant of the plaintiffs' claim, but have been induced, by a previous litigation, to acknowledge a similar claim made to the same trade-mark by a third party. I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs should have a permanent injunction, as prayed for, and that they should recover costs; but I do not think that they are entitled to any damages, and in that respect the prayer of the complaint is denied."

Ch. 122; Coats v. Holbrook, 2 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 586. In Upmann v. Forester, 24 Ch. Div. 231, Chitty, J., said: "The only question I have to decide is who is to pay the costs of this action. The plaintiffs say they are entitled to costs, and the defendant says that, even if he does not get costs, he should not be called upon to pay the plaintiffs' costs. . . . Ought I to deprive the plaintiffs of their right to costs because they did not give the defendant notice before commencing their action? I do not think that this is a case where it would be just for me to deprive the plaintiffs of their costs. . . . In Upmann v. Elkan, L. R., 7 Ch. App. 130, 132, Lord Hatherley, referring to the argument that mere carriers of goods bearing a fraudulent trade-mark are guilty of no offense which could support an injunction, says: 'I cannot conceive a doctrine more dangerous or mischievous, or more fatal to the authority of the court with respect to trade-marks,' and the decision that the plaintiffs were not entitled to costs rested upon the fact that inasmuch as the plaintiffs had given notice, and had obtained all possible redress before bill filed, they ought not to have filed a bill for an injunction. Had the plaintiffs given no notice, but forthwith commenced their suit, the decision, as to costs, would have been the other way. . . . I have heard the late master of the rolls say that if you did give notice before action and get an undertaking from the defendants, as you have the defendants'

In the United States the simple rule, that the losing party pays all costs, prevails with few exceptions. It has been held that where defendant's infringement was inadvertent, and he at once discontinued the same upon being notified, and plaintiff subsequently brought suit, that he was entitled to an injunction, submission, you would be wrong in moving; therefore, if the plaintiff moves after notice and submission, he would not get his costs. . . . In the case of Cooper v. Whittingham, 15 Ch. Div. 501, it was held that the defendant must pay the costs of the action, because the importation of the spurious articles was an infringement of the plaintiffs' copyright, and an unlawful act, for the consequences of which the defendant must be held liable, notwithstanding that he determined not to sell the articles as soon as he recognized that their importation was an infringement. The fact that the act is wrong by statute is immaterial; it is sufficient if the act is wrong, whether it be so by statute or common law, or an infringement of equitable rights. As I have already said, here there had been a wrongful user prior to the commencement of the action, and the plaintiffs, therefore, were entitled to an injunction or undertaking. They are, therefore, also entitled to costs. Although as against the defendant the case may be a hard one, he must not on that account be excused from payment of costs. As the late master of the rolls said in Cooper v. Whittingham, he cannot be allowed to escape by saying, 'I never intended to do wrong,' and to use an observation of the same learned judge, as there is no fund out of which successful plaintiffs can receive costs, their costs must be paid by defendants, although they may be innocent." See also Caruncho v. Highmoor, 27 Sol. J. 199.

In Cooper v. Whittingham, 15 Ch. Div. 501, Jessel, M. R., said: "As I understand the law as to costs it is this, that where a plaintiff comes to enforce a legal right, and there has been no misconduct on his part—no omission or neglect which would induce the court to deprive him of his costs—the court has no discretion, and cannot take away the plaintiff's right to costs. . . . There is but one thing more. I have often remarked that there is an idea prevalent that a defendant can escape paying costs by saying, 'I never intended to do wrong.' That is no answer, for, as I have often said, some one must pay the costs, and I do not see who else but the defendants who do wrong are to pay them." See also Wheeler v. Johnston, L. R., 3 Ir. 284; In re Hyde, 7 Ch. Div. 724; In re Brandreth's Trade-Mark, L. R., 9 Ch. 618; In re Kuhn, Cox's Man. of Trade-Mark Cases 637; Moet v. Pickering, 8 Ch. Div. 372; Metzler v. Wood, 8 Ch. Div. 606; *Rose v. In Twentsche Stoom Bleekery Goor v. Ellinger, 26 W. R. 70, Malins, V. C., said: "There had been a clear and fraudulent infringement of the plaintiff's mark; there would be a perpetual injunction against the defendant. Considering his conduct since the writ was issued, he must pay all the costs of the action; although, had he not opposed the motion, and having regard to the fact that the plaintiffs had not given him proper notice before issuing the writ, the decision as to the costs might have been different."

In Colburn v. Simms, 2 Hare 560, Wigram, V. C., said: "If a plaintiff, immediately after the suit is commenced, is offered and may obtain all he seeks, and still thinks proper to go on with his suit, the court may give him his decree, but will not give him the costs of the suit so unnecessarily prosecuted. I think that is the whole principle of the judgment in Millington v. Fox, 3 Myl. & C. 338. Lord Cottenham had not his attention called to the fact, that the expense of filing the bill had been incurred before the plaintiffs received the letter offering compensation, and he certainly forfeits his judgment by saying that the defendants in that case were innocent parties, having committed the wrong ignorantly, which cannot be said of Dr. Granville in this case; but I think I am justified by that authority in saying, that where a defendant offers to give all that a plaintiff is entitled to, and the plaintiff refuses the offer, and says, 'Because you have committed a fraud, I will exercise my power of hearing you with a chancery suit,' this court will refuse the plaintiff his subsequent costs." See but without damages or costs. In some cases, where both plaintiff and defendant are in fault, costs will be divided.¹

9. Appeal.—Appeals in trade-mark cases in the state courts follow the same course as all other cases under the existing local practice. In the United States courts, the question of appeals is regulated by the act of March 3d, 1891, 26 U. S. Statutes at Large, p. 826, ch. 517. This act creates the circuit court of appeals and prescribes its jurisdiction. This jurisdiction, as applicable to trade-mark cases, is peculiar. Section 5 provides for appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States direct from the circuit courts, in some cases omitting the circuit court of appeals. Such a case is one in which the jurisdiction of the court is in issue. "This question would arise in a suit on a registered trade-mark where the infringer was not using the trade-mark in trade with a foreign nation." A second case would be one "in which the constitutionality of any law of the United States is drawn in question." Such a question would probably arise where the construction or constitutionality of a trade-mark statute was involved. Section 6 provides that the decision of the circuit court of appeals shall be final in all cases in which the jurisdiction is dependent entirely upon the difference of citizenship. In all trade-mark cases cognizable by the courts of the United States, except such as are based upon the registration statute, the jurisdiction will depend upon the fact that "the suit or controversy . . . is between aliens and citizens of the United States, or citizens of different states." In such a case, all the parties on one side must be citizens of a different state or states from all the parties on cases cited in note to Pemberton v. Topham, 1 Beav. 316; Holden v. Kynaston, 2 Beav. 205. Morison v. Salmon, 2 Scott N. R. 449.

In Millington v. Fox, 3 Myl. & C. 338, Cottenham Lord Chancellor, said: "The question remains, what is to be done as to the costs? Now, the question of costs in chancery is left to the discretion of the court. That discretion ought to be exercised, as far as possible, according to some principle; and I am very much disposed, as a general rule, to make the costs follow the result; because, however doubtful the title may be, or however proper it may be to dispute it, it is but fair that the party who really has the right should be reimbursed, as far as giving him the costs of the suit can reimburse him. But then there is another object which the court must keep in view, namely, to repress unnecessary litigation. It strikes me, therefore, that this is exactly a case in which the court is repressing useless litigation by refusing the plaintiffs the costs of the cause. They waive the account. They must have a perpetual injunction against the use of the marks in question, but without the costs of the cause." See also Fradello v. Weller, 2 R. & M. 247.

1. Weed v. Peterson, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 178.

In Sawyer v. Kellogg, 9 Fed. Rep. 601, Nixon, D. J., said: "As to the matter of costs, we find nothing in this case to take it out of the ordinary rule that a decree for an infringement and an injunction carries costs. The only reason suggested by the counsel for the defendant was that no demand was made before suit that the defendant should cease to use the label. We have never understood that in such cases a demand was necessary, nor that an infringer, who stoutly contests the suit to the end, should be relieved from the payment of the costs which have been incurred in consequence of his wrongdoing and his litigation."

Plaintiff used as a trade-mark for his whisky the words "Chesnut Grove," defendants inadvertently employed the

the other side.¹ In all such cases the decision of the circuit court of appeals will be final, unless a division is certified to the supreme court, or a writ of certiorari is granted by the supreme court to review the decision.

This section does not provide that cases arising under the trade-mark registration statute of the United States shall be finally decided by the circuit court of appeals, hence, under the last clause of this section, an appeal will lie in trade-mark cases arising under the registration statute from the circuit court of appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States without regard to the amount in controversy.

Section 7 provides for appeals from interlocutory orders or decrees, granting injunctions or continuing the same, provided the appeal is taken within thirty days of the entry of such order or decree. It has been held by the circuit courts of appeal that this section of the act means, all interlocutory orders or decrees passed on the merits of the final hearing, and not mere discretionary orders, such as preliminary injunctions pendente lite.²

same designation, but, upon being notified, discontinued its use. An action for an injunction was brought, and an injunction was granted, but without costs or damages. Wharton v. Thurber, Cox's Man. of Trade-Mark Cases 663.

In McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245, Clifford, J., said: "Acquiescence of long standing is proved in this case, and inexcusable laches in seeking redress, which show beyond all doubt that the complainant was not entitled to an account nor to a decree for gains or profits; but infringement having been proven, showing that the injunction was properly ordered, he is entitled to the costs in the circuit court; but the decree for an account and for the supposed gains and profits being erroneous, the respondent, as appellant, is entitled to costs in this court."

In Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. Garner, 54 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 297, Barrett, J., said: "There is, therefore, no just reason why the injunction, at least, should be refused upon the ground of laches. It was properly refused pendente lite. The plaintiff's case was not so clear as to warrant the interference of the court before the hearing upon the pleadings and proofs. As to the correctness of that interlocutory decision, there can scarcely be two opinions; that is, as to the result. Much of the reasoning upon the general merits of the case was unnecessary, and it certainly is not binding upon the special term, sitting to try the issues, especially as the facts fairly deducible from the testimony now before the court differ in many respects from what appeared in the ex parte affidavits read upon the motion. There must, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff, enjoining the defendants from the use of the word 'Amoskeag,' but without damages or account of profits, and, under all the circumstances of the case, without costs."

In Fetridge v. Wells, 4 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 144, Duer, J., said: "Certainly the plaintiff, in the present case, has no better right, and hence the injunction that, if continued, would secure to him such a monopoly, must be dissolved. The motion for its dissolution is, however, granted without costs, since, although the plaintiff might be justly required to pay costs, the defendants have certainly no title to receive them. They represent Rice, whose conduct and proceedings have been just as blamable as those of the plaintiff—there is not a shade of difference between them."

1. Blake v. McKim, 103 U. S. 336.

2. In Richmond v. Atwood, 52 Fed. Rep. 10, Aldrich, D. J., said: "Upon reargument of the foregoing motion, the question is raised as to the right of this court to entertain an appeal at the stage of the proceeding reached in this cause; and, in the event that jurisdiction exists, the further question is presented, whether the mandate of this court should direct a final disposition of the cause in the court below. After considering the briefs and rearguments, we find no reason for doubting the correctness of the conclusion stated in the former opinion as to the merits, and the motion for a rehearing and the petition for certification to the supreme court are denied, and we do not feel called upon to add anything to the reasons already stated upon this branch of the case. . . . Of course, in our endeavor to ascertain the meaning of this section of the statute, we must bear in mind that, prior to its enactment, an appeal from an interlocutory injunction order was unknown in the federal courts. Having in view, therefore, this rule of law and the plain language of the statute; considering also that the purpose of the law-maker, plainly expressed, was to give a right of appeal, not conferred by the general provisions of the statute as to appeals from final decision—it seems to us evident that it was intended to remove the restriction, and extend the right to all that class of interlocutory orders or decrees which interfere with the possession of property, or operate in restraint of a party's business. . . . It will be observed, from an examination of the cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, that a decree in patent cases, declaring the patent in question valid, and that it has been infringed, and for an injunction and an accounting, has uniformly been referred to as an interlocutory decree, and the cases are numerous, like Barnard v. Gibson, 7 How. (U. S.) 650; Forgay v. Conrad, 6 How. (U. S.) 201; Humiston v. Stainthorp, 2 Wall. (U. S.) 106; Milwaukee, etc., R. Co. v. Soutter, 2 Wall. (U. S.) 510, 521; Beebe v. Russell, 19 How. (U. S.) 283; Keystone Manganese and Iron Co. v. Martin, 132 U. S. 91, where, upon an appeal from a decree determining the general property right granting an injunction, and an order for an accounting before a master, it has been held that the decree was not final or appealable. It is true, that the cases in the supreme court are based upon a different statute, and in unmistakable language deny the right of appeal from interlocutory decrees. But they are for that reason none the less significant, as showing what has been understood as the line between interlocutory and final decrees. We must assume that Congress used the term 'interlocutory order or decree,' in this connection in its common and well-understood sense, and as intending the line of distinction accepted and interpreted by the federal courts; and it follows that all injunction orders and decrees which were interlocutory, and not final, within the meaning of the old statute, and for that reason not appealable, are interlocutory under the new statute, and therefore, by the same logic and upon the same reasoning, are appealable. . . . It is quite probable—indeed, quite clear—that a distinction would be made between injunctions granted preliminarily as a matter of discretion, and a decree for an injunction granted upon the final determination of a particular right; and the general rule that an appellate court interferes reluctantly with injunctions granted in limine as a matter of discretion should not, in our view, apply to an appeal under the statute from an interlocutory decree for a perpetual injunction based upon a final determination of the substantial property right in a patent cause."

In Jones v. Munger Improved Cotton Mach. Mfg. Co., 50 Fed. Rep. 785, Pardee, C. J., said: "An examination of the decree rendered by the court below shows that, while it adjudges the validity of the patent sued on and directs an injunction termed 'perpetual' against the defendants as infringers, it refers the matter to a master for taking an account. It is well settled that such a decree is not a final decree from which an appeal could be taken, or of which this court would have jurisdiction, under the sixth section of the judiciary act of 1891. Keystone Manganese, etc., Co. v. Martin, 132 U. S. 91, and cases there cited. We are, however, of the opinion that it is an interlocutory decree granting an injunction, from which an appeal would lie under the seventh section of the said judiciary act. . . . An allowance of an appeal from an interlocutory order or decree, granting or continuing an injunction in an equity cause under the seventh section of the judiciary act of 1891, is a new feature of the practice in the United States courts. Being of a highly remedial nature, it ought to be construed so as to give full force to the intention of the lawmaker. The mischief to be remedied by the act was that injunctions which deprived parties of the possession and control of property, or compelled enforced action in the use of property, were, under the practice of the courts,

I. Definition, 526.

II. Rules and Regulations, 526.

I. DEFINITION.—A trade or trades union is a combination or association of workmen of the same or of several allied trades, united for the purpose of securing the most favorable conditions as regards wages and hours of work, etc., and regulating generally the relation between employer and employé.¹ The legality of the methods pursued by such organizations is fully treated elsewhere.²

II. RULES AND REGULATIONS.—Wherever an association is recognized by law as legal, it may make such rules and regulations frequently rendered long before the final hearing in the case, and operated, to a great extent, in the nature of execution before judgment. This mischief was as great in patent cases, where parties on hearings, preliminary to the final decree, were enjoined, pending long and tedious examinations in the matter solely of accounting, as in any other cases of preliminary injunction. The case of Richmond v. Atwood, decided in the first circuit, and reported in 48 Fed. Rep. 910, was a case on all fours with the present one, and therein the court took and exercised jurisdiction, apparently without question. The suit was one for an infringement of letters patent wherein an appeal was taken from a decree sustaining the patent, holding the defendant to be an infringer, awarding an injunction, and ordering an account. This court, having jurisdiction of the appeal under the seventh section, and having jurisdiction under the sixth section, if a final decree had been rendered in the circuit court, it would seem to have been competent for the appellee to waive a formal final decree, and submit the cause to this court on the merits. Our conclusion in the matter is that in this case the circuit court of appeals was seized of jurisdiction under the seventh section of the act of 1891, and that, as the appellee submitted the case without objection, it is now too late to question the jurisdiction of the court, even if doubtful. . . . The order of the court is that the motion to vacate the proceedings in this cause, and to dismiss the appeal for want of jurisdiction, be denied; that our former decree, remanding the cause, with directions to dismiss the bill, with costs, be, and the same is, modified so as to direct the cause to be remanded to the circuit court, with instructions to dissolve and dismiss the injunction granted in said court; and that appellee pay the costs, and that the rehearing applied for be denied."

Equity Jurisdiction to Compel Admission of Member.—The court of chancery of New Jersey has no jurisdiction to compel the admission of a person not elected according to its rules and by-laws to membership in a trade union. Mayer v. Journeymen Stonecutters' Assoc., 47 N. J. Eq. 519; 35 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 356.

Expulsion of Members.—Where a member of a trades union has been expelled for a clear violation of the rules, in working for an employer who did not pay weekly, and employed non-union men, he may not be reinstated, whether a strike is declared or not. Burns v. Bricklayers' Union, 27 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 20.

In Beesley v. Chicago Journeymen Plumbers', etc., Assoc., 44 Ill. App. 278, it was held that to secure membership in a trades union by feigning a qualification which does not exist, and to persist in retaining membership after disqualification, are offenses warranting expulsion.

A by-law of an incorporated association provided that "no expulsion, suspension or fine shall be made, except upon charges preferred, a copy of which shall be served upon the member so charged." A notice to stand and show cause before a meeting of the directors, why a member should not be expelled for a violation of this rule, is not a sufficient compliance with such by-law. People v. Musical Mut., etc., Union, 47 Hun (N. Y.) 273. In this case the plaintiff's claim for damages being based upon his loss of employment, on account of his expulsion from the trade union, and it being a rule of the union that no member should accept employment with an expelled member, it was held admissible for the defendant to show that a black list was kept in the office of the union. It was also competent on the part of the plaintiff to show the amount of his earnings prior to his expulsion, to what extent they had been diminished, and his inability to secure other employment, with a view to showing the injury he had sustained.

It is said that a distinction is generally recognized concerning the power of expulsion belonging to voluntary unincorporated associations, and those which are created by law. Pitcher v. Board of Trade, 121 Ill. 412.

Where members of a trade union were expelled for breach of rules in restraint of trade, and the union passed a resolution to wind up their affairs, with a direction to their trustees to divide the surplus assets among the persons entitled under the rules, and an inquiry was directed to be made as to who were so entitled, it was held that, under the Trades Union Act of 1871, 34 & 35 Vict. ch. 31, the expelled members were properly excluded from any share. Strick v. Swansea Tinplate Co., 36 Ch. Div. 558.

Miscellaneous—Action to Annul Fines.—In Burns v. Bricklayers' Ben. Union, 24 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 150, it was held that a party who has been fined for a violation of the rules of a trade union to which he belonged, cannot maintain an action to annul such fines, or for a restoration of his privileges, until he has exhausted all the remedies provided by the by-laws of the association. See SOCIETIES AND CLUBS, vol. 22, p. 803.

Label.—When a label had been adopted by the International Cigarmakers' Union, to be pasted on boxes containing cigars made by the members thereof, the court held that it was not a legal trade-mark, and the right to use it belonged equally to all members of the union, as long as they were members. Weener v. Brayton, 152 Mass. 101; Cigarmakers' Protective Union v. Conhaim, 40 Minn. 243; Carson v. Ury, 39 Fed. Rep. 777. See also TRADE-MARKS, vol. 26, p. 255.

In State v. Hagen, 6 Ind. App. 167, it was held that the Indiana statute (Acts of 1891, p. 31), providing for the registry of labels which are for the exclusive use of citizens of the state, and making the unauthorized use of such labels a crime, did not protect a label of the Cigarmakers' International Union, which was to be used throughout the union. A right of action to restrain an unauthorized use of such label cannot be maintained by the subordinate branches of the union, but the action, restraint of trade, is illegal, and, therefore, cannot be enforced; ¹ and in England, by statute, it seems that no agreement between members as to the conditions under which they are to work, or as to the payment of subscriptions, or the application of the funds of the association, can be enforced by any court.² Where however, the general objects of a union are legal, the fact that some of its rules are irregular, as in restraint of trade, does not affect the legality of the society.³

Thus, a rule of a society, established for the protection of a particular trade, that no member should employ any traveler, carman, or outdoor employé who had left the service of another member without the consent in writing of his late employer, till after the expiration of two years, was held to be unreasonable, in restraint of trade, and void. Mineral Water, etc., Soc. v. Booth, 36 Ch. Div. 465.

But when the by-laws of an incorporated association of master workmen, subscribed by the defendant, provided that any member of the association found guilty by its committee of working for less prices than those fixed by the association, should forfeit to it twenty-five per cent. of the price fixed for the same work, the penalty to be collected in the name of the association by process of law, it was held that such a by-law or pledge was not unlawful as made in restraint of trade, and that the by-law being one which the association had the power to make, the association had also the power to attach to its violation a penalty, and an action might be maintained for its recovery. Master Stevedores' Assoc. v. Walsh, 2 Daly (N. Y.) 1.

A corporation organized for the promotion of good fellowship among its members, and for the relief of those who are unfortunate in a profession, cannot prohibit others from exercising such profession by their by-laws, and such by-laws, being repugnant to public policy and in restraint of trade, are void. Thomas v. Mutual Protective Union, 49 Hun (N. Y.) 171.

2. Rigby v. Connol, 14 Ch. Div. 482. But an injunction to restrain other members from applying the funds in a manner contrary to an agreement to provide benefits for members, would not be a direct enforcement of the alleged agreement, and therefore the court might entertain the proceeding. Wolfe v. Matthews, 21 Ch. Div. 194.

4. The word "traffic" has always had a well-understood meaning in a popular sense. It is the passing of goods or commodities from one person to another for an equivalent in goods or money. v. Canadian Pac. R. Co., 21 Ont. 705. In this case it was said that a car is a wheeled vehicle or conveyance, including carriages, chariots, carts, wagons, trucks, etc., and a locomotive is a car carrying the motive power, and a tender is a car carrying the water and fuel for the locomotive, and shackled together they form a train of cars; a train signifying that which is drawn along. If a locomotive and tender cannot be called a train of cars, neither can a locomotive and tender with one box platform or passenger car attached be called a train of cars. See *Cox v. In Inerarity v. Mims, 1 Ala. 669, it is said that, "The term transfer means to convey or pass over the right of one person to another, unless the general meaning is restrained or limited by something accompanying it."

The foreclosure of a mortgage of real estate, the title becoming absolute in the mortgagee by the failure to redeem, constitutes a transfer of the property, within the meaning of the statute providing that real estate of any taxpayer shall be liable for all his taxes for one year, and afterwards until the transfer thereof. Waterbury Sav. Bank v. Lawler, 46 Conn. 243.

Authority to Transfer Does not Authorize Sale.—A general authority in a stock note to use, transfer, or hypothecate the security, does not authorize a sale by the pledgee before maturity of the note. Ogden v. Lathrop, 1 Sweeney (N. Y.) 643.

3. Baggage Transfers.—A city express company, engaged in carrying parcels between the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and in carrying trunks of travelers to and from the passenger depots of the various railroads, are common carriers, and are responsible as such. Richards v. Westcott, 2 Bosw. (N. Y.) 589; Da Ponte v. New Orleans Transfer Co., 42 La. Ann. 696; Verner v. Sweitzer, 32 Pa. St. 208.

In Aikin v. Westcott, 123 N. Y. 363, where the baggage of the plaintiff was lost after the delivery of the checks therefor to the agent of the defendant company, the company was not held liable, as the evidence failed to show the delivery of the trunk to them.

A transfer company at the end of the route, which does not receive goods from the preceding carrier under and by virtue of the original contract for through transportation, is not a connecting carrier, but occupies the position of common carrier; and if the bailor's possession was wrongful, the transfer company cannot be held liable to the person injured. Nanson v. Jacobs, 12 Mo. App. 127.

Municipal Regulation.—In Reg. v. Verral, 18 Ont. Rep. 117, it was held that it was no breach of an ordinance prohibiting transfer companies, or their agents, from soliciting passengers or baggage at any of the "stands, railroad stations, steamboat landings, or elsewhere in the city," for an agent to board an arriving passenger train at one of the outlying stations and go through the train calling out, "Baggage transferred to all parts of the city."

1. Transfer of Cars.—Peoria, etc., R. Co. v. Chicago, etc., R. Co. 109 Ill. 135; 18 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 506; 50 Am. Dec. 605. See CARRIERS OF GOODS, vol. 2, p. 871. But where such a company, having a line of road connecting with the tracks of various other roads, had received loaded cars from another railway company, to be delivered upon the track of a certain manufacturing company, and to be returned after they had been unloaded by the latter, and the cars were burned before being unloaded and re-delivered, it was held that the transfer or connecting line was not liable for the loss of the cars, or for the failure to return them. East St. Louis Connecting R. Co. v. Wabash, etc., R. Co., 123 Ill. 594; 32 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 522, reversing 24 Ill. App. 279. In this case the court, by Mulkey, J., said: "When the cars, with their contents, were shoved off the turntable on to the private track of the glucose company, in conformity with their previous course of business, they had reached their destination, and, that consequently the defendant's liability as an insurer of them ceased. Had the glucose company unloaded and returned them, as it was accustomed to do, the defendant's liability as a common carrier would have commenced anew, and continued until they were delivered to the appellee."

Where a corporation voluntarily agrees to switch over its tracks the cars of different railroads, being under no obligation to do so, and only collects a specified switching charge, but charges no traffic rates on the freight transferred, it is not a common carrier within the provisions of the interstate commerce law. Kentucky, etc., Bridge Co. v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 37 Fed. Rep. 567, reversing 2 I. C. C. R. 162; 34 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 630.

2. In Hopkins v. Westcott, 6 Blatchf. (U. S.) 64, where a passenger delivered to the agent of a transfer company a check which he had received for his trunk, so that the carrier might obtain and deliver the same at his residence, and received from the agent at the time a paper as a receipt, which contained a printed notice that the carrier would "not become liable for merchandise or jewelry contained in baggage received upon baggage checks, nor for loss by fire, nor for an amount exceeding $100 upon any article, unless specially agreed for in writing on the check receipt, and the extra risk paid therefor," and that the owner thereby agreed that the carrier should be liable only as above, the passenger was held to be charged with actual notice, and the liability of the carrier limited as stated. The words "any article," in the condition, were held not to mean a trunk or piece of baggage and its contents gross, but any article contained in the piece of baggage.

But in Prentice v. Decker, 49 Barb. (N. Y.) 30, it was held that the putting into the hands of a passenger a card containing a clause limiting the liability of the transfer company to a specified amount, except by special agreement to be noted on the card, will not, without further proof from which the assent of such passenger to the terms may be implied, establish a contract. In delivering the opinion of the court, Gilbert, J., said: "These principles must be deemed settled; viz., that common carriers of goods may, by express stipulation, limit their liability for the loss of goods occurring through the negligence of their agents or servants, or wholly exempt themselves from such liability, and that the acceptance by the bailor from the bailee, in the ordinary course of the business, of a receipt for the goods containing such a stipulation, creates a

See also Brown v. Eastern R. Co., 11 Cush. (Mass.) 97. The law stated here as to the power of common carriers to limit their liability for loss occurring through the negligence of their servants, although sustained by the New York courts, is contrary to the great weight of authorities. See CARRIERS OF GOODS, vol. 2, p. 818.

1. In U. S. v. Sheldon, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 119, it was held that the driving of living fat oxen, etc., on foot was not a transportation thereof within the true intent and meaning of a statute prohibiting the transportation of articles of provision, etc., from the United States to Canada.

Transportation Company.—In Columbia Conduit Co. v. Com., 90 Pa. St. 307, it was held that a corporation engaged in the removal of petroleum from place to place by means of pipes, was within the meaning of an act imposing a tax on transportation companies. The court said: "It is contended that this moving of petroleum by means of pipes is not transporting, and, therefore, that this is not a transportation company. The defendant's counsel contend that to transport is to carry, and that this transport company does not carry, but the petroleum flows. We consider this too narrow a construction. If we look into the dictionary for the meaning of the word 'transport,' Webster defines it 'to carry or convey from one place to another.' Again, 'to remove from one place to another,' and throughout all the derivations of the word 'transport' we find in some part of the definition 'to remove.'"

3. In Massachusetts, it is held that an open and traveled street in a city, though not so laid out and established by the municipal authorities as to make the city responsible for damages occasioned by defects therein, is a traveled place within the meaning of the statute providing that a railroad corporation shall maintain a signboard and other precautions at railroad crossings over highways and townways. Whittaker v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 7 Gray (Mass.) 98.

But in New York, it is held that until a highway which crosses a railroad track has been actually open, or notice of the laying out has been served upon an officer of the corporation, the duty imposed by the general railroad act of giving notice of an approaching train does not attach. Cordell v. New York, etc., R. Co., 64 N. Y. 535.

The road or street must be traveled as well as public. Byrne v. New York, etc., R. Co., 94 N. Y. 12, reversing 28 Hun (N. Y.) 438. And so in South Carolina, under such a statute it was held that a traveled place meant a

I. DEFINITION.—The word imports a betraying, treachery, or breach of allegiance. It is the crime of a subject or citizen who attempts to injure the sovereign or overthrow the government.²

"Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."³ place where people had the legal right to cross, and not such a crossing as was not a public one and not recognized as such, although people were accustomed to use it. Barber v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 34 S. Car. 444.

1. Hall v. Eve, 4 Ch. Div. 341.

A denial is either by Common Traverse, a denial in the direct terms of the allegation ; or by General Traverse, a denial in terms preceded by a general inducement ; or by Special Traverse, or traverse with an absque hoc, a denial commencing with these last words and following the terms of the allegation.

Traverse of Indictment.—Any denial of an allegation in an indictment. 4 Bl. Com. 351; Stephens on Pl., p. 167 et seq.

Traverse of Office.—A proceeding whereby the truth and validity of inquests of office were contested or denied.

2. Bouv. L. Dict.; Stormonth's Dict.

In England, there was high treason and petit treason. The distinction is unknown in the United States, treason meaning high treason. Petit treason, under Stat. 25, Edward III., was the killing by a wife of a husband, or by a servant of his master, or of a prelate by an ecclesiastic owing obedience to him ; but these kinds of treason were abolished in 1828.

3. U. S. Const., art. 3, § 3.

"Every person owing allegiance to the United States who levies war against them, or adheres to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort within the United States or elsewhere, is guilty of treason." U. S. Rev. Stat., § 5331.

The constitutional definition cannot be restricted or extended by Congress. U. S. v. Greathouse, 2 Abb. (U. S.) 364; U. S. v. Hanway, 2 Wall. Jr. (U. S.) 139.

Misprision of Treason.—Every person owing allegiance to the United States, and having knowledge of the commission of any treason against them, who conceals, and does not, as soon as may be, disclose and make known the same to the president or to some judge of the United States, or to the governor, or to some judge or justice of a particular state, is guilty of misprision of treason, and shall be imprisoned not more than seven years, and fined not more than one thousand dollars. U. S. Rev. Stat., § 5333.

Treason Against the State.—The constitutions of most of the states contain a similar provision as to treason against the state. Under the Georgia Code (1882), § 4314, concealment of treason without assent or participation is treason in the second degree.

See, as to treason against a state, People v. Lynch, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 549; Charge to Grand Jury, 1 Story (U. S.) 614.

Homestead Treason Cases ; Organized Strikers.—In the Homestead Case, 1 Dist. Rep. (Pa.) 785, Paxson, C. J., in charging the jury, laid down the following points: When a large number of men arm and organize themselves by divisions and companies, appoint officers, and engage in a common purpose to defy the law and resist its officers, and to deprive any portion of their fellow-citizens of the rights to which they are entitled under the constitution and the laws, it is a levying of war against the state, and the offense is treason. Much more so when the functions of the state

II. ESSENTIALS; PROSECUTION.—It has been said that infancy constitutes no defense to a prosecution for the crime of treason;¹ nor coverture.²

In the prosecution, the general rules of procedure govern. The indictment must set forth the place and manner of the overt act.³ Allegations of time need not be proven strictly.⁴

The burden of proving treasonable intent is on the prosecutor.⁵

Under the federal constitution, "no person shall be convicted of treason, unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court."⁶

Under the federal statute, the indictment must be found within three years.⁷

"If a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors."⁸ government are usurped in a particular locality, the process of the commonwealth and the lawful acts of its officers resisted, and unlawful arrests made at the dictation of a body of men, who have assumed the functions of government in that locality. It is a state of war when a business plant has to be surrounded by the army of the state for weeks to protect it from unlawful violence at the hands of men formerly employed in it. Where a body of men have organized for a treasonable purpose, every step taken is an overt act of treason in levying war.

Procuring Provisions for Enemy.—In U. S. v. Pryor, 3 Wash. (U. S.) 234, it was held that going from the British squadron to the shore, for the purpose of peaceably procuring provisions for the enemy, did not amount to an act of treason, as this conduct rested in intention, which is not punishable by our laws.

Private Objects.—A resistance of the execution of a law of the United States, accompanied with any degree of force, if for a private purpose, is not treason. To constitute that offense, the object of the resistance must be of a public and general character. U. S. v. Hoxie, 1 Paine (U. S.) 265.

1. See Den v. Banta, 1 N. J. L. 266.

2. 4 Bl. Com. 29.

3. In re Burr, 4 Cranch (U. S.) 469.

A charge that the accused sent intelligence to the enemy, need not set forth the contents of the missive. Respublica v. Carlisle, 1 Dall. (U. S.) 35.

In a treasonable conspiracy, the overt act of one is that of all; a common design must precede proof of individual acts. Reg. v. Brittain, 3 Cox C. C. 77. As to requisites of allegation and proof, in cases under the Treason-Felony Act (11, 12 Vict., ch. 12), see Reg. v. Davitt, 11 Cox C. C. 676.

The constitutional requisite of two witnesses, etc., does not apply to the preliminary examination by magistrate or grand jury. U. S. v. Hanway, 2 Wall. Jr. (C. C.) 138.

7. U. S. Rev. Stat., § 1043.

8. Marshall, C. J., in Ex p. Bollman, 4 Cranch (U. S.) 126. In the United States, the early leading cases upon the essentials of the crime, the allegation, proof, etc., came up in connection with an alleged scheme of ex-Vice President Burr to concentrate an armed force at New Orleans, and establish a southwestern confederacy. He was indicted in 1807, on a charge of assembling at Blennerhasset's Island in Virginia, a number of armed men, compassing against the United States, to descend the Ohio and Mississippi, and traitorously take possession of New Orleans; "did ordain, prepare and levy war against the said United States." (1 Burr's Trial, p. 432.) Aside from this indictment for treason, he was charged with the misdemeanor prohibited by the act of 1794, in preparing a military expedition against Spain, a foreign state with whom the United States was at peace. He was taken from Mississippi Territory to Richmond by military escort under command of General Wilkinson, to whom two alleged accomplices, Bollman and Swartwout, had made confessions (p. 9). On the trial, these, as also certain declarations of another alleged accomplice, Blennerhassett, were offered in evidence, but excluded; the court, by Marshall, C. J., declaring that "Declarations of third persons, not forming a part of the transaction and not made in the presence of the accused, cannot be received in evidence." Nor could "acts of accomplices, except so far as they prove the character and object of the expedition." Nor could "acts of the accused in a different district, which constitute in themselves substantive causes for a prosecution, unless they go directly to prove the charges laid in the indictment." The jury found Burr not guilty. He was then ordered to be committed to Ohio, to answer to the charge of setting on foot a military expedition against a foreign prince, etc. 2 Burr's Trial (Robertson's ed.) 539. Upon Burr's trial, Marshall, C. J., said: "It is reasonable to suppose, unless it be incompatible with other expressions of the constitution, that the term 'levying war' is used in that instrument in the same sense in which it was understood in England, and in this country, to have been used in the statute of the 25th of Edward III., from which it was borrowed." Burr's Trial (Coombs' ed.) 308. Bollman and Swartwout were also arrested, but discharged on habeas corpus to the marshal of the District of Columbia. On the hearing, the court, by Marshall, C. J., quoted with approval the affirmation of Chase, J., in Fries' Trial, that "A combination or conspiracy to levy war against the United States is not treason, unless combined with an attempt to carry such conspiracy into execution; some actual force or violence must be used in pursuance of such design to levy war; but it is altogether immaterial whether the force used is sufficient to effectuate the object." A deposition of Gen. Eaton, as to conversation with Burr upon a projected expedition against Mexico, was offered; also an affidavit of Gen. Wilkinson setting forth a letter from Burr to meet him at Natchez, and a statement of Swartwout that Burr, with support of a powerful association extending from New York to New Orleans, was levying an armed body of 7,000 men for such expedition. The court construed the word "levying" to import a mere enlisting, hence not to be within the statute; but was divided as to admissibility of the contents of Burr's letter. Ex p. Bollman, 4 Cranch (U. S.) 135. For copies of the documents offered in evidence against Bollman and Swartwout, see Appendix, 4 Cranch (U. S.) 455. See Fries' Second Trial, Wharton, State Trials of U. S. 610.

1. Leading dicta hereon, and on the distinction between treason against a state and against the United States, are those of the court, by Story, J., in a charge to the Grand Jury, U. S. C. Ct. R. I., 1842; 1 Story (U. S.) 615, at the time of Dorr's rebellion: "A conspiracy to levy war, and an actual levy of war, are distinct offenses. To constitute an actual levy of war, there must be an assembly of persons, met for the treasonable purpose, and some overt act done, or some attempt made by them with force to execute, or towards executing, that purpose. There must be a present intention to proceed in the execution of the treasonable purpose by force. The assembly must now be in a condition to use force, and must intend to use it, if necessary, to further, or to aid, or to accomplish the treasonable design. If the assembly is arrayed in a military manner, if they are armed and march in a military form, for the express purpose of overawing or intimidating the public, and thus they intend to carry into effect the treasonable design, that will, of itself, amount to a levy of war, although no actual blow has been struck, or engagement has taken place. . . . In respect to the treasonable design, it is not necessary that it should be a direct and positive intention entirely to subvert or overthrow the government.

What constitutes "force," and what the relation of the overt act to the time of the formation of the design, are immaterial, or dependent on the circumstances of the case.¹

A union of men in arms to commit acts of violence, for the purpose of preventing execution of a law of Congress and suppressing a public office created by it, by compelling resignation of the officer, is treason.² The act of treason may be complete, though the prepared aid and comfort fail to reach the enemy.³

It will be equally treason, if the intention is by force to prevent the execution of any one or more general and public laws of the government, or to resist the exercise of any legitimate authority of the government in its sovereign capacity. Thus, if there is an assembly of persons with force, with intent to prevent the collection of the lawful taxes or duties levied by the government, or to destroy all custom-houses, or to resist the administration of justice in the courts of the United States, and they proceed to execute their purpose by force, there can be no doubt, that it would be treason against the United States. . . . If the object of an assembly of persons, met with force, is to overturn the government or constitution of a state, or to prevent the due exercise of its sovereign powers, or to resist the execution of any one or more of its general laws, but without any intention whatsoever to intermeddle with the relations of that state with the national government, or to displace the national laws or sovereignty therein, every overt act done with force towards the execution of such a treasonable purpose is treason against the state only. But treason may be begun against a state, and may be mixed up or merged in treason against the United States. Thus, if the treasonable purpose be to overthrow the government of the state, and forcibly to withdraw it from the Union, and thereby to prevent the exercise of the national sovereignty within the limits of the state, that would be treason against the United States. So, if the troops of the United States should be called out by the President, in pursuance of the duty enjoined by the constitution, upon the application of the state legislature, or the state executive, when the legislature cannot be convened, to protect the state against domestic violence, and there should be an assembly of persons with force to resist and oppose the troops so called out by the President, that would be a levy of war against the United States, although the primary intention of the insurgents may have been only the overthrow of the state government or the state laws." To the same effect are dicta of the court, by Sprague, J., in a charge to the grand jury, U. S. Dist. Ct. Mass. 1861; 23 Law Rep. 707, at the time of the secession outbreak: "If a convention, legislature, junto, or other assemblage, entertain the purpose of subverting the government, and to that end pass acts, resolves, ordinances, or decrees, even with a view of raising a military force to carry their purpose into effect, this alone does not constitute a levying of war." See also Judge Smalley's Charge to the Grand Jury, U. S. C. Ct. N. Y. 1861; 4 Blatchf. (U. S.) 518.

1. "The treasonable conspiracy may be formed before the individuals assemble to act, and they may come together to act pursuant to it; or it may be formed when they have assembled, and immediately before they act. The time is not essential. All that is necessary is, that being assembled, they should act in forcible opposition to a law of the United States, pursuant to a common design to prevent the execution of that law, in any case within their reach. Actual force must be used. But what amounts to the use of force, depends much upon the nature of the enterprise, and the circumstances of the case. It is not necessary that there should be any military array or weapons, nor that any personal injury should be inflicted on the officers of the law. . . . The presence of numbers who manifest an intent to use force, if found requisite to obtain their demands, may compel submission . . . and effectually prevent execution of the law." Charge to the Grand Jury, U. S. C. Ct. Mass. 1851; 2 Curt. (U. S.) 632.

3. In 1862, Confederate President

Treason against the United States Government, does not necessarily import treason against any one state in its political capacity.¹

The essence of the crime is unaffected by the government's recognition of the traitors as belligerents.²

Davis gave to Harpending, a Kentuckian, a letter of marque to burn, bond, or take into Confederate ports all vessels sailing under the flag of the United States. Greathouse, another Kentuckian, purchased arms and ammunition, which were placed on the schooner Chapman (also purchased by him), in twenty-nine cases marked "machinery," "oil-mill," etc., together with 4,000 feet of lumber for berths, prison deck, etc. Law, who was leagued in the scheme, engaged Libby to go as mate, with full knowledge that the design was to sail from San Francisco to Guadeloupe Island and there mount the guns, then capture a downward bound steamer with treasure, then to seize vessels recovering treasure from the wreck of the steamer Golden Gate, near Manzanillo, and then to burn United States vessels at the Chincha Islands. When they had partially hoisted the mainsail, the schooner was boarded by government officers from the United States war-sloop, Cyane, and all seized. On indictment for treason, Law and Libby became witnesses for the prosecution; the others were convicted and sentenced, but finally released on oath and bond under the general amnesty proclamation. On the trial of the case, U. S. v. Greathouse, 2 Abb. (U. S.) 364, 379, the court, by Field, J., charged the jury that if Harpending received the letter with intention to use it, then was the conspiracy between him and the chiefs of the rebellion complete, to commit hostilities against the United States on the high seas; that the purchase of guns, etc., and employment of men to manage the vessel, if done in furtherance of the common design, were overt acts of treason. "Together these acts complete the essential charge of the indictment. In doing them, the defendants were performing a part in aid of the great rebellion. They were giving it aid and comfort. It is not essential that the enterprise commenced should be successful, and actually render assistance." Thereupon, Foster on Crown Law was quoted: "The bare sending of money or provisions, or sending intelligence to rebels or enemies, which, in most cases, is the most effectual aid that can be given them, will make a man a traitor, though the money or intelligence should happen to be intercepted."

Where one who had been captured by the British in 1813, simply went ashore peaceably to procure provisions for the enemy, it was held not to amount to treason. U. S. v. Pryor, 3 Wash. (U. S.) 234.

The seizure, at Charleston, in 1861, of the custom-house, post office, forts, arsenals, vessels and other property of the United States, the firing upon vessels bearing the United States flag and carrying United States troops—either of these acts was treason by levying war. Judge Smalley's Charge to the Grand Jury, 23 Law Rep. 597, 599.

1. In 1814, Lynch and two other citizens of New York were indicted for giving aid and comfort to Great Britain, then at war with the United States, in furnishing provisions on board the Bulwark, a British man-of-war, thereby committing treason against the people of the State of New York, contrary to the New York statute, etc. On motion for his discharge, made upon certiorari to the New York supreme court (whereof Kent was then C. J.), it was declared, "per curiam:" "Great Britain cannot be said to be at war with the State of New York, in its aggregate and political capacity, as an independent government, and therefore not an enemy of the state, within the meaning of the statute. The people of this state, as citizens of the United States, are at war with Great Britain, in consequence of the declaration of war by Congress. The state, in its political capacity, is not at war. . . . In our statute, as revised, the words 'or of the United States' are omitted." The defendants were discharged, but were remanded until a judge of the United States Supreme Court should be informed, etc. People v. Lynch, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 554. Compare Ex p. Quarrier, 2 W. Va. 569.

Treason against the United States is not cognizable in the state courts. People v. Lynch, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 549.

2. In Hammond v. State, 3 Coldw. (Tenn.) 129, the court, by Milligan, J.,

Aiding an enemy's ally, is giving aid and comfort to the enemy.¹ Aliens, while domiciled in the United States, owe allegiance, and are subject to prosecution for giving aid and comfort to a rebellion against the government.²

III. PENALTIES.—The penalty for treason is defined by the federal and state statutes.³

TREASURE TROVE—(See also DERELICTION, vol. 5, p. 640; ESTRAYS, vol. 7, p. 34; FINDER OF PROPERTY, vol. 7, p. 977; MINES AND MINING CLAIMS, vol. 15, p. 499; WRECKS).—This name is given to such money or coin, gold, silver plate, or bullion which, having been hidden or concealed in the earth, or other private place, so long that its owner is unknown, has been discovered by accident.⁴ If the owner is known, the property is not technically treasure trove, and belongs to the owner or his representatives.⁵

said: "The fact that the rebels, pending the war, were recognized as belligerents, by no means concedes to them the right of sovereignty, either absolute or de facto; and, after the war terminated, they may be arraigned and tried under the municipal authority for treason, or pardoned and forgiven by the sovereign power."

1. In Vaughan's Case, 2 Salk. 634, the court, by Holt, C. J., said: "If an Englishman assist the French, being at war with us, and fight against the king of Spain, who is an ally of the king of England, this is treason as adhering to the king's enemies against the king; for the king's enemies are hereby strengthened and encouraged."

2. Hereupon, in Carlisle v. U. S., 16 Wall. (U. S.) 147, a cotton-claim case under the captured property act, brought by British subjects who in Alabama had sold nitre in aid of the slaveholders' rebellion, the court, by Field, J., quoted Wildman Inst. Int. Law, p. 40; Thrasher's Case, 6 Webster's Works, p. 526; also 1 Hale Pl. Crown 10; 1 East Crown Law, ch. 2, § 4; Foster High Treason, p. 185, § 2; but omitted to cite or to distinguish U. S. v. Villato, 2 Dall. (U. S.) 370, a decision apparently conflicting therewith. Compare Homestead Treason Cases, 1 Pa. Dist. Rep. 785.

Delivering up prisoners and deserters to the enemy, is adhering to them, giving them aid and comfort, and is treason against the United States. Nothing will excuse the act but a well-grounded fear of life. When the act amounts to treason, it involves the intention. U. S. v. Hodges, 2 Wheel. Cr. Cas. (N. Y.) 477.

3. See U. S. Rev. Stat., §§ 5332-5336. Under the state statutes the severity of the punishment varies. In some states it is death; in some, imprisonment for life; in others, imprisonment for a term of years. See the statutes of the various states.

Harris*, 38 Pa. St. 499; 80 Am. Dec. 502.

5. In Livermore v. White, 74 Me. 456; 43 Am. Rep. 600, it is said: "Nor can this be deemed treasure trove, which is thus defined in Jacob's dictionary. It is 'where any money is found hid in the earth, but not lying upon the ground, and no man knows to whom it belongs.' Nothing is treasure trove but gold or silver. 'It is not treasure trove if the owner can be known. Nor though the owner be dead; for his executor or administrator shall have it.' Com. Dig., art. 'Waif,' G. All elements constituting treasure trove are wanting. Here was no hiding. Here was no secrecy. The

In the United States, it would seem that the law relating to treasure trove has been merged into the law of the finder of lost property. The term is not often used and has perhaps no technical legal meaning in this country. The finder of the thing upon the land is, if the owner be unknown, its lawful custodian, and, if he cannot be found, becomes its owner.²

Viewing the doctrine of treasure trove in this light, its importance is not considered such as to justify an elaboration of the elements constituting it and of the rights and liabilities regarding it. A summary of these, however, will be found in the notes.³

In Pennsylvania, from an expression in the opinion of Warren v. Ulrich, 130 Pa. St. 414, it seems safe to assume that the State of Pennsylvania does not claim treasure trove. A roll of money was found by an employé of defendant in an old cesspool on the premises of the plaintiff's intestate. The ownership of the money was proved. In delivering the opinion the court said: "Had it (the money) been found while he remained upon the property, the case would have been much clearer; but it was not found till after his death and after the premises had been occupied by other tenants for some years. Neither of them claimed it, however, and in view of Warren's aversion to banks and known way of hiding and secreting his money, we were not surprised that the jury found him to have been the owner of it. It is true the finder of money has title to it against all the world, except the true owner. Yet we cannot say there was not evidence of Warren's title to submit to the jury, and their verdict is in accordance with the probabilities of the case." The circumstances in this case would have been sufficient to make the law of treasure trove applicable had the owner been unknown, and if the common law applied, the above proposition would have been out of place; so that it is not violence to presume that the rules governing lost property apply likewise to treasure trove, and that the above statement was made for that reason, unless the court overlooked the fact that the case was not one of lost property.

In Maine, the case of Livermore v. White, 74 Me. 452; 43 Am. Rep. 600, likewise suggests that the English rule does not apply in that state. Some hides which were found in an old vat in a tannery were properly held not to constitute treasure trove, not being gold or silver. If the defendant could claim the hides as treasure trove, it must have been under the civil-law rule, for as against the sovereign the finder of treasure trove had no rights at common law. The court, by Appleton, C. J., in its disposition of the question, rejects the treasure-trove theory because "there was neither gold nor silver hidden, and no hiding." If the state had any right to treasure trove, the defendant's claim would have been fruitless on this ground, and the court would have unquestionably so expressed itself.

Louisiana.—As to the doctrine in Louisiana, see Civil Code of Louisiana, arts. 553, 3423.

There seem to be no American cases in which the question whether the law of treasure trove obtains in any state of the Union has been decided. The doctrine of the text rests rather upon inference than upon authority, and there are not wanting dicta of judges and opinions of text-writers to the effect that the law of treasure trove remains in the United States practically the same as in England. be in such a place and under such circumstances as to raise the natural presumption that some person deposited the treasure there, to insure for himself its safe-keeping and not to abandon possession of it. McLaughlin v. Waite, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 404; 21 Am. Dec. 232; 7 Com. Dig. 649; 20 Vin. Abr. (2d ed.), § 9, p. 414. The thing concealed must be of intrinsic value; as money, gold, silver plate, bullion, and the like. 22 Vin. Abr. (2d ed.), § 1, p. 413; Livermore v. White, 74 Me. 452; 43 Am. Rep. 600; *Sovern v. Second. Discovery.—The discovery of the hidden treasure, it seems, must be by accident, and not the result of a search. See Sovern v. Yoran, 16 Oregon 269; Dalloz. Juris. Gener. Torn. 38, "Propriete," § 204.

Third. Undiscovered Owner.—If the owner of the treasure be or can be known at the time of its discovery, the title passes neither to the king, state, nor private individual. If, after the discovery of the treasure, the owner thereof, or his legal representatives are found out, the king, state, or private individual is divested of the formerly acquired title. 3 Co. Inst. Cap. XVIII., p. 132; Maguire v. Longford, 14 Ir. L. T. 103. And see infra, this note, Rights and Liabilities Regarding Treasure Trove.

Rights and Liabilities Regarding Treasure Trove.—First. As between the sovereign and the discoverer, the right of the crown to the treasure trove at common law is absolute. He who discovers it has no claim to any part of it, and must give notice of the discovery to the proper officer. The concealment of it after its discovery is an offense punishable by fine and imprisonment. 1 Bl. Com. 295; 7 Com. Dig. 649; 2 Co. Insts. Cap. XVIII., p. 132; 4 Bl. Com. 121; 21 Alb. L. J. 260; Maguire v. Longford, 14 Ir. L. T. 103; Reg. v. Toole, 2 Ir. C. L. 36; 2 Bishop's Crim. Law, §§ 875, 876.

Second. As between the sovereign and the discovered owner of the treasure the sovereign has no right; the owner's right is absolute. If the owner is dead, his legal representative stands in his place. Sovern v. Yoran, 16 Oregon 269; 7 Com. Dig. 649; Maguire v. Longford, 14 Ir. L. T. 103. See also McKiernan v. Kernan, 4 Ir. Eq. 269.

Third. As the right of the sovereign is absolute, the owner of the soil upon which another finds treasure trove has no claim thereto; nor has an assignee, as his assignor could pass no title. Reg. v. Thomas, 23 L. J. M. C. 22.

1. In People v. McKinney, 10 Mich. 86, the word "treasury," as used in a statute, was held not to be understood in a sense of locality, as descriptive of a particular building within which the treasurer kept his office or place of business; but whenever and wherever moneys were in the official custody of the treasurer or subject to his direction, they were to be considered as in the state treasury.

I. DEFINITION.—A treaty is an agreement or contract between two or more sovereign states, entered into, usually, by authorized agents, and duly ratified by the sovereign power of the respective parties.¹

Although primarily a contract between nations, yet a treaty may confer rights and duties upon individual citizens, as in regulating the mutual rights of the citizens of the respective parties with regard to property.²

II. THE TREATY-MAKING POWER—1. Who May Make Treaties.—This power exists in all sovereign states whose powers have not been limited or modified by compacts with other states, and is exercised by the constituted authorities of nations, or by persons especially deputed by them for that purpose.³ The treaty-making power in the United States is vested in the President and Senate, by the constitution, which provides that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the senators present concur.⁴ The general power to make treaties, such as treaties of alliance and confederation, is denied to the states,⁵ but they may, with the consent of Congress, enter into an agreement or compact with another state or foreign power.⁶

Woolsey says: "Treaties allowed under the law of nations are unconstrained acts of independent powers placing them under an obligation to do something which is not wrong." Woolsey International Law, § 102.

Vattel defines a treaty as "a compact made with a view to the public welfare, by the superior power, either for perpetuity or for a considerable time." Vattel, p. 192.

Preamble.—The preamble does not form a part of the treaty, but, being duly authenticated by the signatures of the contracting parties, its averments are to be regarded as truths admitted. Little v. Watson, 32 Me. 224.

The Several Kinds of Treaties.—Woolsey says of the kinds of treaties: "They may define private relations, like commercial treaties, or political relations that may be temporary or of unlimited duration. And among the latter, some, or some provisions which they contain, may be dissolved by war, and others, intended to regulate intercourse during war, may be perpetual. They may secure coöperation merely, as treaties of alliance, or a closer union, as confederations, or the uniting of two or more states into one. All the intercourse of nations may come under the operation of treaties, and they may reach to an explanation or alteration, as far as the parties are concerned, of international law." Woolsey International Law, § 106.

5. No state shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation. U. S. Const., art. 1, § 10; Holmes v. Jennison, 14 Pet. (U. S.) 540; People v. Curtis, 50 N. Y. 321; 10 Am. Rep. 483.

Treaties Between the States, Prior to the Constitution.—Compacts in the nature of treaties exist between several of the older states, which were made prior to the federal constitution, and so far as they are not inconsistent therewith, remain in full force and effect. Such a compact exists between Virginia and Maryland, of date March 28th, 1785, relating to the rights of the citizens of each state in respect to fishing and navigation in the Potomac river, and has recently received judicial exposition in Ex p. Marsh, 57 Fed. Rep. 719. See also South Carolina v. Georgia, 93 U. S. 4; Pennsylvania v. Wheeling, etc., Bridge Co., 13 How. (U. S.) 518. See STATES, vol. 23, p. 103.

6. U. S. Const., art. 1, § 10. Mr.

2. Extent of Treaty Making Power.—In general, all the intercourse of nations may come within the operation of treaties.¹

The treaty-making power is conferred by the constitution of the United States in general terms, and extends to all matters which in the ordinary intercourse of nations have been made the subject of negotiation and treaty, and which are consistent with other provisions of the constitution.² This power is frequently exercised in establishing commercial relations.³

The political department of the government may, by treaty, regulate the property disabilities of aliens in the several states;⁴ as in determining the distribution of the property of deceased aliens.⁵ It may provide for the exercise of judicial authority in

Story says that the agreements or compacts which a state may make with the consent of Congress, relate to "mere private rights of sovereignty, such as questions of boundary, interests in lands situated in the territory of each other, and other internal regulations for the mutual comfort and convenience of states bordering on each other." Story on Const., § 1403.

1. Vattel, p. 183; Woolsey International Law, § 106.

The fundamental laws of a nation may withhold the power of alienation by treaty. Vat., bk. 1, ch. 20, § 244. See 1 Kent's Com. 167. See infra, this title, Treaties of Peace.

2. Holmes v. Jennison, 14 Pet. (U. S.) 540.

As to this general power, an eminent author says: "The power to make treaties is, by the constitution, general, and of course it embraces all sorts of treaties, for peace or war, for commerce or territory, for alliance or succor, for indemnity for injuries suffered or payment of debts, for the recognition and enforcement of principles of public law, and for any other purpose which the policy or interest of the independent sovereigns may fix in their intercourse with each other." Story on the Constitution, § 1508.

Constitutional Limitations.—In People v. Gerke, 5 Cal. 383, the court said: "The language which grants the power to make treaties, contains no words of limitation; it does not follow that the power is unlimited. It must be subject to the general rule, that an instrument is to be construed so as to reconcile and give meaning and effect to all its parts. If it were otherwise, the most important limitation upon the powers of the federal government would be ineffectual, and the reserved rights of the states would be subverted. This principle of construction as applied, not only in reference to the constitution of the United States, but particularly in the relation of all the rest of it to the treaty-making grant, was recognized both by Mr. Jefferson and John Adams, two leaders of opposite schools of construction. See Jefferson's Works, vol. 3, p. 135, and vol. 6, p. 560. It may, therefore, be assumed that, aside from the limitations and prohibitions of the constitution upon the powers of the federal government, 'the power of treaty was given, without restraining it to particular objects, in as plenipotentiary a form as held by any sovereign in any other society.'"

3. Story on Const., § 1508; Taylor v. Morton, 2 Curt. (U. S.) 454. In U. S. v. Forty-Three Gallons, 93 U. S. 196, it is said that "the treaty-making power covers all the usual subjects of diplomacy."

Article 9, of the treaty of 1794, between the United States and Great Britain, which provides that the subjects of either power may hold lands within the territories of the other, applies to vested remainders as well as to estates in possession. Fox v. Southack, 12 Mass. 143.

5. See infra, this title, When in Conflict with State Laws; Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483; Chirac v. Chirac, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 259; Jost v. Jost, 1 Mackey (D. C.) 487; Kull v. Kull, 37 Hun (N. Y.) 476.

In People v. Gerke, 5 Cal. 386, Bryan, J., said: "The treaty-making power of the federal government must, from necessity, be sufficiently ample, so as to cover all the usual subjects of treaties between different powers. If we were other countries, by the officers of the United States appointed to reside therein.¹

By the terms of a treaty, the United States may take private property for public use.²

III. WHEN TREATIES TAKE EFFECT.—Treaties as contracts are to deny to the treaty-making power of our government the exercise of jurisdiction over the property of deceased aliens, upon the ground of interference with the course of descents, or the laws of distribution of a state where property may exist, by parity of reasoning we should not make commercial treaties with foreign nations, because, it might be said, some of their provisions would injure the business of a portion of the citizens of one of the states of the Union. If the treaty-making power which resides in the federal government is not sufficient to permit it to arrange with a foreign nation the distribution of an alien's property, then that power resides nowhere, since it is denied to the states, and we must confess our system of government so weak and faulty, as to be incapable of extending to its citizens in foreign lands, that protection which is most common amongst a majority of modern civilized nations." See also Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S. 258.

1. See CONSULS AND AMBASSADORS, vol. 3, p. 764; In re Ross, 140 U. S. 453.

By the terms of the treaty between the United States and Prussia, it is provided that the consuls, vice-consuls, and commercial agents (which each of the parties to the treaty is declared entitled to have in the country of the other), shall have the right, as such, to sit as judges and arbiters in such differences as may arise between the captains and the crews of the vessels belonging to the nation whose interests are committed to their charge, without interference of local authority. A United States district court was held to have no jurisdiction over claims which have been already adjudicated by the Prussian consul. The Elwine Kreplin, 9 Blatchf. (U. S.) 438.

Under a treaty between the United States and Belgium, providing that consuls "shall have exclusive charge of the internal order of the merchant vessels of their nation, and shall alone take cognizance of all differences which may arise either at sea or in port between the captains, officers, and crews, without exception, particularly with reference to the adjustment of wages and the execution of contracts, and that local authorities shall not interfere except when the disorder that has arisen is of such a nature as to disturb tranquillity and public order on shore or in port," it was held that the local authorities were not deprived of jurisdiction of a homicide committed on board a Belgium steamship moored to the dock in a port of the United States, arising out of an affray between two Belgians, both belonging to the crew of a vessel, although it occurred below deck, and was witnessed only by other members of the crew. Wildenbus' Case, 120 U. S. 1.

Under a similar treaty between the United States and the kingdom of Italy, it was held that a justice of the peace had no power to compel a clerk of the United States district court, upon a rule of court, to issue admiralty process against a vessel, although sections 4546, 4547 Rev. Sts. U. S., empowered justices to certify to such clerk, whenever facts existed justifying the issue of such processes, who, thereupon, is required to issue such writ. The Salomoni, 29 Fed. Rep. 534.

The treaties between the United States and Turkey, and the act of Congress of July 22d, 1860, authorize American ministers and consuls in Egypt to exercise judicial powers over American citizens in that country, in civil, as well as in criminal matters. Dainese v. Hale, 1 McArthur (D. C.) 86. But see Dainese v. Allen, 3 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 212.

Under the provision of the treaty of 1871, with Germany, giving consuls exclusive cognizance of differences between officers and crews, where the captain of a German ship caused the arrest of a Dutch seaman who had shipped at Liverpool, it was held that the seaman, having been handed over to the German consul at Philadelphia, could not maintain an action in the court of common pleas against the captain, for causing the arrest. Meyer v. Basson, 10 Phila. (Pa.) 414.

binding upon the parties from the day they are signed, unless a different period is fixed by the contracting parties; and the ratification, although subsequent, relates back to that time.¹ But in the United States, in so far as they affect individual rights, they are not considered as concluded until there has been an exchange of ratifications. The principle of relation does not apply to rights of individuals which were vested before the treaty was ratified.²

A treaty, executed by plenipotentiaries, takes effect from the time of signing, as well in cessions of territory as in other respects, unless otherwise provided, and its ratification relates back to that time. U. S. v. Reynes, 9 How. (U. S.) 127.

So, after the signing of a treaty of cession, the ceding power has no authority to make a grant of land or franchises within the territory ceded. Davis v. Police Jury, 9 How. (U. S.) 280; U. S. v. Gusman, 14 How. (U. S.) 193; U. S. v. Ducros, 15 How. (U. S.) 38.

By the terms of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, it was to take effect from the time that terms of peace should be agreed upon between Great Britain and France, and Great Britain should be ready to conclude the same. It was held that the terms of a treaty are "agreed upon," when the ministers come to an understanding as to the terms, and reduce them to writing, and that a treaty is concluded, when the agreement thus understood has received its last form by being signed and duly executed by the ministers, and that, therefore, that treaty went into effect from the time when, the terms having been thus agreed upon, Great Britain manifested her readiness to conclude the treaty with France, by the signatures of her ministers to the same. Hylton v. Brown, 1 Wash. (U. S.) 343.

The treaty between the United States and France, the effect of which was to suspend the state law imposing a tax of ten per cent. on successions falling to foreign heirs, stipulates: "It shall remain in force for the space of ten years from the day of the exchange of the ratifications, which shall be made in conformity with the respective constitutions of the two countries, and exchanged at Washington within the period of six months, or sooner if possible." Under such a stipulation, it was held that the ratifications did not relate back to the date when the treaty was signed. The treaty did not become operative until the exchange of ratifications on August 11th, 1853. Schaffer's Succession, 13 La. Ann. 113.

Where an Indian treaty provided that it should be obligatory as soon as the same should be ratified by the president and Senate, it did not take effect until signed by the president, although it had been previously ratified by the Senate, and accepted by the Indians. *Shepard v. Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, stating the principle of the text, said: "That it may and does relate to its date as between the two governments, so far as respects the rights of either, it may be undoubted; but as respects individual rights in any way affected by it, a very different rule ought to prevail." U. S. v. Arrendondo, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 748.

IV. EFFECT AND OPERATION—1. In General.—Treaties are, in their nature, contracts, and, as such, are obligatory upon nations as private contracts are upon individuals.¹

In the United States, treaties are not merely contracts by which the sovereign power agrees to regulate its conduct, but are, by the constitution, made a part of the municipal law of the land of which all the courts must take notice.² But a distinction is to be observed between a treaty which becomes the law of the land when ratified and confirmed, and one which imports a contract, and, which, not operating of itself, requires the legislature to execute the contract before it can become a rule for the court.³

the United States until the ratifications of the treaty were exchanged. Holbrook v. U. S., 22 Law Rep. 226.

How Published.—By an act 31st July, 1876, par. 2; 1 Sup. R. S. U. S. 234; 1 Sup. R. S. U. S. 589, it is provided that new treaties are to be published in a newspaper of the District of Columbia.

1. See Vattel, bk. 1, ch. 15; 1 Kent's Com. 174.

The treaties made by the crown of Great Britain with other nations, are not, in the courts of that country, considered as a part of the law of the land; but the rights and duties growing out of those treaties are looked upon in that country as matters confided wholly, for their execution and enforcement, to the executive branch of the government. See U. S. v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 407.

2. Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. (U. S.) 304.

3. Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. (U. S.) 253, per Marshall, C. J.; Turner v. American Baptist, etc., Union, 5 McLean (U. S.) 344; Garcia v. Lee, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 519; Taylor v. Morton, 2 Curt. (U. S.) 454.

In Turner v. American Baptist, etc., Union, 5 McLean (U. S.) 347, McLean, J., said: "A treaty, under the federal constitution, is declared to be the supreme law of the land. This unquestionably applies to all treaties, where the treaty-making power, without the aid of Congress, can carry it into effect. It is not, however, and cannot be the supreme law of the land, where the concurrence of Congress is necessary to give it effect. Until this power is exercised, as when the appropriation of money is required, the treaty is not perfect. It is not operative, in the sense of the constitution, as money cannot be appropriated by the treaty-making power. This results from the limitation of our government. The action of no department of the government, can be regarded as a law, until it shall have all the sanctions required by the constitution to make it such. As well might it be contended, that an ordinary act of Congress, without the signature of the president, was a law, as that a treaty which engages to pay a sum of money, is in itself a law."

A provision in a treaty to be executed in futuro, does not become a rule of court until legislative action is had. So the treaty of 1843 with France, providing for the surrender of fugitives from justice, could not be executed without an act of Congress. In re Nutzger, 1 Park. Cr. Rep. (N. Y.) 108.

The treaty of February, 1819, between the United States and Spain, stipulated that "all grants of land made, etc., by his Catholic Majesty, shall be ratified and confirmed to the person in possession of the lands." The question arose whether the treaty of itself operated on the titles to the lands. Marshall, C. J., commenting on the language of the provision, said: "This seems to be the language of contracts, and if it is, the ratification and confirmation which are promised, must be the act of the legislature. Until such act shall be passed, the court is not at liberty to disregard the existing laws on the subject." Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. (U. S.) 253. See also Choutran v. Eckhart, 2 How. (U. S.) 344, declaring that the obligation, under this treaty, should be carried out by the legislative department of the government.

The case of U. S. v. Percheman, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 86, is apparently in conflict with the doctrine stated in regard to the provision of the treaty cited. But the doctrine stated in this case was intended to be applied to grants made in territory which undoubtedly belonged to Spain at the time of the grant, and not to grants made by Spain within the limits of Louisiana, in the territory which belonged to the United States, according to its true boundary, and where Spain had no right to grant lands after the cession to France, by the treaty of Ildefonso in 1800. See Garcia v. Lee, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 519.

The treaty of Washington provided that grants of land "shall be held valid, ratified, and confirmed." This language was held to be addressed more appropriately to the judicial than to the legislative department, and that, therefore, it was the duty of the courts to consider that treaty to be a law operating upon a grant made under the authority of the British government, without legislative confirmation. Little v. Watson, 32 Me. 224.

And in Great Britain, the performance of treaties may depend upon legislative action. An eminent author says that "Parliament has the right to give or withhold its sanction to those parts of a treaty that require legislative enactment to give it force; as, for example, when it provides for alterations in the criminal or municipal law, or proposes to change existing tariffs or commercial regulations. If a treaty requires legislative action in order to carry it out, it should be subjected to the fullest discussion in Parliament, and especially in the House of Commons." Todd Parl. Govt. in England, vol. 1, p. 610.

In Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 199, this provision was given the retrospective effect designed, and under it the treaty of 1783 with Great Britain was held to nullify a law of the State of Virginia, passed in 1777.

2. Art. 6, § 3 of the constitution provides that "All treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." Art. 3, providing that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority, places the interpretation and enforcement of treaties within the scope of the judicial power of the United States. See Judiciary Act of 1789, § 25.

Marshall, C. In Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 236, Chase, J., said: "A treaty cannot be the supreme law of the land, that is, of all the United States, if any act of a state legislature can stand in its way. If the constitution of a state (which is the fundamental law of the state, and paramount to its legislature), must give way to a treaty, and fall before it, can it be questioned whether the less power, an act of the state legislature, must not be prostrate? It is the declared will of the people of the United States, that every treaty made by the authority of the United States, shall be superior to the constitution and laws of any individual state; and their will alone is to decide. If a law of a state, contrary to a treaty, is not void, but avoidable only by a repeal, or nullification by a state legislature, this certain consequence follows, that the will of a small part of the United States may control or defeat the will of the whole. The people of America have been pleased to declare, that all treaties made before the establishment of the national constitution, or laws of any of the states, contrary to a treaty, shall be disregarded."

3. When in Conflict with Acts of Congress.—No distinction is made between treaties made under authority of the United States and the laws of Congress, but both are declared to be the supreme law of the land; consequently, being of equal dignity, when in conflict, effect is to be given to the later as the last expression of the law-making power; so a treaty may supersede a prior act of Congress,¹ and an act of Congress may supersede a prior

Chinese upon street improvements or public works, but permitting it to other aliens, was declared void as in conflict with the treaty with China, which, until abrogated by law of Congress, is the supreme law of the land, the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding. Baker v. Portland, 5 Sawy. (U. S.) 566.

Treaties Removing Property Disabilities of Aliens.—A treaty stipulation may be effectual to protect the land of an alien from forfeiture by escheat, by the laws of the state. See Orr v. Hodgson, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 453; Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483; In re Parrott, 1 Fed. Rep. 502; Kull v. Kull, 37 Hun (N. Y.) 476. In this last case, by a treaty, non-resident aliens were allowed privileges in respect to property, which were denied them under a law of the State of New York. The treaty was held controlling.

In Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483, which was an action by citizens and residents of Switzerland, heirs of an alien who died in Virginia, leaving property which had been adjudged to have escheated to the state, to recover the proceeds of said property, the courts of Virginia held that, by the laws of Virginia, the proceeds of the property sought to be recovered, belonged to the state; but the judgment was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States, on the ground that the laws of Virginia were in conflict with a treaty of the United States with the Swiss Confederation.

In Chirac v. Chirac, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 259, the supreme court held that a treaty with France gave to the citizens of that country the right to purchase and hold land in the United States, and that it removed the incapacity of alienage and placed the parties in precisely the same situation as if they had been citizens of the United States. The state law was hardly adverted to, and seems not to have been considered a factor of any importance in this view of the case. In re Parrott, 1 Fed. Rep.

The treaty between the United States and Württemberg provided that "The citizens or subjects of each of the contracting parties, shall have power to dispose of their personal property within the state of the other by testament, donation, or otherwise, and their heirs, legatees, and donees, being citizens or subjects of the other contracting party, shall succeed to their said personal property and may take possession thereof, either by themselves or by others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their pleasure, paying such duties as the inhabitants of the country where the property lies shall be liable to pay in like cases." This was held not to regulate the testamentary dispositions of citizens or subjects of the contracting powers in reference to property within the country of their origin or citizenship. Frederickson v. Louisiana, 23 How. (U. S.) 445.

A treaty, assuming it to be made conformably to the constitution in substance and form, has the effect, under the general doctrine that "leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogat," of repealing all preëxisting federal laws in conflict with it, whether unwritten, as laws of nations or admiralty, or written, as legislative statutes. Copyright Convention with Great Britain, 6 App. Atty. Gen'l 291.

the two relate to the same subject, the courts will always endeavor to construe them so as to give effect to both, if that can be done without violating the language of either; but if the two are inconsistent, the one last in date will control the other, provided always the stipulation of the treaty on the subject is self-executing."

The treaty of 1832 between the United States and Russia, provided that no higher duties should be imposed on the importation into the United States of any article of produce or manufacture of Russia, than were or should be payable on the like article, if produced or manufactured by any other foreign country. In 1851, Congress passed a law imposing a duty on unmanufactured Russia hemp. In declaring this legislation to be a declaration of Congress, that the provision of the treaty should no longer operate as the law of the land in respect to Russia hemp, in Ropes v. Clinch, 8 Blatchf. (U. S.) 309, Woodruff, J., said: "I understand it to be conceded, and, if it be not, I should be constrained to hold, that the legislative department of this government may pass any law it pleases (if it is otherwise constitutional), notwithstanding it conflicts, and notwithstanding to whatever degree, greater or less, it conflicts, with an existing treaty with a foreign nation. Such legislation is not to be imputed to the government upon any doubtful ground. Every presumption is to be indulged against such legislation, but I speak now of the question of power—that it is in the power of the legislative department of this government to enact such laws as they please (otherwise consistent with the constitution itself), and to give to those laws efficiency and force. . . . If, then, Congress, by legislation inconsistent with a treaty, creates a rule of conduct for its citizens, a rule for the guidance of its courts, the only question is—has it enacted a law which operates to annul, or operates in disregard of, the provisions of a treaty? If it does either or both, then it seems to me within the constitutional power of Congress, and to be binding and conclusive."

In the Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580, where it was objected that an act of Congress violated the provision contained in a treaty with a foreign nation, the court held that the provisions of the act must prevail in all the courts of the country, and said: "So far as a treaty made by the United States with any foreign nation can be the subject of judicial cognizance in the courts of this country, it is subject to such acts as Congress may pass for its enforcement, modification, or repeal."

Chinese Exclusion Acts.—In Fong Yue Ting v. U. S., 149 U. S. 698, declaring the validity of the Geary law, approved May 5th, 1892, Mr. Justice Gray said: "In our jurisprudence it is well settled that the provisions of an act of Congress, passed in the exercise of its constitutional authority, on this, as on any other subject, if clear and explicit, must be upheld by the courts, even in contravention of expressed stipulations in an earlier treaty."

In Chae Chan Ping v. U. S., 130 U. S. 600, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the validity of the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1883 was not affected by the fact that the act was a violation of existing treaties with China. Commenting upon the previous decisions of the treaties, Field, J., said: "The treaties were of no greater legal obligation than the act of Congress. By the constitution, laws made in pursuance thereof, and treaties made under the authority of the United States, are both declared to be the supreme law of the land, and no paramount authority is given to one over the other. A treaty, it is true, is in its nature a contract between nations, and is often merely promissory in its character, requiring legislation to carry its stipulations into effect. Such legislation will be open to future repeal or amendment. If the treaty operates by its own force, and relates to a subject within the power of Congress, it can be deemed in that particular only the equivalent of a legislative act, to be repealed or modified at intent is unmistakable.¹ So an act of Congress will not be given a retrospective effect when to do so would violate any treaty obligation, if such a construction can be avoided.²

VI. EXTRADITION TREATIES.—(See EXTRADITION, vol. 7, pp. 599, 616.)

VII. COMMERCIAL TREATIES.—Every nation may make such commercial treaties as it thinks proper, provided they do not interfere with the perfect rights of others. A state may enter into a treaty by which it grants special or exclusive privileges to others.³ When such privileges have been granted by a state, it may not afterward allow like privileges to others contrary to the purpose of the engagement.⁴

A stipulation in a treaty, that in the imposition of duties upon goods imported into one of the countries, which are the produce or manufacture of the other, no discrimination shall be made against them in favor of goods of like character imported from any other country, does not prevent special arrangements with other countries, founded upon concessions of special privileges.⁵

5. In Bartram v. Robinson, 122 U. S. 116, it was contended, under such a provision in a treaty between the United States and Denmark, that the former was required to extend to the latter, without compensation, privileges which it had conceded to the Hawaiian Islands in exchange for valuable concessions. The first article of the treaty with Denmark provided that the contracting parties should not grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect to commerce and navigation, which should not immediately become common to the other party, who should enjoy the same freely if the concession were freely made, or on allowing the same compensation if the concession were conditional. The fourth article provided that no higher or other duties should be imposed by either party on the importation of any article which is its produce or manufacture, into the country of the other party, than is payable on like articles, being the produce or manufacture of any other foreign country. Field, J., said: "Those stipulations, even if conceded to be self-executing by the way of a proviso or exception to the general law imposing the duties, do not cover concessions like those made to the Hawaiian Islands for a valuable consideration. They were pledges of the two contracting parties, the United States and the King of Denmark, to each other, that in the imposition of duties on goods imported into one of the countries which were the produce or manufacture of the other, there should be no discrimination against them in favor of goods of like character imported from any other country. They imposed an obligation

But a provision of this kind in a treaty promissory in its nature, is addressed to the political and not the judicial department of the government, and the courts cannot try the question whether it has been observed or not.¹

upon both countries to avoid hostile legislation in that respect. But they were not intended to interfere with special arrangements with other countries founded upon a concession of special privileges. The stipulations were mutual, for reciprocal advantages. 'No higher or other duties' were to be imposed by either upon the goods specified; but if any particular favor should be granted by either to other countries in respect to commerce or navigation, the concession was to become common to the other party upon like consideration; that is, it was to be enjoyed freely if the concession were freely made, or on allowing the same compensation, if the concession were conditional. . . . If the exemption is deemed a 'particular favor' in respect of commerce and navigation, within the first article of that treaty, it can only be claimed by Denmark upon like compensation to the United States."

In Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U. S. 190, a similar claim was made under a treaty of the United States with San Domingo; certain merchants doing business in the city of New York imported a large quantity of sugars, the produce and manufacture of the island of San Domingo. These goods were similar in kind to the sugars produced in the Hawaiian Islands, which are admitted free of duty under the treaty with the king of those islands, and the act of Congress passed to carry the treaty into effect. They were duly entered at the custom-house at the port of New York, the plaintiffs claiming, that by a treaty with the Republic of San Domingo, the goods should be admitted on the same terms; that is, free of duty as similar articles, the produce and manufacture of the Hawaiian Islands. The defendant, who was at the time collector of the port, refused to allow this claim, treated the goods as dutiable articles, under the act of Congress, and exacted duties on them. Plaintiff paid under protest the duties exacted, and brought an action to recover the amount. Field, J., affirming the doctrine as stated in Bartram v. Robinson, 122 U. S. 116, said with regard to the special favor clause of the treaty, that "It was never designed to prevent special concessions upon sufficient considerations touching the importation of specific articles into the country of the other. It would require the clearest language to justify a conclusion that our government intended to preclude itself from such engagements with other countries, which in future might be of the highest importance to its interests."

1. Taylor v. Morton, 2 Curt. (U. S.) 454; North German Lloyd S. S. Co. v. Hedden, 43 Fed. Rep. 17.

When it is claimed that unjust discrimination is made by an act of Congress, no question can arise, for the act of Congress supersedes any provision of the treaty. So in Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U. S. 190, though it is stated in the above note that a special exemption allowed to the Hawaiian government for valuable and special concessions did not justify the claims under the treaty with Denmark, Field, J., said: "Independently of considerations of this nature, there is another and complete answer to the pretensions of the plaintiffs. The act of Congress under which the duties were collected, authorized their exaction. It is of general application, making no exception in favor of goods of any country. It was passed after the treaty with the Dominican Republic, and if there be any conflict between the stipulations of the treaty and the requirements of the law, the latter must control."

And in Taylor v. Morton, 2 Curt. (U. S.) 454, though the treaty with Russia stipulated that no higher rate of duties should be imposed on goods imported from Russia than on like articles imported from other places, the question whether certain species of hemp, on which the duty of $25 per ton was imposed by an act of Congress, was like Russian hemp within the meaning of the treaty, was not for the courts to decide. This was a question for Congress, not for the courts.

It is a settled principle of international law, that the sovereign in whose name a war has been prosecuted, cannot justly make peace without including his ally; and when the treaty is concluded by the principal, it is not further obligatory on the allies than they are willing to accede to, unless they have given him full power to treat for them.² A treaty of peace becomes obligatory upon the contracting parties from the moment of its conclusion, which is from the day it is signed, unless a particular time is specified,³ but not upon the subjects until they are duly notified. When subjects of the contracting parties, in ignorance of the conclusion of the treaty, have continued acts of hostility, it is the duty of their government to make prompt restitution of things captured.⁴ But it is held that the individuals are not liable civilly or criminally for injuries caused by their acts of hostility, continued after the date of peace, when in ignorance of it.⁵ A capture before the time fixed for cessation of hostilities, but with knowledge of the conclusion of the treaty of peace, is void.⁶

In order to effect a treaty of peace, the public domain and property may be alienated.⁷ So, also, individual rights acquired by war and the vested rights of citizens may be sacrificed, making, of course, just compensation therefor.⁸

When a cession of territory is made by a treaty of peace, the national character of the territory ceded remains as before until actually transferred;⁹ and until changed by the new sovereign, the laws and customs in force at the time of the cession continue.¹⁰ A change of law may be effected by a mere declara-

Rob. 179, where a vessel was taken by British ships in 1783, after the cessation of hostilities, but before that fact had come to the knowledge of either of the parties, an American owner was denied redress in the British admiralty against the immediate author of the injury. And subsequently, relief was also denied against the admiral in charge of the fleet.

But it is also held by some writers that the person who has caused the injury may be held liable in damages immediately, and that it is the duty of his government to indemnify him. See 1 Kent's Com., p. 170; Woolsey International Law, § 162.

The laws, whether in writing or evidenced by the usage and customs of the conquered or ceded country, continue in force until altered by the new sov-tion of the sovereign power, without formal act of the legislature.¹ The inhabitants of the ceded territory change their allegiance, and their relation to their foreign sovereign is dissolved; but their relation to each other and their rights of property, not taken from them by the conqueror by right of conquest, cession, or by new laws, remain undisturbed.²

IX. VALIDITY OF TREATIES—HOW DETERMINED.—It is not within the province of courts of law to declare that a particular treaty is not binding on one party because violated by the other, but this question is to be decided by the political department of the government, in its discretion.³ But whether a treaty is inconsistent with the fundamental law, as whether the treaty made under the authority of the United States is in conflict with the

In U. S. v. Percheman, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 87, in reference to the treaty between the United States and Spain, which stipulated that "His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States, in full property and sovereignty, all the territories which belonged to him situated eastward of the Mississippi, by the name of East and West Florida," Marshall, C. J., said: "A cession of territory is never understood to be a cession of the property belonging to its inhabitants. The king cedes that only which belongs to him. Lands he had previously granted are not his to cede. Neither party could so understand the cession. Neither party could consider itself as attempting a wrong to individuals condemned by the practice of the whole civilized world. The cession of a territory by its name from one sovereign to another conveying the compound idea of surrendering at the same time the lands and the people who inhabit them, would be necessarily understood to pass the sovereignty only and not to interfere with private property."

By virtue of the grant of lands in Florida, by the Spanish governor, to Indians, the lands were separated from the royal dominion, and became private property, which was not ceded to the United States by the treaty with Spain. Delassus v. U. S., 9 Pet. (U. S.) 117; U. S. v. Fernandez, 10 Pet. (U. S.) 304.

The sovereign power acquiring territorial land by cession, may make such provision with reference to the title to lands therein, as it may think proper. So, by an act of 3d of March, 1803, Congress modified the validity of grants made therein prior to the treaty of cession, by imposing a positive necessity upon the proprietors to record such grants, and made expressly void all rights claimed, if the duty so imposed was not complied with. Harcourt v. Gaillard, 12 Wheat. (U. S.) 528.

3. Taylor v. Morton, 2 Curt. (U. S.) 454.

By an Act of July 7th, 1798, Congress declared that the treaties with France were no longer obligatory on the United States, as they had been repeatedly violated by the French government.

In Jones v. Walker, 2 Paine (U. S.) 696, Jay, C. J., construes validity as applied to treaties as admitting of two descriptions, necessary and voluntary. He says: "By necessary validity, I mean that which results from the treaty's having been made by persons authorized by, and for purposes consistent with, the constitution. To this kind of validity all such questions as these relate, viz.: Has the treaty been made and ratified by the president, by the advice and consent of three-fourths of the constitution, is a question for judicial cognizance; and when the conflict is unavoidable, courts must declare the treaty, so far as concerns its effect as a municipal law, null and void.¹

The courts of the United States cannot inquire into the competency of the parties, contracting for any foreign nation or power, to make the treaty. This question addresses itself to the political department of the government whose action is conclusive upon such inquiry.²

X. EXTINCTION OF TREATY OBLIGATION—1. Violations; Abrogation.—A treaty is violated by proceedings on the part of one of the contracting parties, which are inconsistent with its purpose, or by an intentional breach of one or more of its articles. When so violated by one of the parties, it is not void, but voidable only at the option of the injured party, who alone may deem it annulled and demand redress, or require its observance.³ As between the senators present? Is it temporary, and has it expired? Is it perpetual? Has it been dissolved by mutual agreement? Has it been annulled and declared to be void by the nation, or by those to whom the nation has committed that power? Does it contain articles repugnant to the constitution? Are those articles void? Do they vitiate the whole treaty? etc., etc. By voluntary validity, I mean that validity which a treaty, become voidable by reason of violations, afterwards continues to retain by the silent volition and acquiescence of the nation. I call it, voluntary, because it entirely depends on the will of the nation, either to let it continue to operate, or to annul and extinguish it."

In Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 237, Chase, J., said: "It is the declared duty of the state judges, to determine any constitution, or laws of any state, contrary to that treaty, or any other, made under the authority of the United States, null and void. National or federal judges are bound by duty and oath to the same conduct."

In Cherokee Tobacco v. U. S., 11 Wall. (U. S.) 616, Swayne, J., said: "A treaty cannot change the constitution, or be held valid, if it be in violation of that instrument. This results from the nature and fundamental principles of our government."

If the validity or construction of a treaty of the United States is drawn in question in a state court, and the decision is against its validity, or against the title specially set up by either party under the treaty, the supreme court has jurisdiction to ascertain that title, and determine its legal validity, and is not confined to the abstract construction of the treaty itself. Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. (U. S.) 358.

2. Maiden v. Ingersoll, 6 Mich. 376.

In Fellows v. Blacksmith, 19 How. (U. S.) 366, Nelson, J., said: "A treaty, after being executed and ratified by the proper authorities of the government, becomes the supreme law of the land, and the courts can no more go behind it for the purpose of annulling its effect in operation than they can behind an act of Congress."

In Doe v. Braden, 16 How. (U. S.) 635, Taney, C. J., said that a treaty made by the president with the approval of the Senate is the supreme law of the land, and courts have no right to annul or disregard any of its provisions, unless they violate the constitution of the United States. It would be impossible for the executive department of the government to conduct our foreign relations with any advantage to the country, and to fulfill the duties which the constitution has imposed upon it, if every court in the country was authorized to inquire and decide whether the person who ratified the treaty in behalf of the foreign nation had power by its constitution and laws to make the engagement into which it entered.

contracting parties, questions as to the violation of treaties are not cognizable by the courts of law.¹

The power to abrogate or modify a treaty does not rest exclusively in the hands of the President and Senate of the United States, but Congress, in the exercise of the law-making and law-repealing power, may render a treaty of no effect.² And the courts have no right to inquire into the wisdom of such action of the legislative department of the government.³ So, whether a particular law violates a treaty obligation is not a question for judicial cognizance, and the courts cannot declare it void on that ground. This question addresses itself to the political department of the government, and must be settled by international negotiation.⁴

1. The Nabob of Arcot's Case, 4 Bro. Ch. 180; 2 Ves. Jr. 56.

In Taylor v. Morton, 2 Curt. (U. S.) 454, this subject was elaborately considered by Mr. Justice Curtis, and he held that whether a treaty with a foreign sovereign had been violated by him; whether the consideration of a particular stipulation in a treaty had been voluntarily withdrawn by one party so that it was no longer obligatory on the other; whether the views and acts of a foreign sovereign had given just occasion to the legislative department of our government to withhold the execution of a promise contained in a treaty or to act in direct contravention of such promise, were not judicial questions; that the power to determine these matters had not been confided to the judiciary, which has no suitable means to exercise it, but to the executive and legislative departments of our government, and that they belonged to diplomacy and legislation and not to the administration of the laws. See Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U. S. 195.

The supreme court cannot set itself up as the instrumentality for enforcing the provisions of a treaty with a foreign nation, which the government of the United States as a sovereign power chooses to disregard. Bottler v. Domingues, 130 U. S. 238, reversing (Cal. 1887) 13 Pac. Rep. 685.

2. See supra, this title, Effect and Operation.

With regard to this power of Congress, it has been said that there are three modes in which Congress may practicably, yet efficiently, annul or destroy the operative effect of any treaty with a foreign country. They may do it by giving the notice which the treaty contemplates shall be given before it shall be abrogated, when such a notice was provided for; or if the terms of the treaty require no such notice, they may do it by the formal abrogation of the treaty at once by express terms; and even where there is a provision for the notice, the government of the United States may disregard even that and declare that the treaty shall be from and after its date at an end, and meet the consequences of the responsibility for a breach of faith with a foreign government. Ropes v. Clinch, 8 Blatchf. (U. S.) 304.

Congress may abrogate a treaty in the exercise of the power to declare war, conferred on it by the constitution. U. S. Const., art. 1, § 8, par. 11.

In Taylor v. Morton, 2 Curt. (U. S.) 454, Curtis, J., said: "I think it is impossible to maintain that, under our constitution, the President and Senate exclusively, possess the power to modify or repeal a law found in a treaty. If this were so, inasmuch as they can change or abrogate one treaty, only by making another inconsistent with the first, the government of the United States could not act at all, to that effect, without the consent of some foreign government; for no new treaty, affecting, in any manner, one already in existence, can be made without the concurrence of two parties, one of whom must be a foreign sovereign. That the constitution was designed to place our country in this helpless condition, is a supposition wholly inadmissible."

4. Edye v. Robertson, 112 U. S. 580; Georgia v. Stanton, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 50; In re Ah Lung, 18 Fed. Rep. 28; The Cherokee Tobacco, 11 Wall. (U. S.)

2. Dissolution.—In general, treaties are dissolved in like manner as other contracts, as by the expiration of the time for which they were made, or by the mutual consent of the parties.¹ There may be such a change of circumstances as to justify the dissolution of a treaty.² But treaties are not, as a rule, extinguished ipso facto by war between the contracting parties. Where they contemplate a permanent arrangement of territorial and other national rights, the event of the war does not extinguish them, but they are at most only suspended while it lasts, and unless they are waived by the parties, or new and repugnant stipulations are made, they revive in their operation at the return of peace.³

616; The Amiable Isabella, 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 1; Cushing v. U. S., 22 Ct. of Cl. 11. See also dissenting opinions in Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 5 Pet. (U. S.) 1. In the Clinton Bridge, 1 Woolw. (U. S.) 155, Miller, J., referring to prior treaties, said: "We are of opinion that whatever obligation they may have imposed upon our government, the courts possess no power to declare a statute passed by Congress and approved by the President, void, because it may violate such obligations. Questions of this class are international questions, and are to be settled between the foreign nations interested in the treaties and the political department of our government. When those departments declare a treaty abrogated, annulled, or modified, it is not for the judicial branch of the government to set it up, and assert its continued obligation. If the court could do this, it could annul declarations of war, suspend the levy of armies, and become a great international arbiter, instead of a court of justice for the administration of the laws of the United States."

In Re Ah Lung, 18 Fed. Rep. 29, where it was contended that the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1882 was a violation of the treaty with China, Field, J., sustaining the validity of the act, said: "An act of Congress, then, upon a subject within its legislative power, is as binding upon the courts as a treaty on the same subject. Both are binding, except as the latter one conflicts or interferes with the former. If the nation with whom we have made the treaty objects to the action of the legislative department, it may present its claim to the executive department, and take such other measures as it may deem that justice to its own citizens or subjects requires. The courts cannot heed such complaint, nor refuse to give effect to a law of Congress, however much it may seem to conflict with the stipulations of the treaty. Whether a treaty has been violated by our legislation, so as to be the proper occasion of complaint by the foreign government, is not a judicial question. To the courts it is simply the case of conflicting laws, the last modifying or superseding the earlier."

1. Vattel, p. 125. See CONTRACTS, vol. 3, p. 889.

2. Hooper v. U. S., 22 Ct. of Cl. 408.

So a "treaty may be extinguished when a state of things, which was the basis of the treaty and one of its tacit conditions, no longer exists. In most of the old treaties were inserted the clausula rebus sic stantibus by which the treaty might be construed as abrogated when material circumstances on which it rested changed. To work this effect, it is not necessary that the facts alleged to have changed should be material conditions. It is enough if they were strong inducements to the party asking abrogation. "The maxim 'Conventio omnis intelligitur rebus sic stantibus' is held to apply to all cases in which the reason for a treaty has failed, or there has been such a change of circumstances as to make its performance impracticable except at an unreasonable sacrifice." Whart. Com. Am. Law, § 161.

3. See Woolsey International Law, § 160; Wheat. Int. Law, § 275; Society, etc. v. New Haven, 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 464.

The treaty of 1794, between Great Britain and the United States, is of this character, and under it all American citizens who held lands in Great Britain on the 28th of October, 1795, and their heirs and assigns, are at all times to be considered, so far as regards these lands, not as aliens, but as native subjects of Great Britain. Sutton v. Sutton, 1 Russ. & M. 663.

XI. CONSTRUCTION OF TREATIES.—It is not the province of courts of law to expound treaties with respect to the rights and obligations of the sovereign states parties thereto,¹ but so far as they concern the rights of individuals, it is frequently necessary for the courts to ascertain by construction, the meaning intended to be conveyed by the terms used.² And when this duty arises, the courts adopt those general rules applied in the construction of statutes, contracts, and written instruments generally, in order to effect the purpose and intention of the makers.³

Woolsey says that there are certain stipulations which are in their nature lasting: "Such as, first, those which contemplate a state of war, and therefore have no effect if rendered null by a war; second, those which are declared to be perpetual, like the liberty, under our treaty of 1818 with Great Britain, 'forever to cure and dry fish' in certain places; war can only suspend such a provision; third, those which imply some state or relation in itself permanent; of this kind is a past recognition of a state within certain boundaries, for an organized community upon a specific territory is an admitted fact to which only conquest, the destruction of a condition otherwise permanent, can put an end; fourth, the same perpetual nature belongs to a compact to regard certain rules or interpretations as a part of the law of nations, since the state of peace or war between two parties cannot affect general principles of justice." Woolsey International Law, § 160. See also Kluber, § 165; Vattel, bk. 4, § 42; Philm., vol. 3, 792.

1. Effingstone v. Bedreecumb, Knapp 340; Lindo v. Rodney, 2 Dougl. 613, n.; Hill v. Reardon, 2 Sim. & S. 437; Maiden v. Ingersoll, 6 Mich. 373.
2. Wilson v. Wall, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 83; U. S. v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 407.

When a treaty contains provisions which confer certain rights upon the citizens or subjects of one of the nations residing in the territorial limits of the other, which are capable of enforcement as between private parties in the courts of the country, such courts must resort to the treaty for a rule of decision for the case before it as to a statute. Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580.

3. U. S. v. Payne, 8 Fed. Rep. 892; The Amiable Isabella, 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 1; U. S. v. Percheman, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 83; North German Lloyd S. S. Co. v. Hedden, 43 Fed. Rep. 20; Anderson v. Lewis, Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 178.

In Marryatt v. Wilson, 1 B. & P. 436, where the construction of a treaty between Great Britain and the United States was in question, Eyre, C. J., after observing that a treaty should be construed liberally and consistent with the good faith which always distinguishes a great nation, said: "That courts of law, although not the expounders of a treaty, yet when it is brought under their consideration incidentally, they must say how the treaty is to be understood between the parties to the action, and in doing which they have but one rule by which to govern themselves. We are to construe this treaty as we would construe any other instrument, public or private. We are to collect from the nature of the subject, from the words and the context, the true intent and meaning of the contracting parties, whether they are A and B, or happen to be two independent states."

Compacts between governments or nations, like those between individuals, should be interpreted according to the natural, fair, and received acceptance of the terms in which they are expressed. U. S. v. D'Anterive, 10 How. (U. S.) 609.

Where a treaty between Spain and the United States was drawn up in the Spanish as well as in the English language, that construction which established a conformity between them, prevailed. U. S. v. Percheman, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 89.

Maxims for the Interpretation of Treaties.—Vattel states, as general maxims to be observed in the interpretation of treaties, the following: It is not allowable to interpret what has no need of interpretation; if he who could and ought to have explained himself clearly and fully has not done it, it is the worse for him; he cannot be allowed to introduce subsequent restrictions which he has not expressed; neither the one nor the other of the parties interested

If the terms of a treaty are ambiguous or indefinite, courts may look to the nature of the things to which they relate,¹ and construe them in the light of the circumstances existing at the time the treaty was made, in order to ascertain the purpose of the contracting parties.² But a court cannot add to, alter, or amend, a treaty, for any purpose, by inserting words or clauses.³

in the contract has a right to interpret the deed or treaty according to his own fancy; on every occasion when a person could and ought to have made known his intention, we assume for true against him what he has sufficiently declared; every deed, and every treaty, must be interpreted by certain fixed rules calculated to determine its meaning, as naturally understood by the parties concerned at the time when the deed was drawn up and accepted. Vattel, bk. 2, ch. 16.

Grant.—The term "grant" in a treaty, comprehends not only those which are made in form, but also any concession, warrant, order, or permission to survey, possess, or settle, whether evidenced by writing or parol, or presumed from possession. Strother v. Lucas, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 436; U. S. v. Clarke, 8 Pet. (U. S.) 466; New Orleans v. U. S., 10 Pet. (U. S.) 718.

Laws.—In the term "laws" is included custom and usage when once settled; though it may be comparatively of recent date, and not one of those, to the contrary of which the memory of man runneth not. Strother v. Lucas, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 436.

Subjects.—The term "subjects," used in the Spanish treaty of 1795, is to be construed as including all those who owe allegiance, even temporary, to Spain. The Pizarro, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 227.

Additions, Alterations.—Where one of the contracting parties annexes to a treaty, at the time of ratifying it, a written declaration explaining ambiguous language, or adding new and distinct stipulations, and the treaty with the declaration attached is afterwards ratified by the other party and ratifications exchanged, the declaration annexed is a part of the treaty, and as binding as if inserted in the body of the instrument. Doe v. Braden, 16 How. (U. S.) 635.

1. Vattel, p. 263; Howard v. Ingersoll, 17 Ala. 780. In this case the chancellor states this rule of construction as follows: "In all compacts or treaties between states or nations, the intention of the parties must be our guide in determining any questions in reference to them. If that intention is clear and plain, there is no room for comment, nor necessity for construction, for the intention of the parties being clear, the rule by which the court is to judge is clear. But if the terms or expressions used by the contracting parties are vague or indefinite, or if they are susceptible of a more or less extended signification, we must then look to the nature of the things to which these terms relate, and presume the intention of the parties to be in accordance with reason."

2. Strother v. Lucas, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 438; U. S. v. Payne, 8 Fed. Rep. 892; U. S. v. Clarke, 8 Pet. (U. S.) 462.

3. Chew Heong v. U. S., 112 U. S. 536; Lattimer v. Poteet, 14 Pet. (U. S.) 4.

So in the treaty between the United States and Spain, the section which intended to provide passports for the ships of the respective nations, which were to be "granted according to form annexed" to the treaty, was of no effect in consequence of the failure to annex the form of the passports to the treaty. The Amiable Isabella, 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 1.

A treaty stipulation that "free ships shall make free goods" does not imply the converse proposition that "enemies' ships shall make enemy goods." For although together they constitute a well-recognized rule of law of nations, by express compact nations may stipulate for either, and courts will not imply one from the assertion of the other. The Nereide, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 419.

4. Shanks v. Dupont, 3 Pet. (U. S.) 255. In this case, the question as to who was to be held a "British subject," under the treaty of 1794, was explained by reference to the meaning of the term in the treaty of 1783.

That construction which tends to put the parties in a position of equality should be preferred.¹

When a treaty admits of two constructions, one restrictive as to the rights that may be claimed under it, and the other liberal, the latter is to be preferred.²

The courts should admit that construction which has been adopted by the parties to the treaty, unless the terms of the instrument compel a different one.³ So, that construction which has been placed by the executive upon the terms of the treaty, though not binding upon the judiciary, should be admitted when not inconsistent with their obvious intent.⁴

The provisions of a treaty are to be construed, as intended to be applied to bona fide transactions.⁵

If the legislative and executive branches of the government have given and asserted a construction to a treaty with a foreign power, under which it claims dominion over a territory in its possession, courts will not set up or sustain a different construction. *Foster v. 5. U. S. v. Schooner Amistad, 15 Pet. (U. S.) 595.

6. Clay v. Postal Tel. Co., 70 Miss. 411. In this case a shrub was said to be a low, small plant whose branches grow directly from the earth without any supporting trunk or stem, and it was held that young trees of varying heights and thicknesses were not "shrubs, undergrowth, or bushes," and that a recovery for cutting them down could be had in an action of trespass for cutting down trees.

The word "tree," without explanation, ex vi termini, means a standing tree. Idol v. Jones, 2 Dev. (N. Car.) 162. And see Thompson v. Bernard, 1 Camp. 48; Minors v. Leeford, Cro. Jac. 114.

lease, to reserve the "trees" from the operation of the grant, the term has been held not to include fruit trees.¹

II. TREES ON OR NEAR BOUNDARY LINE—1. Ownership.—A tree is wholly the property of him upon whose land it stands, notwithstanding the roots extend into, or the branches overhang, the land of an adjoining owner.² If the tree stands directly on the boundary line, however, and grows partly on the soil of each, it is the property of both as tenants in common,³ and if one of them

Ornamental Trees.—Shade trees are ornamental trees within the meaning of a statute punishing the destruction of ornamental trees. Lancaster v. Richardson, 4 Lans. (N. Y.) 136.

Not a subject of Larceny.—A standing tree is not a subject of larceny, and it is not actionable slander to charge a person with stealing a tree. Idol v. Jones, 2 Dev. (N. Car.) 162. See also LARCENY, vol. 12, p. 781.

1. Fruit trees are not included within an exception in a lease of "all trees, woods, coppice, wood-grounds of what kind or growth soever." Wyndham v. Way, 4 Taunt. 316; 13 Rev. Rep. 607.

Where a lessor demised certain lands "except and always reserving out of the demise and grant, unto the lessor, all timber trees, and other trees, but not the annual fruit thereof," it was held that apple trees were not within the exception. Bullen v. Denning, 5 B. & C. 842; 12 E. C. L. 383. In this case Littledale, J., said that the word "trees," generally speaking, means wood applicable to buildings and does not include orchard trees. If a man grant all his trees, fruit trees will not pass. Lord Zouch v. Moore, 2 Roll. 280.

By a grant of a manor, except the wood and underwood, all the trees, great and small, are excepted which are known by the name of wood; but apple trees and other such like are not excepted, because they are not comprehended under the term wood. A sale of the trees in the manor of D. would not pass apple trees. Whitton & Weston's Case, Godb. 398.

In Holder v. Coates, 1 M. & M. 112;

22 E. C. L. 264, it is said that if the roots extend into the soil of both parties, the tree belongs to the owner of the land in which it was first planted. See Masters v. Pollie, 2 Roll. 141, where it is said that a proprietor "cannot limit the roots of his tree, how far they shall grow and go."

In Skinner v. Wilder, 38 Vt. 115; 88 Am. Dec. 645, it was held that the location and property in the tree should be determined by the position of the trunk or body above the soil, rather than by the roots within or branches above it. But in Waterman v. Soper, 1 Ld. Raym. 737, it was held that where the tree is wholly upon the land of one, but the roots extend into that of another, the tree, by reason of nourishment derived from both estates, becomes the joint property of the owners of such estates; but that if the roots are entirely in the land on which the tree was planted, the fact that the branches extend over that of an adjoining owner, does not affect the ownership, for the branches follow the root and the property of the whole is in the owner of the land on which the tree was planted. See also Anonymous, 2 Roll. 255; 2 Bouvier's Inst. 158.

By the Civil Code of France, the difficulty is avoided, arts. 670 and 673 declaring boundary hedges and the trees in them to be the common property, save in certain cases; the planting of other trees within certain distances of the hedge is, by art. 671, forbidden, and if any are planted within these distances, the occupier of the adjoining land has, by art. 672, the right to have them removed, and to cut the roots growing into his land.

cuts it down or uses it, the other may maintain trespass therefor,¹ or enjoin the cutting.²

2. Fruit and Clippings.—An adjoining owner has no title to the fruit growing upon the branches of trees which overhang his land, and will be liable in trespass for gathering it,³ or for an assault and battery for using violence to prevent the owner of the trees from gathering it, provided the latter can do so without committing a trespass.⁴ Even though fruit falls from the overhanging branches upon his land, the owner of the trees may go upon the land and take it away without being liable for trespass;⁵ but if, when pruning the trees, the loppings fall upon the adjoining land, the owner cannot enter and take them away, if by using due caution their falling there might have been prevented.⁶

3. Overhanging Branches a Nuisance.—Permitting the branches of trees to extend beyond the soil of the owner, is said to be an unequivocal act of negligence, warranting the party injured in

5. Miller v. Fawdry, Latch. 120.

If a tree standing near the boundary line is blown down and falls upon the land of an adjoining owner, the owner of the tree may enter and remove it. Bac. Abr., "Trespass" (F.)

In Newkirk v. Sabler, 9 Barb. (N. Y.) 655, which was an action for assault which occurred while trying to get a team out of another's field where the pasture had been fenced in, the court said: "If my tree be blown down and fall on the land of my neighbor, I may go on and take it away, and the same rule prevails where fruit falls on the land of another; but if the owner of a tree cut the loppings so that they fall on another's land, he cannot be excused for entering to take them away, on the ground of necessity, because he might have prevented it."

6. Bac. Abr., "Trespass" (F.)

In Miller v. Fandrye, Pop. Rep. 161, which was an action for a trespass by a dog in chasing sheep across a boundary line, Crew, C. J., said: "A man cut thorns and they fell on another's land, and in trespass he justified for it, and the opinion was, that, notwithstanding this justification, trespass lies because he did not plead that he did his best endeavor to hinder them from falling; yet this was a hard case." And see Lambert v. Dessey, Ld. Raym. 422, 467.

abating the nuisance by clipping the branches.¹ An adjoining owner may also sue for damages, but unless the tree is poisonous or noxious in its nature, there must be proof of some real sensible damage to authorize him to maintain such action.²

4. Right to Enjoin Planting.—(See INJUNCTIONS, vol. 10, p. 977.)

III. TREES IN HIGHWAYS AND STREETS—1. Ownership.—As a general rule, the fee in the soil remains in the original owner where a public road is established over it, and while it is used as a highway, he is entitled to the timber which may grow upon the surface.³ He may plant shade trees in the highway, if the public use

1. An adjoining owner may cut off the branches or sue for damages, but he cannot cut down the tree, and can only clip the branches to the extent that they overhang his land. Grandona v. Lovdal, 70 Cal. 161. In this case it was also said that it would seem that he may also abate the roots projecting into his soil, at least if he has suffered actual damage. See also Lonsdale v. Nelson, 2 B. & C. 302; 9 E. C. L. 96; NUISANCES, vol. 16, p. 943; HIGHWAY, vol. 9, p. 413.

But after clipping the branches he cannot carry them, and the fruit they contain, away and convert them to his own use. Skinner v. Wilder, 38 Vt. 115; 88 Am. Dec. 645.

There is no authority in anyone to treat as a nuisance that which is not so, and anyone assuming to abate as a nuisance that which is not so, acts at his peril. Tissot v. Great Southern Tel., etc., Co., 39 La. Ann. 996. In this case, it was held that a company undertaking, under a contract with a municipal corporation, to do a work of public improvement, such as laying a fire-alarm telegraph, had no right to invade the premises of an abutting proprietor and cut off limbs of trees overhanging the sidewalk, which did not obstruct the use of the sidewalk, or when the posts and wires could have been, with less or no inconvenience, located elsewhere. And, to the same effect, see Hodgins v. Toronto, 19 Ont. App. 537.

2. Countryman v. Lighthill, 24 Hun (N. Y.) 405. The complaint in this case alleged that in consequence of the overhanging limbs, the plaintiff's garden was damaged. The only proof on the subject was that plaintiff had berry bushes on his side of the line, and thought there was a difference between those in the shade and those which were not. What the difference was—whether the shaded bushes were injured or benefited by the shade—did not appear, and it was held that the action was misconceived and that the justice erred in rendering judgment for the plaintiff. It also said that the plaintiff's remedy was by clipping the branches, especially if the owner of the tree refused to do so when requested.

In Crowhurst v. Amersham Burial Board, 4 Exch. Div. 5; 39 L. T. 355; 18 Alb. L. J. 515, the defendant, having planted on his own ground yew trees, noxious and poisonous to horses, so near to a neighbor's lot that his horse, while feeding therein, cropped the overhanging branches and died with the poison contained in what he ate, was held liable, solely on the ground that the trees were poisonous.

Poisonous Clippings.—A declaration that the defendant was possessed of yew trees, the clippings of which he knew to be poisonous, and that it was his duty to prevent the clippings from being placed on land not occupied by him; that he took so little care of the same that they were placed upon land not occupied by him, whereby the horses of the plaintiff were poisoned, was held on demurrer to disclose no fact from which a duty could be inferred in the defendant to take care of the clippings. Wilson v. Newberry, L. R., 7 Q. B. 31.

Sadler*, 104 N. Y. 229; 58 Am. Rep. 498; Shawnee County v. Beckwith, 10 Kan. 608; Weller v. McCormick, 52 N. J. L. 470; Winter v. Peterson, 24 N. J. L. 524; 61 Am. Dec. 678; *Brainard v. is not thereby endangered or obstructed,¹ and anyone who unnecessarily or without authority interferes with or destroys them, will be liable in trespass to the owner,² or may, at his instance, be

In Lyman v. Arnold, 5 Mason (U. S.) 198, Story, J., said: "Where a highway is made over another's land, the soil remains in the owner, subject to the easement. If there are trees on it, they are his. If it be necessary to cut them down and remove them in order to make the highway safe, still the property in the trees so cut down is unchanged. The reason is that nothing is deemed included to pass as an incident to the easement but what is necessary to its reasonable enjoyment. The change of property in such trees is not necessary to such enjoyment."

The owner of the soil retains all his rights not incompatible with the public right of way, and may maintain trespass for cutting timber. Babcock v. Lamb, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 238.

But where road allowances are made to a municipality from government lands, the municipality may maintain an action against anyone cutting timber thereon. Barrie Tp. v. Gillies, 20 U. C. C. P. 369.

Trover for Timber Cut from Highway.—The owner of the soil may maintain trover for timber cut from the highway in front of his land, where defendant's passage was not obstructed by the trees. Sanderson v. Haverstick, 8 Pa. St. 294.

Use of Trees for Repairing Highway.—When land is taken for a highway, the public acquire the right to take the trees standing within the limits of the right of way for the purpose of making and repairing the road and bridges. Lancaster v. Richardson, 4 Lans. (N. Y.) 140. But see contra, Baker v. Shephard, 24 N. H. 208.

1. Wellman v. Dickey, 78 Me. 29; Quinton v. Burton, 61 Iowa 471; Lancaster v. Richardson, 4 Lans. (N. Y.) 136. And see People's Ice Co. v. Steamer Excelsior, 44 Mich. 233; 38 Am. Rep. 246. The policy of our laws favors the planting and preservation of shade trees in the public streets, where they do not constitute actual obstructions. Clark v. Dasso, 34 Mich. 86.

The owners of the soil may lawfully use the dividing space between the carriage path and sidewalks for the growth of trees for ornament or use, and trees thus situated are in no sense nuisances, but specially protected from injury by New Hampshire Comp. Stats., ch. 560, § 19. Graves v. Shattuck, 35 N. H. 257; 69 Am. Dec. 536.

Where shade trees have been allowed to stand where they were planted in a public way for more than twenty years, the presumption is thereby raised that they were planted under lawful authority. Bliss v. Ball, 99 Mass. 597. But in Gaylord v. King, 142 Mass. 495, it was held that the fact that trees had remained in the highway, the fee of which was in the public, for sixteen or seventeen years without objection, did not raise a presumption that license had been granted the lot owner to plant them which would give him the ownership thereof under Massachusetts Pub. Stats. (1882), ch. 54, § 6.

Responsibility of Owner.—The abutting owner must use reasonable care to prevent such trees from becoming dangerous to the passing public, and will be liable in damages to anyone injured through his negligence in this respect. Thus, he will be held liable to a passerby injured by the falling of a decayed limb. Weller v. McCormick, 52 N. J. L. 470.

2. Phifer v. Cox, 21 Ohio St. 248; 8 Am. Rep. 58; Beauchamp v. Montreal, 7 Mont. Super. Ct. 382.

Trees so planted are a public benefit and cannot be destroyed without the call of public necessity; and highway commissioners who destroy them without reason or necessity are trespassers, and if the act is wanton, are liable for exemplary damages. Wellman v. Dickey, 78 Me. 29; Winter v. Peterson, 24 N. J. L. 524; 61 Am. Dec. 678.

If the trees encroach upon the highway and must be removed, the adjacent owner has a right, and must be afforded reasonable opportunity, to take them as living trees and transplant them elsewhere, and a highway commissioner who acts upon his own judgment in removing them, instead of instituting a prosecution, must take the risk of a jury differing with him in opinion in case he is prosecuted. Clark v. Dasso, 34 Mich. 86. See also People's Ice Co. v. Steamer Excelsior, 44 Mich. 233; 38 Am. Rep. 246.

restrained from removing them.¹ Laws passed for the protection of such trees, and prohibiting their mutilation or removal, have been held not to apply to the owner.²

In Bliss v. Ball, 99 Mass. 597, it was held that only the mayor and aldermen or selectmen have authority to cause shade trees lawfully standing in the public way to be removed against the will of the owner, and anyone assuming to destroy them, on the ground that they are a public nuisance, is liable in damages. It was also held to be no ground of defense or mitigation of damages that the trees rendered the defendant's house damp and unwholesome.

Such trees are presumptively the private property of the adjacent landowner, and whoever injures them is presumptively a trespasser against such owner, who may forcibly protect them from an impending injury. Graves v. Shattuck, 35 N. H. 257; 69 Am. Dec. 536.

Whether or not a tree cut down by an overseer of highways obstructed the public in the use of the road, or whether it was cut down maliciously, are questions for the jury. Winter v. Peterson, 24 N. J. L. 524; 61 Am. Dec. 678.

In Castleberry v. Atlanta, 74 Ga. 164, it was said that "shade-trees on the city's sidewalks and streets belong to the city, and in grading the streets and sidewalks they may be removed, if necessary to the grading. The court certainly went to the extreme of the law when it authorized damage for negligently and carelessly killing them." And in Hodgins v. Toronto, 19 Ont. App. 537, it was held that where the Ontario Tree-Planting Act (R. S. Ont., ch. 201) is not in force, the abutting owner has no interest in trees growing in the street sufficient to enable him to complain of the clipping of the branches by a telephone company with the assent of the city.

Telephone Company Clipping Branches.—Where a telephone company, without permission, but thinking it had it, cut off the top of a handsome elm standing in front of a centrally located lot available for high-class buildings, damages to the amount of $150 were awarded. Hoyt v. Southern New England Teleph. Co., 60 Conn. 385.

In Mississippi, boards of supervisors cannot grant to a telegraph or telephone company a right of way along the margin of a highway, and such company will be liable for cutting trees or branches on adjoining land. Clay v. Postal Tel. Co., 70 Miss. 406. But see Hodgins v. Toronto, 19 Ont. App. 537.

Where Fee of the Street Is in City.—But where the fee of a street is owned by the municipality, it is a good defense to an action against the municipal authorities for removing trees from the front of plaintiff's lot. Gaylord v. King, 142 Mass. 495.

Trees on Railroad Right of Way.—A railroad company may remove ornamental or other trees from its right of way to fit their track for safe and convenient use, either when originally constructing the road or afterwards. The company is the sole judge of the necessity of such removal, and the burden of proof to justify does not rest upon them. Brainard v. Clapp, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 6; 57 Am. Dec. 74.

1. A road supervisor will, at the instance of a landowner, be restrained from removing trees standing in the highway adjacent to, and in front of, his land, unless such removal is demanded by the wants of the public travel and convenience, and the determination of the supervisor does not so far partake of a judicial character as that it cannot be reviewed and controlled. Bills v. Belknap, 36 Iowa 583.

The fact that it would cost more to build a bridge in the middle than at the east side of a highway, is not a sufficient reason why a road supervisor should not be enjoined from building it at the east side, when it appears that by so doing plaintiff's hedge and shade trees would be destroyed. Quinton v. Burton, 61 Iowa 471. See also Crimson v. Deck, 84 Iowa 344.

2. Lancaster v. Richardson, 4 Lans. (N. Y.) 136. But in Baker v. Normal, 81 Ill. 108, an ordinance prohibiting the hitching of horses to shade trees in the streets, was held to apply to the owner of the adjoining property, notwithstanding he had set out the trees with the permission of the town. In this case it was said that the town has the control of the streets, and if it permits its citizens to improve and adorn that part in front of their lots, the improve-

2. Municipal Control.—It is the duty of the municipal authorities to have trees or their branches which have become dangerous to, or obstruct public travel in streets and highways removed,¹ and the municipality will be liable for any injury resulting from their negligence in this respect.² Where the proper officers fail to have such obstructions removed, mandamus lies to compel them.³

IV. DAMAGES FOR DESTRUCTION.—The owner may recover for damage done by the destruction of trees, and the measure of damages, in the case of full-grown timber trees, is usually the value of the trees.⁴ When fruit or ornamental trees are dement and adornment does not thereby become the property of the citizen.

1. It is not necessary that a highway be rendered impassable in order to constitute an obstruction, and trees standing therein in such positions as to interfere with travel should be removed by the road supervisor. Patterson v. Vail, 43 Iowa 142. But unless they obstruct travel, they do not constitute a nuisance, and a city council has no right to declare them such and order them removed. Everett v. Council Bluffs, 46 Iowa 66. In this case it was held that a city council, even under a charter giving it a general power "to declare what shall be a nuisance and to prevent, remove, or abate the same," has no power to declare a thing a nuisance which is not such at common law and which has not been declared to be such by statute.

But in Chase v. Oshkosh, 81 Wis. 313, it was held that the decision of the city council that trees growing within the limits of a sidewalk are obstructions which should be removed, is not reviewable by the courts, in the absence of evidence to show an abuse of discretion.

Under § 6 Wm. IV., ch. 50, § 65, giving a justice of the peace power to order and direct that all trees growing near a highway which prejudice the highway by excluding the sun and wind therefrom, be "pruned or lopped," it was held that the term "lop" meant to cut off the branches laterally, and that the section did not give any power or any authority to the justices or the surveyor to cut off the tops of any tree. Unwin v. Hanson (1891), 2 Q. B. 115. The order of the justices for lopping trees served on the occupying tenant is sufficient. Woodard v. Billerica Highway Board, 11 Ch. Div. 214.

2. In Chase v. Lowell, 151 Mass. 422, it was held that where the superintendent of streets of a city had been notified that a shade tree standing in the highway was unsound and dangerous, and did not proceed to obtain authority to have it cut down and removed, nor take due precaution against the danger, the city was liable to a traveler who, while in the exercise of due care, was injured by its fall.

Where a municipality has authority to plant, rear, trim, and preserve ornamental shade trees in its streets, proof that a party owns and occupies the lot in front of which a tree stands is not sufficient evidence that he planted or maintains the tree for his own use, so as to charge him with responsibility for an injury received by a party upon whom a neglected rotten limb had fallen. Weller v. McCormick, 47 N. J. L. 397; 54 Am. Rep. 175.

Where the servants of the municipality, in getting materials on land adjoining the road for its repair, felled a tree which in falling lodged against another tree near the road, and being left there afterwards fell and killed plaintiff's wife while passing along the road, the municipality was held liable. Gilchrist v. Carden Tp., 26 U. C. C. P. 1.

Where plaintiff, while riding on the top of a load of hay along a highway, was pushed off by coming in contact with a branch of a tree, and severely injured, and it appeared that the branches hung over the traveled portion of the road so low as to leave an insufficient space thereunder for the passage of a load of hay, and that this condition had existed for more than ten years, it was held to present a case of inexcusable negligence on the part of the town, and the plaintiff was allowed to recover damages resulting from the injury. Embler v. Wallkill, 57 Hun (N. Y.) 384. See also HIGHWAY, vol. 9, p. 384.

3. Patterson v. Vail, 43 Iowa 142.

4. Where timber forming part of a forest, is fully grown, the value of the trees taken or destroyed can be recov-stroyed, however, as they are of little or no value when severed from the realty, the measure of damages is the diminished value of the ered. In nearly all jurisdictions this is all that may be recovered, and the reason assigned is that the realty has not been damaged, because the trees having been brought to maturity, the owner is advantaged by their being cut and sold, to the end that the soil may again be put to productive uses. Wooden Ware Co. v. U. S., 106 U. S. 432; Ward v. Carson River Wood Co., 13 Nev. 44; Bennett v. Thompson, 13 Ired. (N. Car.) 146; Foot v. Merrill, 54 N. H. 490; 20 Am. Rep. 151; Beede v. Lamprey, 64 N. H. 510; Coxe v. England, 65 Pa. St. 212; Ross v. Scott, 15 Lea (Tenn.) 479; Tuttle v. Wilson, 52 Wis. 643; Cotter v. Plumer, 72 Wis. 476; Cushing v. Longfellow, 26 Me. 306; Smith v. Gonder, 22 Ga. 353; Graessle v. Carpenter, 70 Iowa 166; Striegel v. Moore, 55 Iowa 88; White v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 1 S. Dak. 326; 3 Sedgw. on Dam. (8th ed.), § 933. See also DAMAGES, vol. 5, p. 36. But in New York, even where full-grown timber is cut or destroyed, the damage to the land may also be regarded, and in such cases the measure of damages is the difference in the value of the land before and after the cutting or destruction complained of. Dwight v. Elmira, etc., R. Co., 132 N. Y. 202; Bevier v. Delaware, etc., Canal Co., 13 Hun (N. Y.) 260; Morehouse v. Mathews, 2 N. Y. 514. And see cases cited infra, next note.

This rule is also applicable to nursery trees grown for market, because they have a value for transplanting. The soil is not damaged by their removal and their market value necessarily furnishes the true rule of damages. Birket v. Williams, 30 Ill. App. 451; Dwight v. Elmira, etc., R. Co., 132 N. Y. 202; 3 Sedgw. on Dam. (8th ed.), p. 48.

Where forest trees were destroyed by fire from a railroad locomotive, the measure of damages was held to be the difference in the value of the trees before and after the fire. Atkinson v. Atlantic, etc., R. Co., 63 Mo. 367; Greenfield v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 83 Iowa 270.

The invariable rule of damages in all actions for such unlawful cutting, as fixed by the Wisconsin statute, is the highest market value of the logs or timber between the cutting and the trial, unless the defendant, within the time limited, serve upon plaintiff an affidavit that the cutting was done by mistake, and tender judgment as prescribed in the act. Webber v. Quaw, 46 Wis. 118; Haseltine v. Mosher, 51 Wis. 443. See also Befay v. Wheeler, 84 Wis. 135.

Where timber had been cut and piled, but before it was entirely removed a portion was destroyed by fire, it was held that an instruction that plaintiff could recover the value of the timber cut down, except the portion destroyed by fire, was correct. Skinner v. Wheeler, 2 Hun (N. Y.) 598.

In Fremont, etc., R. Co. v. Crum, 30 Neb. 70, it was held, where young trees and timber were destroyed by fire from the railroad, that the measure of damages was the amount of damage the trees and timber suffered by reason of the fire, and not the difference in the value of the land with the standing trees and timber before the fire and afterwards; and, in determining the amount of damages, that the inquiry should be as to the value of the trees burned as standing timber, and not the market price for transplantation as shade or ornamental trees.

The plaintiff may recover the value of the trees as they lay upon the land, and is not restricted to the value of the trees as they stood. Firmin v. Firmin, 9 Hun (N. Y.) 571. Where the trespass is the result of mere inadvertence, the value of the timber when first cut is the measure of damages. Gardere v. Blanton, 35 La. Ann. 811. See also Yarborough v. Nettles, 7 La. Ann. 116.

Punitive Damages.—Where the cutting is done under a bona fide belief that the land belongs to him, the damages should be restricted to the injury shown by the proof to have been inflicted. Yahoola River Min. Co. v. Irby, 40 Ga. 479. See also LOGS AND LUMBER, vol. 13, p. 1048.

Time of Estimating Value.—The value of the trees cut should be estimated by the price of timber of that quality at the time it was cut. Schlater v. Gay, 28 La. Ann. 340.

Effect of Payment of Damages.—In Betts v. Lee, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 348; 4 Am. Dec. 368, it was held that the settlement of a suit for trespass in cutting timber, and recovering compensation, did not transfer to the trespasser land.¹ This rule is also applied to shade trees and growing timber trees.² When the land is injured by the destruction or cutting of trees, such injury may also be taken into consideration in determining the question of damages.³

a right to the timber cut down and remaining on the land. And, to the same effect, see Curtis v. Groat, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 168; 5 Am. Dec. 204.

1. The measure of damages for the destruction of fruit trees is the difference in the value of the realty before and after such destruction. Dwight v. Elmira, etc., R. Co., 132 N. Y. 199, criticising Whitbeck v. New York Cent. R. Co., 36 Barb. (N. Y.) 644; Mitchell v. Billingsley, 17 Ala. 391. See also Bennett v. Thompson, 13 Ired. (N. Car.) 149.

In either case the measure of recovery is the value of the trees, the difference being in the mode of ascertaining it; thus, in the case of forest trees having no value except as timber, the means by which to determine the damage occasioned by their removal must be quite different from that pursued in determining the value of fruit trees, which may have no value whatever when removed from the soil. Montgomery v. Locke, 72 Cal. 77.

The measure of damages for the destruction of an orchard is not the cost of replacing the trees, and the care and labor bestowed on the destroyed trees before the burning, but the value of the destroyed trees at the date of the destruction. Stoner v. Texas, etc., R. Co., 45 La. Ann. 115; Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Bohannon, 85 Va. 293. See also Whitbeck v. New York Cent. R. Co., 36 Barb. (N. Y.) 644.

The value of an orchard is to be estimated with reference to what, in its growing state, it is worth to the premises. Mitchell v. Billingsley, 17 Ala. 391.

In U. S. v. Taylor, 35 Fed. Rep. 484, it was held that, in an action for cutting growing trees, if they had a value which could be accurately measured without reference to the soil, the recovery should be of their value, and not for the difference in the value of the land before and after such injury. See also Whitbeck v. New York Cent. R. Co., 36 Barb. (N. Y.) 644.

In McDougall v. Moulezun, 39 La. Ann. 1005, which was an action for clipping the branches of ornamental trees, it was held that in estimating the damages, allowance should be made for the fact that time would soon replace them.

2. The value of young timber, like the value of a growing crop, may be but little when separated from the soil. The land stripped of its trees may be valueless. The trees, considered as timber, may, from their youth, be valueless, and so the injury done will be imperfectly compensated, unless the plaintiff should receive such a sum as would be equal to their value to him while standing upon the soil. Wallace v. Goodall, 18 N. H. 456; Longfellow v. Quimby, 33 Me. 457; Chipman v. Hibberd, 6 Cal. 162; Hayes v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 45 Minn. 17; Carner v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 43 Minn. 375.

The same rule prevails as to shade trees which, though fully developed, may add a further value to the freehold for ornamental purposes or in furnishing shade for stock. Nixon v. Stillwell, 52 Hun (N. Y.) 353; Dwight v. Elmira, etc., R. Co., 132 N. Y. 203; Hoyt v. Southern New England Teleph. Co., 60 Conn. 385. The market value of the lumber would be a poor recompense, and the measure of damages, in such a case, is not necessarily the value of the wood and timber moved, but the solid and permanent injury to the inheritance. White v. Stoner, 18 Mo. App. 540.

3. Ensley v. Nashville, 2 Baxt. (Tenn.) 144; Knisely v. Hire, 2 Ind. App. 86; Chipman v. Hibbard, 6 Cal. 162. It is not difficult to see that serious injury may result from the cutting of timber on a wood-lot to the whole farm, by which it is used to supply fuel, fencing, and timber, and no sound reason exists why damages should not be recovered by reason of such destruction. Argotsinger v. Vines, 82 N. Y. 314. In this case, it was held that evidence was properly received as to the value of the farm with its timber and its value after it was cut, and that the difference furnished a proper measure of damages. And see, to the same effect, Van Duesen v. Young, 29 N. Y. 9; Easterbrook v. Erie R. Co., 51 Barb. (N. Y.) 94; Harder v. Harder, 26 Barb. (N. Y.) 409.

In trespass quare clausum, with an averment for taking and carrying away

The action should be in trespass quære clausum; for if trover is brought, the plaintiff is limited in his recovery to the loss of the trees, and can recover nothing for the injury to the realty.¹

trees, the plaintiff may recover for the whole injury to the land, including the damage for prematurely cutting the trees, and for the loss of the trees themselves. Beede v. Lamprey, 64 N. H. 511; Wallace v. Goodall, 18 N. H. 456; Footte v. Merrill, 54 N. H. 490.

The injury done the possession is the gist of the action, and the value of the timber is admissible in proof of the damage sustained. Kolb v. Bankhead, 18 Tex. 228.

The defendant should pay the value of the timber used or destroyed, and for any injury the destruction has caused. Watterston v. Jetcher, 7 Rob. (La.) 20.

The Michigan statute allowing damages for cutting and taking away timber, fairly construed, includes not merely the value of the timber or wood cut, but such damages as accrue to the freehold by their destruction. When the action is merely for carrying away timber already cut, the damages could not go well beyond its value; but when standing trees are cut down, the rule of damages would fairly be the amount which the value of the estate is diminished by their destruction. Skeels v. Starrett, 57 Mich. 354; Miller v. Wellman, 75 Mich. 359; Achey v. Hull, 7 Mich. 430.

If the value of the timber cut covers the damage done the land, that should be the basis of the verdict; but if not, it should be the damage done the land by the cutting and removal of the timber. Thompson v. Moiles, 46 Mich. 42.

In Bailey v. Chicago, etc., R. Co. (S. Dak. 1893), 54 N. W. Rep. 596, it was held that the owner may bring his action, either for the value of the trees destroyed or for the injury to the real estate, and that in the former action the measure of damages is the market value of the trees, in the latter, the diminished value of the real estate. Kellan, J., delivering the opinion of the court in this case, said: "A single tree, a grove of growing trees, or a forest of mature timber, has an intrinsic estimable value for the material it contains. That value may be more or it may be less than what it adds to the value of the real estate upon which it stands. If the tree, or the grove, or the forest is destroyed, the owner ought to be allowed to exercise his own judgment, whether he will seek to recover the value of his property destroyed, or the diminished value of his land. When he does this, he determines the rule of damages by which his injury will be measured." This case was followed in Uhe v. Chicago, etc., R. Co. (S. Dak. 1893), 54 N. W. Rep. 601.

Where the action is brought solely for the value of the timber cut, and not for damages to the land, it is not error to reject evidence as to how much the land has been damaged. Coody v. Gress Lumber Co., 82 Ga. 793.

As to the measure of damages in an action of trover, and when plaintiff can recover the enhanced value, and also as to the proper form of action, see LOGS AND LUMBER, vol. 13, pp. 1047, 1048, n. See also TROVER, vol. 26.

Replevin.—Replevin may be maintained for trees severed from the land, and the plaintiff's right to pursue his property, wherever it can be identified, is unaffected by any change made in the shape or form. If the trees were cut in good faith upon some supposed right, the defendant may deduct the value of his time, labor or skill; but if the trespass were wanton or willful, no allowance will be made for the increased value bestowed. Heard v. James, 49 Miss. 236; Single v. Schneider, 24 Wis. 299; Hungerford v. Redford, 29 Wis. 345; Herdic v. Young, 35 Pa. St. 176. And see REPLEVIN, vol. 20, p. 1061.

In Single v. Schneider, 30 Wis. 570, it was held that even though the timber were cut knowingly and willfully, without color or claim of right, the measure of damages would be the stumpage, unless the taking was accompanied by special circumstances, as of malice or insult, justifying exemplary damages. But this case is strongly disapproved in Nesbitt v. St. Paul Lumber Co., 21 Minn. 491, and Skinner v. Pinney, 19 Fla. 50; 45 Am. Dec. 1.

In many of the states, statutes have been enacted allowing the owner of land to recover treble damages, or a specified penalty for each tree cut, from anyone who enters upon his property and cuts and carries away trees or timber without his consent; but the courts, in construing such statutes, have usually held that if the trees are cut by one under the mistaken belief that the land is his own, and not wantonly or willfully, only single damages can be recovered.¹ The word "owner," as used in such statutes, is usually held to mean the owner of the fee.²

lands willfully, fraudulently, or negligently, or without authority, and made into saw-logs, the government may replevy such logs or sue in trover for their value, and in either case may recover, without deduction, for their enhanced value, after severance from the freehold, arising from the labor of the wrongdoer. Bly v. U. S., 4 Dill. (U. S.) 464.

There need be no malicious motive; hence, where the title to the land was in litigation and had been decided adversely to defendant, if pending an appeal he enters and cuts timber, he will be liable to treble damages. During the litigation he should let the timber alone. Wright v. Brown, 5 Kan. 600.

It is immaterial that the defendant supposed he was cutting on public land. Unless he has a reasonable cause to believe the land was his own, he is liable to treble damages. Emerson v. Beavaus, 12 Mo. 511; Givens v. Kendrick, 15 Ala. 648; Perkins v. Hackleman, 26 Kan. 41.

A railroad company, acting in good faith under a supposed authority conferred by its charter, is not liable to treble damages. Lindell v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 25 Mo. 550.

A penalty is sometimes prescribed of so much for each tree cut, Mhoon v. Greenfield, 52 Miss. 434; and where different penalties are annexed to the felling of different trees, the declaration should set out and distinguish the different classes to which the trees felled belong. Whitecraft v. Vanderver, 12 Ill. 235. Where the statute provides for the recovery of a certain sum per tree, the judgment must be for some multiple thereof. Behymer v. Odell, 31 Ill. App. 350.

I. IN GENERAL: DEFINITION; CONSTITUENTS—1. Definition.—Trespass, in its usual legal acceptation, is a wrong done with force, to the person, property, or rights of another.¹ It is also the

1. Bouv. Law Dict. Any interference, however slight, which unlawfully disturbs another in the enjoyment of his property, is a trespass. Rand v. Sargent, 23 Me. 326; 39 Am. Dec. 625.

Forcible disturbance of peaceable possession is trespass; and an action therefor involves no question of title. Newcombe v. Irwin, 55 Mich. 620.

An entry on the land of another without license, and without express or implied permission from the owner, is a trespass. Hatch v. Donnell, 74 Me. 163.

Trespass is the proper remedy where there is no right to distrain, and the seizure is illegal. Dickson v. Parker, 3 How. (Miss.) 219; 34 Am. Dec. 78.

Injury is immediate and therefore trespass, only when it is directly occasioned by, and is not merely a consequence resulting from, the act complained of. Holly v. Boston Gaslight Co., 8 Gray (Mass.) 123; 69 Am. Dec. 233.

Constructive possession of goods, by one having the general property in them and a right to reduce them to possession at pleasure, is sufficient to maintain either trespass or replevin. There is a tortious taking, whenever there is an unlawful meddling with the property, or an exercise or claim of dominion over it, without any pretense of authority or right. This, without a manual seizing of the property, is sufficient, and an action of trespass or replevin will lie. Haythorn v. Rushforth, 19 N. J. L. 160; 38 Am. Dec. 540.

Trespass lies whether the injury is willful or not, if the injurious act is the immediate result of the force originally applied by the defendant, and the plaintiff is injured thereby; thus, where the defendant cut trees on his own land and one accidentally fell on the land of the plaintiff, the latter may maintain an action of trespass. Neuson v. Anderson, 2 Ired. (N. Car.) 42; 37 Am. Dec. 406.

Yet it is held that trespass will not lie for an injury which is caused by an unavoidable accident. So, in Gibbons v. Pepper, 4 Mod. 405, it was held that where a horse runs away with his rider against his will, and he could not have avoided it, and runs against another, there is no injury in the rider. And in Wakeman v. Robinson, 2 Bing. 213, which was an action of trespass for driving against the plaintiff's horse and injuring him with the shafts of a gig, it was held to be a good defense, that the horse was frightened by the noisy and rapid approach of a butcher's cart, and became ungovernable, so that the injury was occasioned by an unavoidable accident. And in Goodman v. Taylor, 5 Car. & P. 410, which was an action for an injury done to a horse by a pony and chaise running into it, evidence was given on the part of the defendant, that his wife was holding the pony by the bridle when it became frightened by a passing show. It was held that this was a good defense under a plea of not guilty.

In Vincent v. Steiner, 7 Vt. 62, Williams, C. J., after an examination of the authorities, said: "The result of our examination is that we think there must be some blame, or want of care and prudence, to make a man answerable in trespass; and that where a horse takes a sudden fright, and there is no imprudence in the rider, either in managing the horse or in driving an unsafe horse, and the horse runs against another and injures him, the trespass is wholly involuntary and unavoidable, for which no action can be maintained; and although a man is held responsible for injuries occasioned by his cattle, as was urged in the argument, it is on the ground that blame is attached to him in not restraining them, and that it is his duty to keep them from mischief and to make use of care and prudence in proportion to the necessity of the case. It is on the ground that no blame is attached to him that he is not responsible for damages arising from the vicious propensities of domestic animals, unless he knew of such propensity and neglects to take the proper precaution to prevent their injuring others."

An action of trespass may be maintained against idiots or lunatics, who are presumed to have no will, for the mind need not concur in the act occasioning the injury. Ogle v. Barnes, 8 Tr. 191; Gates v. Miles, 3 Conn. 70.

The act of uncocking a gun is voluntary and not unavoidable. Underwood v. Hewson, 1 Str. 596.

name of an action in tort; the remedy which is used when it is desired to recover damages for violent or forcible injury either to the person or property.¹ Force is the gist or criterion

An action of trespass is an appropriate remedy where one's property, or the property of a person of whom he has become administrator, has been tortiously taken. Osborn v. Bell, 5 Den. (N. Y.) 370; 49 Am. Dec. 275.

Parties engaged in the prosecution of a lawful act are not liable for an accidental injury occurring during the performance of the act, when due care and precaution have been exercised. Williams v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 2 Mich. 259; 55 Am. Dec. 59.

1. Bouv. Law Dict.

Illustrations—As to Personalty.—The defendant's gig, in which he was driving at a "brisk trot" through a "narrow street," came in contact with the plaintiff's horse, which was loose in the street, and was walking obliquely across the defendant's course, and killed him. It was held that the accident was owing to the defendant's carelessness, or to his imprudent driving, and that he was liable for the value of the horse. Payne v. Smith, 4 Dana (Ky.) 497.

The owner of a cow which is accustomed to hook, the vicious propensity being known to her owner, is liable for damage done by her, although it is done in the highway against the land of her owner, and while going to her usual watering place. Cogswell v. Baldwin, 15 Vt. 404.

The defendant applied to the bailee of goods for them, saying that he had authority from the owner to sell them, and took the goods, sold them, and paid part of the proceeds of the sale to the bailee, requesting him to pay it to the owner. The owner received the same without objection, and requested the bailee to call on the defendant for the remainder. It was held that trespass de bonis asportatis, could not be maintained by the owner against the defendant, although he did not show any authority from the owner to make the sale. Wellington v. Drew, 16 Me. 51.

The defendants untied plaintiff's horse, and removed him from the post to which the owner had fastened him, and which the plaintiff's right to use, if not exclusive, was at least as good as the defendants'. It was held that this constituted a technical trespass for which the plaintiff would be entitled to recover nominal damages, if nothing more. Bruch v. Carter, 32 N. J. L. 554; Harrison v. Wisdom, 7 Heisk. (Tenn.) 99; Nelson v. Bondurant, 26 Ala. 341; Furlong v. Bartlett, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 401; Imlay v. Sage, 5 Conn. 489; Coxe v. England, 65 Pa. St. 212; Mills v. Wooters, 59 Ill. 234.

Trespass will not lie for bare neglect by an infant or adult to use a hired animal with ordinary care, to protect him from injury, and return him as agreed upon. Campbell v. Stakes, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 137; 19 Am. Dec. 561.

After a delivery of goods sold, the seller cannot, on account of fraud in the contract, forbid the goods to be taken away, and bring an action of trespass against the person taking them away. M'Carty v. Vickery, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 348.

Trespass will not lie against a person, coming to the possession of goods lawfully, for any subsequent unlawful conversion of them. Bradley v. Davis, 14 Me. 44; 30 Am. Dec. 729.

The owner of a bull is liable in trespass if the bull breaks into an inclosure and gores a horse of his neighbor so that he dies; and the measure of damages is the value of the horse. Dolph v. Ferris, 7 W. & S. (Pa.) 367; 42 Am. Dec. 246.

Taking a bill of sale as security for a contract which the taker then intended not to carry out is a fraud, and taking possession of the goods under it is as much a trespass as if the bill had never passed. Butler v. Collins, 12 Cal. 457.

Trespass lies for an injury sustained by frightening the plaintiff's horse by firing a gun, if there was reasonable ground to think that the firing might frighten him. Cole v. Fisher, 11 Mass. 137.

The offense of "fraudulently opening certain packages or casks," being in care of the defendant and belonging to the plaintiff, "and taking therefrom a part of their contents," is a trespass only. Cook v. Darby, 4 Munf. (Va.) 444; 6 Am. Dec. 529.

Trespass lies against the owner of a dog which has killed the plaintiff's sheep. Paff v. Slack, 7 Pa. St. 254; Campbell v. Brown, 19 Pa. St. 359.

In trespass de bonis asportatis, if the original taking be not a trespass as against the plaintiff, the subsequent conversion of the property will not render the defendant liable. Henderson v. Marx, 57 Ala. 169.

Any unlawful exercise of authority over the goods of another will support trespass, even though no force may be exerted. Thus, trespass will lie against the purchaser, with notice, of the goods of a third person at a sale under execution. Hardy v. Clendening, 25 Ark. 436.

The defendants entered the store of the plaintiff, and carried off a quantity of goods. They first put up a quantity in one package, which one of the defendants carried away, while the other remained and selected goods for another package, which, on the return of the first defendant, they together carried away. It was held that the whole might properly be regarded as one trespass. Harris v. Rosenberg, 43 Conn. 227; Hurd v. Darling, 16 Vt. 377; Avery v. Halsey, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 174; Rich v. Johnson, 61 Ind. 246; Pope v. Cordell, 47 Mo. 251.

As to Person.—Where the trespass is forcible, an owner may resist entry; but he is not justified in killing the trespasser, unless it is necessary to prevent a felonious destruction of the property, or to defend himself against loss of life or great bodily harm. Carroll v. State, 23 Ala. 28; 58 Am. Dec. 282. See ASSAULT AND BATTERY, vol. 1, p. 778; FALSE IMPRISONMENT, vol. 7, p. 661.

As to Realty.—The wanton and unnecessary destruction of the property of another, in removing an obstruction from the highway, is a trespass. Beardslee v. French, 7 Conn. 125; 18 Am. Dec. 86.

The purchaser of a crop of growing grass is entitled to the exclusive enjoyment of the crop standing on the land during the proper period of its full growth and removal, and may maintain trespass quare clausum fregit against a stranger who, during that time, wrongfully enters, and cuts and carries away the grass. Dolloff v. Danforth, 43 N. H. 219.

One who enters into the possession of unoccupied lands without any claim of right or title, and for the purpose of keeping the true owner out of possession, is a trespasser. McCall v. Capehart, 20 Ala. 521.

In trespass quare clausum fregit, the plaintiff complained of an injury to his house situated on the land, as well as to the land itself. The trial was had on the question of title, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff. It was held that the plaintiff in error could not insist that his house was personal property, and that trespass would lie for its destruction. Houghtaling v. Houghtaling, 5 Barb. (N. Y.) 379.

The sale of timber standing upon another's land, and the subsequent cutting and removal of it by the purchaser, make the vendor a trespasser. Dreyer v. Ming, 23 Mo. 434.

Plaintiff, in an action of trespass for cutting and removing timber, claimed to have constructive possession under certain probate proceedings, and defendant asked a charge that, to entitle him to recover, he must show title. It was held that a charge that "plaintiff's title, or color of title and possession and occupation, were sufficient to entitle him to maintain the action," did not take from the jury the question whether the title was valid or not. Hoffman v. Harrington, 44 Mich. 183.

Where A brought an action of trespass against B, for breaking and entering his close, and cutting and carrying away certain pine timber, and the evidence tended to show that the timber was not cut on the plaintiff's land, but was drawn across it, it was held that the action could be maintained even if the cutting were not upon the plaintiff's land. Brown v. Manter, 22 N. H. 468.

The Maine resolve of Jan. 24th, 1839, authorizing and requiring the land agent to prevent "all persons found trespassing on the territory of this state, as bounded and established by the treaty of 1783," and with force, if necessary, from committing such trespasses, is equally applicable to such as may commit them on the land of private persons, and to such as trespass upon the public lands of the state. Plummer v. Jarvis, 23 Me. 297.

Trespass lies against A for cutting down a tree upon B's land, which had a swarm of bees in it, and taking the honey, unless the bees went from A's hive. Merrills v. Goodwin, 1 Root (Conn.) 209.

Trespass does not lie for taking shell-fish on the land of an individual between high and low water mark. Peck v. Lockwood, 5 Day (Conn.) 22.

A right granted by one man to another to convey water through land of the grantor, by means of a race, to the mill of the grantee, is an incorporeal of the action, and distinguishes it from Trespass on the Case.¹

2. Acts of Trespass.—A trespass, that is to say, a direct physical interference with the person, land, or goods of another, is, as a rule, actionable.² For mere words, without more, the action does hereditament; and for an injury to such right an action of trespass will not lie. Baer v. Martin, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 317.

A person has no right to enter on the land of another and remove a house therefrom, although the greater part of it is on his own land. Bolling v. Whittle, 37 Ala. 35; Small v. Ball, 47 Vt. 486; Corcoran v. Webster, 50 Wis. 125.

Possession of a meeting-house horse shed, without actual or constructive notice of parol conveyances to others, entitles one to maintain trespass, and, after judgment in his favor, it was held in Kelley v. Seward, 51 Vt. 436, that, as the facts found were consistent with the theory that the shed was so attached to the realty as to become part of it, it would be regarded as so attached.

Four persons owned in common a water-ditch, and while in the joint use of the water, three of said tenants agreed with A that if he would enlarge and improve the ditch, he should have an interest therein, and right to use water therefrom. A did work on the ditch to the value of $50, and began to use the water, and was completing his contract when he was stopped by the owners, including the persons with whom he had contracted, and who declared the contract rescinded, whereby A was prevented from completing his work. No reason was assigned, and no offer to pay for the work done. A continued to use water from the ditch. Thereupon the owners, including the contracting persons, sued in trespass for wrongful use of the water from the time he entered. It was held that the defendant's acts did not constitute trespass and plaintiffs could not recover. Bowman v. Ayers (Idaho, 1889), 21 Pac. Rep. 405.

1. Force is the Gist of the Action.—Walker Am. Law (8th ed.), p. 596; Dale Mfg. Co. v. Grant, 34 N. J. L. 142. See cases cited in illustrations in preceding note.

It Is Not Always Necessary That Actual Force Be Used.—In an action of trespass for entering plaintiff's house and removing a piano, it appeared that the plaintiff had hired it from the defendant, who claimed to remove it for non-payment of the rent; but plaintiff's house, where the piano was, was kept locked against the defendant, and he could not enter. In order to effect an entrance, this subterfuge was employed: An insurance agent, in the employ of the defendant, went to the house, and obtained admission upon pretense of examining the flues. Immediately afterwards, defendant, with assistants, came to the house. Plaintiff's wife locked the front door against them, and requested the insurance agent to retire by the back door; but, instead of doing so and against her objection, he threw open the front door, and the defendant and his aids entered, and removed the piano. On this evidence, defendant conceded that the insurance agent obtained entrance by deceit; but claimed that he, being once peaceably in the house, could admit his confederates, and, their entry being peaceable, their subsequent acts were not a trespass. It was held that the defendant and his assistants were trespassers. The house was kept fastened against them, which they knew. Had they broken down the door to gain an entrance, it is not denied that it would have constituted a trespass. The mere fact, however, that one of their number effected an entrance without force, by fraudulent means, and, upon the approach of the others, contrary to the will and command of the inmates of the house, unbolted the door, and allowed them to rush in, can place the act in no more favorable attitude than if the door had been broken. Kimball v. Custer, 73 Ill. 389.

2. Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, p. 6. A person is a trespasser, who, instead of passing along on the sidewalk of a street, stops on it in front of a man's house, and remains there, using towards him abusive and insulting language. Adams v. Rivers, 11 Barb. (N. Y.) 390.

The public have only an easement in a highway to pass and repass along the same, and when one stops in the road and uses loud and obscene language, he becomes a trespasser, and the owner of the land has the right to abate the nuisance which he is creating; and, in case the trespasser is armed with a

The clandestine entry of a claimant upon premises of which another has been given possession by legal process, makes him an intruder, whom the lawful possessor may forcibly expel, if need be; and if the intruder is accidentally injured in the process of expulsion, his own contributory negligence should be considered in fixing responsibility therefor. Taylor v. Adams, 58 Mich. 187.

Where rubbish was laid near a neighbor's wall and accidentally fell against and injured the wall, the master of the servant placing it there was held liable. Gregory v. Piper, 9 B. & C. 591; 17 E. The fact that land granted to a railway company for the location of its tracks and buildings is also used by another company, does not render the former liable in damages to the grantor. Wrightsville, etc., R. Co. v. Holmes, 85 Ga. 668.

A director in a railway company who participates in the location of the road, and afterwards buys land through which it runs, is estopped from recovering damages of the company for trespass in locating its road on the land. Wrightsville, etc., R. Co. v. Holmes, 85 Ga. 668.

A person who has made a parol contract to purchase uninclosed land from another, and has entered into possession, cannot sue his vendor for trespass in going on the land and taking water from the well. Bick v. Hill, 27 Mo. App. 554.

An agreement to sell the defendant half of the plaintiff's growing crop of corn, or so much thereof as he may have to spare, does not carry with it an irrevocable license to enter and remove the corn; and where plaintiff has notified defendant that he cannot let him have any corn, such entry constitutes defendant a trespasser. Green v. Evans, 38 Mo. App. 517.

In an action of trespass, where there is evidence of title to the land in controversy in a stranger to the suit; that he was in possession, and authorized defendant to cut timber, etc., it is proper for the court to charge that, if plaintiff was not the owner of the locus in quo, but it belonged to another, and the owner was in the actual possession of the same, and authorized the defendant to enter and cut timber, then the plaintiff, though in possession, cannot maintain his action of trespass against the defendant. *Roberts v. A person can recover for the temporary interruption of his business, and loss of time of his workmen, occasioned by the blasting of rock by a contractor on a public work in the immediate vicinity of the plaintiff's buildings, in such a negligent manner as to throw pieces of rock against the buildings, and cause the plaintiff's workmen to leave them under a reasonable apprehension of danger; and a payment of the damage to the building is no bar to the action, it being understood by the parties that the damage by interruption of the plaintiff's business was not included in the settlement. Hunter v. Farren, 127 Mass. 481; 34 Am. Rep. 423.

Where a contractor, under orders from his employer, attempted to excavate for a building to a greater width than his employer's lot, so that the excavation encroached upon his neighbor's land, it was held that the employer was a co-trespasser with the contractor. *Williamson v. 1. Those Responsible Sued Jointly or Severally.—An injured party may sue several joint trespassers separately and prosecute each suit to final judgment; but then he must elect against whom he will take execution. Fleming v. McDonald, 50 Ind. 278; 19 Am. Rep. 711.

In case of a joint trespass there may be separate actions, and satisfaction of separate costs, but only one satisfaction of damages. Lord v. Tiffany, 98 N. Y. 412; 50 Am. Rep. 689.

Where execution on a void judgment has been levied by the sheriff by direction of the judgment creditors, they are all joint trespassers and liable for the property seized. Shaw v. Rowland, 32 Kan. 154.

Where an action is for joint trespass, one defendant may be convicted for acts done alone as well as for those done in concert with others. Blanchard v. Burbank, 16 Ill. App. 375.

Plaintiff brought separate actions for a joint trespass. Defendants in one of these actions paid the amount of the judgment into court, pending the other action. The subsequent approval of a trespass by a third person will not render him liable, unless the act was originally done in his name or for his use. Grund v. Van Vleck, 69 Ill. 478.

If one without an antecedent authority, enters on land in behalf of the owner, his entry will enure to the benefit of the owner, if he afterwards ratifies it; and his bringing an action for trespasses committed on the land before the entry, will be a sufficient ratification, in case an entry was necessary to maintain the action. Dexter v. Sullivan, 34 N. H. 478.

Where several persons are engaged in the accomplishment of a lawful object, as in assisting one of their number to abate a nuisance on his land, and one or more of them commits a trespass in aid of their common purpose, the others, not directing or countenancing such unlawful act, are not liable therefor. Richardson v. Emerson, 3 Wis. 319; 62 Am. Dec. 694.

One who receives possession of property known to him to have been wrongfully taken from another, does not thereby become a party to the wrong, and cannot be held liable as a trespasser by relation. Agreeing to a trespass committed for one's use makes him guilty of trespass, and liable as a trespasser. Harper v. Baker, 3 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 422; 16 Am. Dec. 112.

If one agrees to a trespass which has been committed by another for his benefit, trespass will lie against him, although the act was not done in obedience to his command, or at his request. Caldwell v. Sacra, Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.) 118; 12 Am. Dec. 285.

He testified that he frequently warned the contractor not to get too close to the pipe. Plaintiff's evidence, however, was undisputed that, after the contractor had cut the pipe, defendant plugged it up; that he told plaintiff's wife the water was stopped, and going to be stopped, and that the pipe should not go down on his land again; and that subsequently, when plaintiff expressed a desire to relay the pipe, defendant declared that if the attempt was made he would prevent it by force. It was held that, as defendant had kept control of the work, and had adopted the act as his own, he was responsible for the injury. Reynolds v. Braithwaite, 131 Pa. St. 416.

1. Right of Action Without Specific Injury.—A party putting a fence on, or plowing the land of another, although not materially injuring him, is liable as a trespasser. Pfeiffer v. Grossman, 15 Ill. 53.

Trespass, quare clausum fregit, will lie for the act of placing a shaft from one building to another, across a passage-way, owned in fee by the plaintiff, although the shaft was placed underneath a bridge or platform, over which was the passage-way, and in no way interfered therewith. Esty v. Baker, 48 Me. 495.

2. In an action for procuring the arrest and imprisonment of the plaintiff, it was held that the fact that the statements of the defendant which led to the arrest of the plaintiff were made under military compulsion, could afford no defense if the defendant knew such statements to be false, and intended thereby to secure the arrest of the plaintiff. Huggins v. Toler, 1 Bush (Ky.) 192.

An accident, to excuse a trespass, must be unintentional, unavoidable, and without the least fault on the part of the trespasser. Jennings v. Fundeburg, 4 McCord (S. Car.) 161.

For a forcible, direct injury to the person, which is not the effect of unavoidable accident, he who inflicts it is liable in damages. The liability does not depend on the capacity or intention of the actor. Bullock v. Babcock, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 391; Brown v. Kendall, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 292.

In order to constitute an act of trespass vi et armis, the injury done need not have been intentional. It is sufficient if it is the direct and immediate consequence of a force exerted by the defendant without the exercise of due care. Welch v. Durand, 36 Conn. 182; 4 Am. Rep. 55.

A person committing a willful and malicious trespass upon the property of another, under circumstances involving unavoidable injury to persons and property, is responsible to any person injured by such trespass. It is not necessary that he should intend to do the particular injury which ensues. Munger v. Baker, 65 Barb. (N. Y.) 539.

3. Intent Not Material.—If a person unlawfully injures another's property, he is liable for the damage, without regard to the intention with which the act was done. Amick v. O'Hara, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 258; Cate v. Cate, 44 N. H. 211; Bruch v. Carter, 32 N. J. L. 554; Dexter v. Cole, 6 Wis. 319; 70 Am. Dec. 465.

In an action to recover damages for a trespass on land, the fact that the trespass was not willful, is no bar to the recovery of the damages actually sustained. Maye v. Yappen, 23 Cal. 306.

cuse.¹ The spirit in which the wrongful act may have been done

Where the defendant ascended in a balloon, which came down into the plaintiff's garden, and a crowd of people broke the fence into the garden to assist the defendant there in peril from being entangled, and trod down vegetables and flowers, the defendant was held answerable in trespass for all the damage done to the garden. Guille v. Swan, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 381; 10 Am. Dec. 234.

Entering without authority upon land in possession of another, and cutting down and carrying away timber, constitute a trespass, irrespective of the motive or ignorance of the trespasser. Luttrell v. Hazen, 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 20.

A party will be liable in damages for an injury inflicted by him on a third person during a fight, though no such injury may have been intended; but if such third person, by his own improper conduct, has brought the injury upon himself, by officiously and improperly intruding himself in the way of danger, it is his own folly and he will be without remedy. Cogdell v. Yett, 1 Coldw. (Tenn.) 230.

Trespass is not less wrong that it is done by accident, or without design, or even against the will of the actor. Trespass or wrong done by accident, without design, or against actor's will, is not fault, in the sense of that word as used in connection with actions for negligence. It is a misfortune, and not a fault. Norris v. Litchfield, 35 N. H. 271; 69 Am. Dec. 546.

In trespass for cutting trees on a church lot, it is no defense that defendant cut the tree under instructions of persons who had no authority in the matter, though he believed they had such authority. Allison v. Little, 85 Ala. 512.

Pennsylvania Act March 29th, 1824, gives treble damages against "any person who shall cut down or fell, or employ any person or persons to cut down or fell, any timber, tree or trees growing upon the land of another, without the consent of the owner thereof." The agent of S. entered into negotiations with P., for the purchase of certain timber, provided it stood on his land. P. had a survey made, which by mistake showed the timber to be upon his land, and the agent cut it down under a contract of sale by which he was to take it away within three years. It was held that P. was liable to the real owner of the land on which the timber stood. McCloskey v. Powell, 123 Pa. St. 62.

In Lowenberg v. Rosenthal, 18 Oregon 178, defendants were held liable for the carrying away of timber standing upon plaintiff's land, without any lawful authority for taking it, although they had probable cause for believing and did believe that they had authority from the plaintiffs for taking the timber.

Whether defendants, acting under authority of the board of health in laying drains to abate a nuisance on plaintiff's land, acted in good faith, was properly left to the jury, where the evidence showed that they placed the drain above the surface, and filled in gravel, and that they injured structures on the premises, and made long delays. Conway v. Russell, 151 Mass. 581.

Where A, without B's consent, enters upon B's land, and removes therefrom logs which C has unlawfully cut thereon, and undertaken to sell to A, such entry and removal constitute a trespass to the realty, though made in ignorance of B's rights. *Hazelton v. 1. Mistake Does Not Excuse.—Trespass cannot be justified on the ground of mistake merely. Hobart v. Hagget, 12 Me. 67; 28 Am. Dec. 159.

A, by direction of B, who had purchased of C a lot of timber, cut by him without right on the plaintiff's close, entered on the close and removed the wood without knowledge of the defect in the title. It was held that he was liable in trespass. Higginson v. York, 5 Mass. 341.

Where the defendant cut timber on the land of the plaintiff, it is no defense that the plaintiff, by mistake, led him to believe that the timber was on his (the defendant's) land. Pearson v. Inlow, 20 Mo. 322; 64 Am. Dec. 189.

A party entering upon land in good faith, under the belief that he has the title thereto, is not a naked trespasser, though the title be in fact in another;

may be shown in mitigation of damages.¹ Bad motives alone cannot be made a ground of action, if the rights of another have not been violated.²

8. Indemnity.—When judgment has been recovered against several defendants in trespass, the defendant, who pays the whole of the judgment, is not entitled to contribution from the co-defendants,³ provided that the person seeking redress knew at the time that he was engaged in an unlawful act; but if such person were innocent of intentional wrong, as a servant or agent, obeying the instructions of the master or principal, he can enforce contribution.⁴

and he is entitled to all legal protection to his improvements and property placed upon the premises, given by the statute to parties in possession under color of title. Durell v. Hayward, 9 Gray (Mass.) 248; 69 Am. Dec. 284.

1. Intent as Mitigating Damages.—In an action of trespass, where it is admitted that defendants occupied the premises for a year, and the defense is a contract for a lease for that period, there being no evidence that plaintiff authorized the person from whom defendants took the contract to make it, she was entitled to recover, without regard to the good faith of defendants' entry. Johnson v. Park (Ky. 1891), 17 S. W. Rep. 273.

A civil remedy is not taken away by the felonious intent with which a trespass has been committed. Cannon v. Burris, 1 Hill (S. Car.) 372.

The word "willfully" in the Vermont trespass act, is not synonymous with "voluntary," but implies a tort or wrong. Savage v. Tullar, Brayt. (Vt.) 223.

To sustain an action for malicious injury to the plaintiff's fishery, caused by anchoring a vessel therein, it must appear that the defendant knowingly, and without necessity, or reasonable commercial purpose, cast anchor so as to interrupt the same, and remained after the wind and the tide permitted him to depart. Mason v. Mansfield, 4 Cranch (C. C.) 580.

To subject a party to the statute penalty for cutting timber, he must have committed the wrong knowingly and willfully, or under such circumstances as show him guilty of criminal negligence. The statute does not extend to a person who fells trees upon the land of another, under a mistaken belief that his boundaries extend far enough to include the trees in controversy. Watkins v. Gale, 13 Ill. 153; Batchelder v. Kelly, 10 N. H. 436; 34 Am. Dec. 174.

Where one cuts timber, knowing it not to be upon his own land, or upon land which he had a license to cut from, the law presumes that the trespass was willful. Watkins v. Gale, 13 Ill. 152.

It is not trespass for cattle, used by a person in making a road, to stray upon adjoining unfenced land against the will of their owner. Cool v. Crommett, 13 Me. 250; Coats v. Darby, 2 N. Y. 517; Leach v. Francis, 41 Vt. 670; Hearn v. Camp, 18 Tex. 545.

One's action for damages sustained from negligence of another, cannot be defeated by showing that the former party is a wrongdoer, a trespasser, or a violator of the law, unless it appears that his own negligence or his fault has directly contributed to his damage. Norris v. Litchfield, 35 N. H. 271; 69 Am. Dec. 546.

2. Pickard v. Collins, 23 Barb. (N. Y.) 444. The mere intent of a defendant in trespass is not material, if his conduct was not actionable. Estey v. Smith, 45 Mich. 402.

Although one may remove wood piled without right upon his land, he is bound to do so in a reasonable manner, and may be held liable for damages when he willfully and maliciously removes it so as to obstruct a pathway on the land of the trespasser; and his declarations to the effect that he removed the wood to the pathway in order to be mean, are admissible upon the question of motive. Burnham v. Jenness, 54 Vt. 272; Sparkman v. Swift, 81 Ala. 231.

3. There is no Contribution Among Wrongdoers.—Percy v. Clary, 32 Md. 245; St. John v. St. John's Church, 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 346.

4. Contribution Enforced by Innocent

9. Those Accessory.—There are no accessories in trespass, but all who are concerned with the trespass in any manner, are principals.¹

10. Acquiescence.—Acquiescence in an act of trespass may bar one from suing for damages arising therefrom.²

II. RIGHTS IN REALTY WHICH MAY BE THE SUBJECT OF TRESPASS—

1. Eminent Domain.—(See EMINENT DOMAIN, vol. 6, p. 509.)

2. Possession With and Without Title—a. WHAT IS POSSESSION.

—Possession is the detention or enjoyment of a thing which a man holds or exercises by himself, or by another who keeps or Agent, Servant, or Party.—Allaire v. Ouland, 2 Johns Cas. (N. Y.) 52; Randall v. Rich, 11 Mass. 494; Payson v. Whitcomb, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 212; Drummond v. Humphreys, 39 Me. 347.

The rule that no contribution lies between trespassers applies only to cases where the persons have engaged together in doing wantonly or knowingly a wrong. Contribution lies between trespassers, where one of several persons, who join in performing an act, which to them appears to be right and lawful, but which proves to be a tort, has paid the amount of the damage. Acheson v. Miller, 2 Ohio St. 203; 59 Am. Dec. 663.

Where one goes in aid of a person who commits a trespass, though he takes no further part in it, he will be guilty of trespass. Clark v. Bales, 15 Ark. 452.

One tort-feasor, not a party to the suit in which judgment was obtained for the joint tort, cannot be called upon to pay, till his co-trespassers have paid the judgment, and fixed his liability to them by a suit; nor can he be compelled to give them security, till they secure him from all loss beyond his share. Bell v. Walsh, 7 Cal. 84.

Where an immediate act is done by the co-operation, or the joint act of two or more persons, they are all trespassers, and may be sued jointly or severally, and any one of them is liable for the injury done by all. To render one man liable, in trespass, for the acts of others, it must appear, either that they acted in concert, or that the act of the party sought to be charged, ordinarily and naturally produced the acts of the others. Brooks v. Ashburn, 9 Ga. 297; Wallace v. Miller, 15 La. Ann. 449; Irwin v. Scribner, 15 La. Ann. 583; Woodbridge v. Conner, 49 Me. 353; Allen v. Craig, 13 N. J. L. 294; Judson v. Cook, 11 Barb. (N. Y.) 642; Whitaker v. English, 1 Bay (S. Car.) 15; Chanet v. Parker, 1 Mill (S. Car.)

The guilty knowledge of one trespasser is the knowledge of his co-trespassers. Ously v. Hardin, 23 Ill. 403.

Possession alone is sufficient to maintain the action of trespass against mere tort-feasors. In such action, all procurers, aiders and abettors, and even those who are not privy to the commission of a trespass for their use and benefit, but who afterwards assent to it, are, in judgment of law, principals. Horton v. Hensley, 1 Ired. (N. Car.) 163.

1. Accessories are liable as principals. Olsen v. Upsahl, 69 Ill. 273.

2. Acquiescence.—A party, as here, a railroad company, who had been forbidden by the owner of land to enter thereon, acquires no right to do so from his mere acquiescence. Currie v. Natchez R. Co., 61 Miss. 725.

In trespass on the case, for injury caused by the negligence of the defendant, it may be shown, in defense, that the injury was caused by the plaintiff's own negligence. Bethea v. Taylor, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 482; Wynn v. Allard, 5 W. & S. (Pa.) 524.

Direct and immediate force employed by one person against another without permission, with malice, constitutes trespass, however slight the injury produced; but it is otherwise, if the force is used with permission. Cadwell v. Farrell, 28 Ill. 438.

Where a trespass is waived by the plaintiff, at the time it is committed, by referring the matter to a referee, he cannot bring an action of trespass vi et armis, though the property is clearly his. Patterson v. Peironnet, 7 Watts (Pa.) 337.

Trespass will not lie against a colonel, who, with the implied assent of the owner to the use of an unoccupied field for a muster field, cut down some old pine saplings which interfered with the use of the field as a muster ground.

exercises it in his name.¹ One in possession of realty can generally maintain an action against one trespassing against his rights.²

b. EXCLUSIVE POSSESSION.—Exclusive possession is possession to the exclusion of all others. Such possession, if peaceable, is Law v. Nettles, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 447.

The acquiescence in a trespass of one who has been deceived by a pretense of legal authority, is not such consent as to affect his remedy at law. Bagwell v. Jamison, Cheves (S. Car.) 249.

1. See POSSESSION, vol. 18, p. 840.

2. POSSESSION.—An unrecorded deed of wild land is not of itself sufficient evidence of possession by the grantee to enable him to maintain trespass. Estes v. Cook, 22 Pick. (Mass.) 295.

Two persons not the owners in fee of a tract of land, fenced it to get the grass thereon, and, without a partition fence assigned to each other a half respectively. After three years' occupation, one gave a third party permission to enter to cut some hay, but neglecting to designate upon which half, it was taken from the other's, who brought trespass therefor, and it was held that the plaintiff could recover. Morse v. Iman, 42 Ill. 150; 89 Am. Dec. 417.

Possession under a paper title apparently good is actual possession sufficient to maintain trespass. Parker v. Wallis, 60 Ind. 15; 45 Am. Rep. 703.

Cutting wood upon a wood lot up to a well-known line for thirteen years, is such possession as will support trespass quare clausum fregit. Chandler v. Walker, 21 N. H. 282; 53 Am. Dec. 202.

Possession of a part under color of title does not give constructive possession of the whole against one in actual possession. Hosford v. Whitcomb, 56 Vt. 651.

One in unlawful possession of land may allow another to commit acts of waste on the land, and the real owner cannot maintain trespass against the other. Hawkins v. Roby, 77 Mo. 140.

Entry on land, under a deed claiming title, and cutting and selling timber is possession. Sawyer v. Newland, 9 Vt. 383.

Possession of an inclosed farm is possession of inclosed woodland attached. Penn v. Preston, 2 Rawle (Pa.) 14.

A delivered to B the key of his house, for the purpose of putting B in possession of goods therein, but not of the house itself. It was held that B had no such possession as would support trespass for breaking and entering. Davis v. Wood, 7 Mo. 162.

Occasional entries, by one claiming title, and cutting and hauling off timber, do not constitute possession. Ozark Land Co. v. Leonard, 20 Fed. Rep. 881.

Nailing up the windows of a house never used, by one claiming title, is not possession without re-entry. Patterson v. Bodenhammer, 11 Ired. (N. Car.) 4.

Possession of a part of a tract of land by the owner of the whole, is possession of the whole. Possession of a trespasser extends only to actual occupancy. Kincaid v. Logue, 7 Mo. 167; Sloan v. Moore, 7 Mo. 170; Hibbard v. Foster, 24 Vt. 542.

Title by possession need not be of such a character as to dislodge the true owner, in order to give the superior right as against one subsequently entering and claiming by no higher title than possession under such an entry. Currier v. Gale, 9 Allen (Mass.) 522.

A plaintiff in an action of trespass, held a deed of certain premises from one who had a bond for title for conveyance upon payment of the purchase-money; but the payment had not been made. The plaintiff never was in possession of the premises himself, but, for a time, was in possession by a tenant, who finally removed therefrom, delivering the key to his landlord, and leaving the premises unoccupied; the defendant, being the owner in fee, claiming under a subsequent conveyance from the same party who had executed the title bond to the plaintiff's grantor, entered peaceably into the possession of the premises, and this entry constituted the alleged trespass. It was held that this possession of the plaintiff was not sufficient to maintain his action against the entry on the owner in fee, although as against a stranger his title might prevail. Dean v. Comstock, 32 Ill. 173.

The entry of an owner upon a trespasser, will enable the former to maintain trespass; but it must be an entry for the purpose of taking possession, which may be evidenced by acts of ownership on the land, as plowing it or the like, or by a formal declaration of the intention accompanying the entry. Bynum v. Carter, 4 Ired. (N. Car.) 310. In an action of trespass quare clausum always sufficient to maintain trespass quare clausum fregit.¹ The action may sometimes be maintained where the plaintiff has not been in exclusive and peaceable possession.²

c. ACTUAL POSSESSION.—The possession must be bona fide actual possession, either in person or by tenant.³ Such possession is sufficient to support the action of trespass.⁴ Even though fregit on a tract of land called B, defendant took defense for a tract of land called A, on a part of which the alleged trespass was committed. The lands were located on plats. It was held that the plaintiff was only entitled to recover for a trespass committed within the lines of the tract called B, as the same was located by him on the plats in the cause, although he had been in possession and cultivation of the land on which the trespass was alleged to have been committed, claiming the same as part of B for upwards of fifty years, and it had always been called and reputed to be part of that tract. Chapman v. Brawner, 2 Har. & J. (Md.) 366.

1. Exclusive Possession.—Exclusive and peaceable possession of United States lands is sufficient against a trespasser. Keith v. Tilford, 12 Neb. 271.

Possession, in order to be sufficient to maintain an action for trespass upon land, must be exclusive; otherwise plaintiff is put to proof of his legal title. Bartholomew v. Edwards, 1 Houst. (Del.) 17.

An open, peaceable, adverse, and exclusive possession of land which has been discontinued as a highway under claim of title, is sufficient. Bowley v. Walker, 8 Allen (Mass.) 21.

A corporation in peaceable possession and control of property, with acquiescence of the defendant, is not barred from maintaining an action for trespass against the defendant by the fact that it is liable to the defendant for the value of such interests. Wausau Boom Co. v. Plumer, 49 Wis. 112.

Where possession has been mixed and plaintiff shows no title, he cannot object to title of defendant. Brown v. Pinkham, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 172.

Actual exclusive possession of land is sufficient; if no such possession exists, plaintiff must show title to maintain action. It may be laid down as a rule, almost without exception, that plaintiff in trespass upon land to sustain his action must prove either actual possession of land or title to it. Dejarnett v. Haynes, 23 Miss. 600.

2. Exclusive possession is not necessary to maintain trespass quare clausum fregit. McCormick v. Huse, 66 Ill. 315. Compare Ganter v. Atkinson, 35 Wis. 48.

Open and exclusive possession of lands will enable the disseisor of the true owner to maintain trespass against a mere wrongdoer, even though the possession of the disseisor has continued less than twenty years. Clancey v. Houdlette, 39 Me. 451; Look v. Norton, 55 Me. 103.

3. Actual Possession.—Smith v. Wunderlich, 70 Ill. 426; Uttendorffer v. Saeger, 50 Cal. 496; New Jersey Midland R. Co. v. Van Syckle, 37 N. J. L. 496; Zell v. Ream, 31 Pa. St. 304; Duncan v. Yordy, 27 Kan. 348. See also Carter v. Jackson, 56 N. H. 364.

Trespass lies by one in possession of land, whether inclosed or not, against another who herds stock thereon after being forbidden. Bedden v. Clarke, 76 Ill. 338.

One in possession can maintain trespass against one unable to show a better right. Stratton v. Lyons, 53 Vt. 641.

The owner of land cannot maintain trespass for cutting trees down, unless he was actually possessed of them. He may maintain it for carrying away the cord wood. McClain v. Todd, 5 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 335; 22 Am. Dec. 37.

Must not Be Tortious.—In an action for trespass in tearing down a wall, it was held essential that the plaintiff should at the time of the trespass show that he was in possession of the locus in quo, and that proof of a mere tortious occupancy would not suffice. Townsend v. Bissell, 5 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 583; 3 Hun (N. Y.) 556.

What Actual Title or Possession Must Be Shown to Maintain Trespass.—Yahoola, etc., Min. Co. v. Irby, 40 Ga. 479; Nelson v. Mather, 5 Kan. 151; Phillips v. DeGroat, 2 Lans. (N. Y.) 192; Oatman v. Fowler, 43 Vt. 462; Kidder v. Kennedy, 43 Vt. 717; Hughes v. Graves, 39 Vt. 359; 94 Am. Dec. 331; Gardner v. Hearrt, 1 N. Y. 528.

4. Illustrations.—When a tenant for years sues for trespass on land, he must show possession at the time of the trespass; the defendant may show that he was and long had been in adverse possession. Heilbron v. Heinlen, 72 Cal. 371.

Where the plaintiff shows possession, the defendant cannot show want of title in plaintiff as a defense, except he shows a better right to the possession. Reed v. Price, 30 Mo. 442.

Under the South Carolina law, before the adoption of the code, one in actual possession, having title to hold, could maintain trespass against one in possession of the portion where the trespass was committed. Since the adoption of the code, title without possession is sufficient. Gilmore v. Roberts, 18 S. Car. 551.

Upon a bill brought by plaintiff to restrain defendant from trespassing upon lands alleged to belong to plaintiff, and for an accounting, and for damages for past trespasses, it appeared that each party was in partial possession; that each derived title by grant from the state; that plaintiff's claim of title from the state's grantee was perfect; that defendant claimed under an earlier grant, but there was a defective sheriff's deed in his claim of title, by which the title was left outstanding in one of his predecessors. It was held that, whether the bill was to be considered as an ejectment bill or a bill to restrain waste, the plaintiff must fail; for, if ejectment, the outstanding title was a perfect defense, and, if a bill to restrain waste, the rule in trespass would apply, and the title of plaintiff was not so far superior to that of defendant as to enable him to maintain trespass without showing exclusive possession. Walker v. Fox, 85 Tenn. 154.

While, as a general rule, trespass quare clausum fregit can only be maintained by one in actual possession of the premises, yet, in the case of a disseisin, the disseisee, after he has regained possession, may maintain the action against the disseisor, for acts done during the disseisin. Haley v. Wheeler, 8 Hun (N. Y.) 569.

A rented the premises in question from the owner, and sold his interests in them to plaintiff, the agent of the owner recognizing plaintiff as their tenant, previous to the time defendant entered upon the premises. It was held that plaintiff was entitled to possession at the time defendant entered, and if defendant, during the time he was in possession, injured said premises so as to render them untenable, then plaintiff was entitled to recover in an action of trespass what it would cost to repair said injury. Burt v. Warne, 31 Mo. 296.

Where A, in possession of land, is wrongfully ousted by B, the latter does not acquire such a possession as it would be a trespass in A to disturb by an entry involving no breach of the peace. Illinois, etc., R., etc., Co. v. Cobb, 94 Ill. 55.

One in possession of land under a claim of right may recover of another claimant thereof for entering without license, and carrying off and converting to his own use grains stacked and raised thereon by the former. Ray v. Gardner, 82 N. Car. 454.

Where one entered upon an uncultivated and unappropriated lot of land and drove down stakes with his initials upon them, to define the limits of such land taken, and erected buildings thereon, he was entitled to judgment, in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against a person entering upon a part of the land staked out, if the plaintiff entered with the intention to take possession, claiming the land, and if the defendant knew, or might, with ordinary care, have known these facts, and if such mode of inclosing such land had been acquiesced in, by the town in which it lay, as giving a valid possession. Cook v. Rider, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 186.

A defendant in trespass, holding by possession only, cannot object to the plaintiff's title under a partition to a proprietor of a common field, that such proprietor had previously received his full share, or that the locus had been previously assigned to another proprietor. Lawrence v. Russell, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 388.

A disseisee regaining possession can maintain trespass quare clausum fregit for acts between disseisin and re-entry. Emrich v. Ireland, 55 Miss. 390.

Mere Possession Is Sufficient.—Russell v. Thorn, 1 Mo. 390; Hunt v. Rich, 38 Me. 195; Johnson v. McIlwain, 1 Rice (S. Car.) 368; Golden Gate Mill, etc., Co. v. Joshua Hendy Mach. Works, 82 Cal. 184; Darling v. Kelley, 113 Mass. 29; Masterson v. West End, etc., R. Co., 5 Mo. App. 64; Ruggles v. Sands, 40 Mich. 559; Carpenter v. Smith, 40 Mich. 639.

Possession Unnecessary.—In an action where the petitioner did not charge that the defendants broke the plaintiff's close, nor that they used this possession may have been illegally acquired, it is sufficient.¹ Possession must have been had at the time the injury sued for was committed, and not at the time the action in trespass is brought.²

d. CONSTRUCTIVE POSSESSION.—Constructive possession is that possession which exists in contemplation of law, without actual personal occupation.³ Where neither of the parties claiming title to land is in actual possession, he who has constructive possession can maintain an action in trespass.⁴ Constructive possession will not prevail against actual possession.⁵ Possession of a part may be constructive possession of an adjoining part.⁶

e. RIGHT OF POSSESSION; TITLE WITHOUT POSSESSION.—It happens frequently that the plaintiff in an action of trespass is not in possession, but has title without possession or right violence, although averring that they cut and carried away valuable trees growing on the land of the plaintiff of certain value, etc., it was held not to be in the form of an action of trespass, and that the plaintiff need not show title or possession at the time of the taking, as if the action was for trespass. Kline v. Mann, 29 Iowa 112.

1. Evertson v. Sutton, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 281; 21 Am. Dec. 217; Oglesby v. Stodghill, 23 Ga. 590.

2. Smith v. Ingram, 7 Ired. (N. Car.) 175. A prior possession of land, accompanied with acts of ownership by one through whom plaintiff deduces title, will authorize recovery against defendant, who is afterward found in possession without title or claim to the premises.

3. Bouv. Law Dict.; Hubbard v. Austin, 11 Vt. 129; 2 Bl. Com. 116.

Definition.—The owner of the legal title to unoccupied land has the constructive possession; a stranger to the title, who intended to use the land for grazing purposes without the owner's consent, cannot recover the value of grass from a railroad company which negligently set fire to it. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Torrey (Tex. 1891), 16 S. W. Rep. 547.

A person owning in fee simple a tract of unoccupied land, which had never been in the possession of anyone, is in possession by construction. Safford v. Basto, 4 Mich. 406.

4. Padgett v. Baker, 1 Tenn. Ch. 222. Only the persons in actual or constructive possession of real property can maintain trespass quare clausum fregit in reference thereto; and such constructive possession is only that of the owner, when no person is in the actual possession. Gunsolus v. Lormer, 54 Wis. 630.

5. A plaintiff in actual possession of land under a paper title can maintain trespass quare clausum fregit against one who claims a constructive possession. Earl v. Griffith, 52 Vt. 415.

Actual Possession Prevails Over Constructive Possession.—Stean v. Anderson, 4 Harr. (Del.) 209; Webb v. Sturtevant, 2 Ill. 181; Davis v. White, 27 Vt. 751.

6. A purchaser of land adjoining that to which he is in actual possession, is constructively in possession to the extent of the boundary of both tracts; and one who enters on that possession, and builds a cabin and locks it up, is not in possession beyond the actual close, and cannot maintain trespass against the former for cutting timber on the land. Fish v. Branamon, 2 B. Mon. (Ky.) 379.

What Is Not Constructive Possession.—Possession of a part of a tract of land without title, cannot be extended by construction to the part not in actual possession of the party, so as to enable him to reclaim timber cut thereon. Aikin v. Buck, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 466.

The actual occupancy of one half quarter section of land, does not draw after it the possession of an adjoining unoccupied quarter section upon which the occupant had exercised acts of ownership, by cutting logs for his saw-mill, so that he can maintain trespass quare clausum fregit against one who had also cut logs thereon, and was in the actual occupation of adjoining land. Blackburn v. Baker, 7 Port. (Ala.) 284.

of possession.¹ Title without possession will support the action,²

1. What Is Right of Possession.—One who obtains actual possession of real estate wrongfully, cannot recover of an invader having a right to possession, for any injury done to the real estate; otherwise, as to injuries to his person or personal property, even though the invader forcibly ejecting him be the owner. Comstock v. Brosseau, 65 Ill. 39.

Where the plaintiff has the right of property and of immediate possession in real estate, he may maintain an action of trespass for a direct injury thereupon, though not in actual possession. Mason v. Lewis, 1 Greene (Iowa) 494; Poole v. Mitchell, 1 Hill (S. Car.) 404; Snider v. Myers, 3 W. Va. 195.

The city of Milwaukee authorized a gas company to set up and establish lamp posts along the streets of the city. The company erected, managed them, etc. It was held that they had sufficient title and possession to maintain trespass for an injury to them. Roche v. Milwaukee Gas Light Co., 5 Wis. 55.

In an action of trespass quare clausum fregit it appeared that the plaintiff let the land on which the trespass was committed, by his agent, by a parol lease, to A, who entered and paid rent. Before the expiration of the lease, A permitted the defendant and B to come upon the premises; and, by the advice of the defendant, who said the land belonged to B, A delivered the possession of the premises to B, who claimed them as his right, and raised ore upon them, etc. The plaintiff, by his agent, afterwards, and before the determination of the lease to A, entered upon the premises, B being then in possession. It was held that the plaintiff had proved sufficient title to maintain the action of trespass. Tasker v. Ridgely, 4 Har. & M. (Md.) 497.

To recover for a trespass to real estate, the plaintiff must show that the portion upon which the wrongful act was committed was in his inclosure, or that he had the paramount title, if it was vacant, or that he was in the actual possession of a part under a deed for the whole. Winkler v. Meister, 40 Ill. 349.

Under an arrangement between the plaintiff and her daughter and son-in-law, the details of which were disputed, the latter moved on to a farm owned by the plaintiff. In general terms, the arrangement was that the daughter and son-in-law were to live on the property and take care of and support the plaintiff during her life, and at her death the daughter was to have the land. The plaintiff lived on the farm in pursuance of these terms until some disagreement arose, when she moved away and gave her daughter and son-in-law notice to quit. Upon their refusal, she brought an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. The evidence was conflicting as to whether, by the terms of the contract, the defendants were to take and hold exclusive possession during the life of the plaintiff. It was held that as the defendants had control of the farm and used it as their own, and had such lawful possession as authorized them to put in the crops, their right of possession did not, during the growth thereof, at once cease and determine, so as to make them liable in trespass for continuing there, although they failed to fulfill all the terms of their contract thereafter. Berkey v. Auman, 91 Pa. St. 481.

Illustrations.—A and B had conveyances covering the same land, of which neither had actual possession. He who had the younger title entered on the land and cut the timber, and with the timber so cut erected houses and fences, by means whereof he became actually possessed of the land. It was held that the other party having the older and better title, might maintain an action of trespass for the injuries done before the actual possession was taken. Bailey v. Massey, 2 Swan (Tenn.) 167.

Where the plaintiff in trespass is not in possession, he must show that he or his grantors obtained title from the general government. Heinrichs v. Terrell, 65 Iowa 25.

Where the rightful owner of land is dispossessed, he may maintain an action against the wrongdoer for the original

if the title is valid.¹

f. POSSESSION WITHOUT TITLE.—Generally an action of trespass may lie where plaintiff has possession, even though he is without title,² but in some cases it will not, the rule not being an universal one.³

g. POSSESSION OF TENANT THE POSSESSION OF LANDLORD.—The possession of the tenant or agent is the possession of the landlord.⁴

h. POSSESSION UNDER COLOR OF TITLE.—(See COLOR OF TITLE, vol. 3, p. 314; TITLE, vol. 26, p. 20).—Color of title is an trespass, but he cannot for any injury afterwards committed by such wrongdoer, until he has regained possession. Rowland v. Rowland, 8 Ohio 40; Graham v. Houston, 4 Dev. (N. Car.) 232. But see Carter v. Beals, 44 N. H. 408.

Where premises are unoccupied, an action of trespass may be maintained by the owner thereof, he being regarded as having constructive possession; but where the tenant was in possession at the time of the alleged entry, the action must be brought by him, unless there is injury to the reversion. Gould v. Sternburg, 4 Ill. App. 439.

Per Contra.—A railroad company claiming title to land, of which, however, it had no possession except that its tracks ran across a subdivision of it, tore down and removed without process of law a house held by the occupant under a lease which was adjudged afterwards to be void, the ownership of the land also being adjudged afterwards to be in the railroad company. It was held that the person so ejected was entitled to damages. Sinclair v. Stanley, 64 Tex. 67.

1. In trespass quare clausum fregit, if plaintiff cannot show actual and exclusive possession of the land, but is obliged to rely upon his legal title, he must show a valid title. Stephenson v. Wilson, 37 Wis. 482.

2. Possession Without Title.—See supra, this title, Actual and Exclusive Possession.

An action of tort will lie for breaking and entering a close whereof the plaintiff is in possession, and to which neither party proves title. Sweetland v. Stetson, 115 Mass. 49.

A party peaceably in possession of lands may maintain trespass for an injury to his possession, though the trespasser has a better title to the lands. Larue v. Russell, 26 Ind. 386.

The plaintiff's possession under claim of title is sufficient evidence of title to maintain the Mississippi statute action for cutting trees; after such proof it is for the defendant to show title, either in himself or another, to defeat the action. Ware v. Collins, 35 Miss. 223; 72 Am. Dec. 122.

3. The one who occupies land without title, cannot bring trespass for a forcible entry by one who also has no title. Muldrow v. Jones, 1 Rice (S. Car.) 64.

The possession of the owner of a part of a tract of land, is the possession of the whole tract only so long as no other person is in the actual adverse possession of any part. As soon as another takes possession of any part, either with or without title, the former possessor loses the possession of that part, and cannot maintain trespass for any act done on such part while he is thus out of possession of it. Ring v. King, 4 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 164.

In an action for trespass on land, plaintiff testified that he occupied a piece of land, 26 by 107 feet, which he had had surveyed; that defendant used part of the land as a road, and was so using it before the survey; that defendant had made the road by filling; that defendant put a wagon on the roadway so that it stood partly on plaintiff's line as surveyed; that "defendant occupied the land south of mine, where the driveway is, and I occupy 26 feet north, where the board fence was." It was held that plaintiff had neither possession nor title to sustain the action. Danihee v. Hyatt (Supreme Ct.), 12 N. Y. Supp. 465.

4. M'Colman v. Wilkes, 3 Strobb. (S. Car.) 465; 51 Am. Dec. 637; Heath v. Williams, 25 Me. 209; 43 Am. Dec. 265; Coburn v. Palmer, 8 Cush. (Mass.) 124; Towne v. Butterfield, 97 Mass. 105.

The defendant in trespass, not claiming title, cannot impugn the title of the plaintiff, who is in possession by a tenant yielding rent. Willson v. Hinsley, 13 Md. 64.

apparent title founded upon a written instrument, such as a deed, levy of execution, decree of court, or the like.¹ Possession under color of title will support the action of trespass.²

3. By Conveyance or Writing—a. BY DEED.—The title, whether with or without possession, which will support an action in trespass, is most commonly obtained by deed.³

1. Color of Title.—Bouv. Law Dict.; 3 Wait's Act. & Def. 17.

2. Possession under claim and color of title is sufficient evidence of title in an action to recover damages from a mere trespasser. Douglass v. Dickson, 31 Kan. 310.

One having color of title to only a portion of a tract of timbered land, cannot, by chopping fire wood and saw logs on the remainder, so take possession thereof as to compel the owner to resort to ejectment, but will be liable as a trespasser. Ware v. Johnson, 55 Mo. 500.

Where a party claims a tract of land under a color of title, and puts a servant into a house situated on it, with the privilege of getting firewood from the land, he is considered as in possession of the whole tract as against a mere wrongdoer, and may maintain trespass against him for cutting timber thereon. Lamb v. Swain, 3 Jones (N. Car.) 370.

As to what color of title will enable a party to maintain trespass quare clausum fregit against a wrongdoer, see Savage v. Holyoke, 59 Me. 345.

The use of water in a millpond is no evidence of title to or of possession of the land covered by the water. Bartholomew v. Edwards, 1 Houst. (Del.) 17.

3. Sheriff's Deed.—Plaintiff must have legal title at commencement of action to try title. Sheriff's deed, dated after the commencement of the action, will not support trespass to try title to land purchased by plaintiff at judicial sale prior to the proceeding. Bank of State v. South Carolina Mfg. Co., 3 Strobb. (S. Car.) 190; 49 Am. Dec. 640.

In a possessory action, plaintiff claimed several parcels of land by purchase at sale on execution and sheriff's deed. The court charged the jury that if they found the defendant was in possession of any one parcel, they should find for the plaintiff for all the parcels described in his declaration and the sheriff's deed. Carwile v. House, 6 Ala. 710.

Sheriff's deed is inadmissible as evidence of title without proof of judgment and execution. Aikin v. Buck, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 466.

Tax Deed.—When defendant claims title to land under a tax deed, although it appears that, if plaintiff were holder of the original government title, defendant's right of action against him on the tax deed would be barred by reason of plaintiff's occupancy of the land for a part of the three years next after the recording of such deed, still, as to the acts performed by him under a claim of title, and right of possession by virtue of tax deed, defendant cannot be treated as a mere wrongdoer or intruder; but he may question the sufficiency of plaintiff's title, and require him to make strict proof of it. Stephenson v. Wilson, 37 Wis. 482.

Where a purchaser, under a tax sale of a lot of wild and uncultivated land, had become entitled to a deed, and had actual possession under the tax sale, it was held sufficient to support a trespass. Pierce v. Hall, 41 Barb. (N. Y.) 142.

A deed in futuro will support trespass.

Action Barred.—Where plaintiff had conveyed to another without consideration, he could not recover from a third party for an injury to the freehold. Wolfe v. Beecher Mfg. Co., 47 Conn. 231; Dean v. Metropolitan El. R. Co., 119 N. Y. 540.

Illustrations.—In an action for unlawfully removing a house, where plaintiffs have shown that they were in possession of the house and lot under a deed therefor, until shortly before the trespass, the fact that they then left it unoccupied for a time is not sufficient to defeat their possessory title, where they locked it up, and put it in charge of an agent to rent it. Holman v. Herscher (Tex. 1891), 16 S. W. Rep. 984.

The grantee of an estate or inheritance in the trees may have trespass quare clausum fregit against the general owner for cutting them down, both parties having had possession according to their interests. Clap v. Draper, 4

b. BY GRANT, PRESCRIPTION, PRE-EMPTION OR COLONIZATION LAWS.—It frequently happens that rights obtained by grant, or prescription, or under pre-emption or colonization laws, are the subject of trespass.¹

c. UNDER CONTRACT.—Rights may be obtained by contract which will support an action.²

Mass. 266; 3 Am. Dec. 215. See Rehoboth v. Hurt, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 224.

The delivery of the deed, and cutting timber on the land by the grantee, is no evidence of his adverse possession of land afterwards claimed by the grantor not to have been included in the deed, so as to support an action for trespass. Stockton v. Garfrias, 12 Cal. 315.

A person who has entered land over which there is a way under a deed of warranty, has sufficient seisin and possession to maintain an action for trespass committed on such way by a party who shows no right therein. Ashley v. Landers, 9 Allen (Mass.) 250.

A grantor who has in his deed reserved to himself the timber and pine trees on the granted premises, may maintain trespass against the grantee or his assignee who cuts and carries away any of them, although this is done more than twenty years after the date of the deed. Goodwin v. Hubbard, 47 Me. 595.

One who has paid the consideration for the land and has exclusive control and possession, is the "owner," within the meaning of the statute, though his deed for it has not been executed. Wellington v. State, 52 Ark. 266.

The sale of standing timber is a sale of an interest in real estate; and a subsequent purchaser by warranty deed of the land with notice of such sale, cannot maintain trespass against the prior purchaser of the timber for cutting and removing the timber. Russell v. Myers, 32 Mich. 522.

A bona fide purchaser, however, without notice, would be protected against a prior unrecorded sale of the timber, the same as against any other unrecorded instrument. Russell v. Myers, 32 Mich. 522.

1. By Grant.—In a grant of lands, a reservation was made of a mill-site. It was held that the exception was inoperative until the grantor or his assigns built the mill, and that the whole premises vested in the grantee, who could maintain against a stranger, or the grantor or his assigns, for an entry on the lands for any other purpose than that specified in the exception. Dygart v. Matthews, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 35.

A purchaser of lands from the United States may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit to recover damages for injury done to the premises after his purchase and previous to his possession, and this after the abandonment of the land by the squatter. Blevins v. Cole, 1 Ala. 210.

An instruction in an action of trespass, "that the plaintiff would have a right to recover for damages done to a bridge built by him under authority of a court having a right to grant such authority, even though such a bridge was not on a public highway," is correct. Beebe v. Stutsman, 5 Iowa 271.

Williams v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 2 Mich. 259; 55 Am. Dec. 59, holds that a railroad company, having acquired its road by purchase and grant from the state, is the legal owner of the road, and has, by the express terms of its act of incorporation, the entire and exclusive right to its possession and control.

By Prescription.—The plaintiff had possession under a grant of land, part of which was covered by the defendant's elder grant, and of which the defendant had possession. The action was in quare clausum fregit and, although possession of a part is possession of the whole under such circumstances, the defendant's title to the land in dispute was upheld. Aikin v. Jones, Harp. (S. Car.) 69.

By Pre-emption Laws.—A person in possession of swamp land under a pre-emption claim, and who has improved the same, can maintain trespass for its protection. Barden v. Smith, 7 Wis. 439.

Under Colonization Laws.—See Kemper v. Victoria, 3 Tex. 159.

2. Land Conveyed by Writing.—In Whitney v. Swett, 22 N. H. 10; 53 Am. Dec. 228, it was held that no estate in land can be conveyed without writing, except an estate at will.

Under Bond to Convey.—A person in lawful possession of land under a bond to convey to him, may, before he has paid the balance of the purchase-money

4. Under Execution Laws.—By statute in some states, a regular and complete levy under execution will give such a possession as will afford the foundation for an action of trespass against the debtor or other party.¹ If land is conveyed for a valuable consideration with intent to defraud the creditors of the grantor, but without knowledge on the part of the grantee of the fraudulent intent, a levy by a creditor thus defrauded confers or received his deed, maintain trespass against the obligor for injuries to the freehold. Smith v. Price, 42 Ill. 399.

Executory Contract.—Under an executory contract for the sale of timber when it is severed from the land, with a license to enter and cut the trees and remove them, the purchaser has no interest in the land that will enable him to maintain an action of trespass. Fletcher v. Livingston, 153 Mass. 388.

A contract between the owner of the fee of the land and A, in which it is agreed that A shall settle, and, within three years, make certain improvements and, on performance of certain conditions, have title in fee, is sufficient to entitle A to maintain trespass to recover possession against a stranger, although he has never been in possession and has only a right of entry and possession; and such stranger cannot resist the recovery of possession on the ground that the plaintiff has not performed, or has forfeited its conditions. White v. Guirons, Minor (Ala.) 331.

An old man, whose children support him, working his farm, but without any contract giving them the title or exclusive possession of the farm, is still possessor of his farm, so that he may maintain an action for any injury to it. Russell v. Scott, 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 279.

Conveyance as Assignment of Right of Action.—In an action for a trespass to real estate, it is error to admit a conveyance of the property and assignment of the cause of action, to plaintiff from his wife, executed and delivered after suit was commenced. Dean v. Metropolitan El. R. Co., 119 N. Y. 540.

Land Not Incident to Land.—Van O'Linda v. Lothrop, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 292; 32 Am. Dec. 261. Land will not pass as incident or appurtenant to land. Where the owner of a narrow strip of land, and also of the land adjoining on the north and on the south, describing the one as land bounded by an "intended street," and the other as land bounded by street, these words being used to designate the narrow strip, the fee in the latter does not pass by such conveyance, but the grantee has a right of way therein by implication, or on the principle of estoppel.

1. Under Execution Laws.—Langdon v. Potter, 3 Mass. 215; Gore v. Brazier, 3 Mass. 523; 3 Am. Dec. 182; Blaisdell v. Roberts, 37 Me. 239; Cressy v. Sawyer, 18 N. H. 95; Chapman v. Gray, 15 Mass. 439; Allen v. Thayer, 17 Mass. 299; Bartlett v. Perkins, 13 Me. 87; Clark v. Brown, 3 Allen (Mass.) 509. As against a mere stranger, a levy of an execution, under the Massachusetts Act of 1844, ch. 107, is prima facie sufficient evidence of title, to sustain an action for a trespass, without proof that an action to recover possession of the land was brought within a year from the return of the execution on which the levy was made. Wellington v. Geary, 3 Allen (Mass.) 508.

Per Contra.—The plaintiff brought an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against A and B, and showed levy of execution as against A and a subsequent demand of possession against B. It appeared that B refused this demand, and was in possession adverse to A prior to the levy and therefore to the purchase of the writ. It was held that the plaintiff had not sufficient possession, by mere force of the levy, to maintain the action. Bowne v. Graham, 2 Tyler (Vt.) 411.

Where A recovered judgment, in the case of unlawful detainer, against B, for a tract of land in the possession of B's tenant, C, and the sheriff delivered to A constructive possession on a writ of habere facias possessionem, since which A's tenant had farmed the land, but B afterwards obtained a supersedeas of the judgment, and C refused to deliver the landlord's share of the crop to A, but delivered it to B, notwithstanding he had, previously to the supersedeas and on A's request, promised A to deliver it to him, it was held, that A could not maintain trespass against C therefor, and that the execution of the writ of habere facias possessionem, gave A no possession as against C. Kretzer v. Wysong, 5 Gratt. (Va.) 9.

5. Equitable Rights.—The grantee in possession of an equitable estate in land, or his assigns, may maintain an action for trespass thereon.²

6. Rights in Land Acquired by Custom.—One may acquire rights by custom also which will support the action.³

III. REALTY WHICH MAY BE THE SUBJECT OF TRESPASS—1. Private House.—A man's house cannot be entered forcibly for the execution of civil process; it may be to execute criminal process.⁴ If the defendant flies to or removes goods to another's house, the privilege does not protect him there after demand for entry made;⁵ if he is not there and has no property there, the sheriff

2. Equitable Rights.—Carney v. Reed, 11 Ind. 417; Miller v. Zufall, 113 Pa. St. 317. One having equitable title and prior possession may maintain trespass. Brown v. Hartzell, 87 Mo. 564. See also Bailey v. Kilburn, 10 Met. (Mass.) 176; 43 Am. Dec. 423; Stearns v. Palmer, 10 Met. (Mass.) 32.

Plaintiff agreed in November to purchase a store of defendant, payment to be made and deed to be passed on May 1st, following, and possession to be given April 1st. It was held that the plaintiff took an equitable right in the land at once; but that he had no right of property, nor any power to pursue the legal rights and remedies of those who hold a title, until payment and conveyance on May 1st; and that the defendant, having entered in March and removed certain fixtures, the plaintiff had neither the possession requisite to maintain an action of trespass, nor personal property essential to a suit in trover for conversion; and that a demand for the article removed, made prior to May 1st, would not give him such rights. Tabor v. Robinson, 36 Barb. (N. Y.) 483.

A person who enters into the possession of land under an equitable title, with the consent of the legal owner of the fee, acquires no estate of any kind or degree in it; and the legal owner may maintain trespass quare clausum fregit for an injury to the inheritance. Jones v. Taylor, 1 Dev. (N. Car.) 435.

3. By Custom.—In Knowles v. Dow, 22 N. H. 387; 55 Am. Dec. 163, the custom alleged was that the inhabitants of Hampton had been in the habit of hauling seaweed upon plaintiff's property and there depositing it for a while, afterwards carrying it away at their pleasure.

It was decided that the custom was reasonable. So, also, a custom to erect a fence to inclose a house while in process of erection. Bradbee v. Christ's Hospital, 4 M. & G. 714; 43 E. C. L. 368. But a custom to take sand from the plaintiff's close, which had been deposited there blown by wind from the seashore, was unreasonable. Blewett v. Tregonning, 3 A. & E. 554; 30 E. C. L. 151. It has been held that the use of ground for sixty years as a public landing-place, would support a plea that the ground was a landing-place for the inhabitants of the town who had used it during that period. Coolidge v. Learned, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 504.

4. Private House—Leading Case.—The leading case on this question is Semayne's Case, 5 Coke 91; Smith's Lead. Cas., vol. 1, p. 238; Hubbard v. Mace, 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 127; Gordon v. Clifford, 28 N. H. 402.

In the Year Book, 18 Edw. IV., fol. 4, pl. 19, a case is reported as follows: "Catesby came to the bar and showed how a feri facias was directed to the sheriff of Middlesex, to cause execution to be made for one J. upon a recovery by the said J. against one B.; and afterwards the said B. put all his goods into a closet, closed and locked; and afterwards the sheriff broke the (outer) door of the house and entered into the house, and took the goods (away) with him. And whether the sheriff had done any wrong. Littleton and all his companions held that the party might have a writ of trespass against the sheriff for the breaking of the house, notwithstanding the feri facias; for the feri facias shall not excuse him of the breaking of the house, but of the taking of the goods only."

5. Allen v. Martin, 10 Wend. (N. Y.)

becomes a trespasser.¹ Once in the house, the sheriff is justified in breaking inner doors to execute civil process.² Each part of a house, occupied in two parts by two families, may be a separate house in the eye of the law, if there be two entrances.³ Lowering windows on pulleys, or raising a latch, has been deemed a breaking.⁴

2. Public House.—It is a question as to whether public houses, such as churches, can or cannot maintain a civil action of trespass.⁵

3. Highways—a. IN GENERAL.—In the term highways, in this connection, are included streets, turnpikes, roads, and railroads.⁶ Trespass may be committed on the highway, by one who has the use thereof, against the owner of the property bordering thereon, or by such owner against the public.⁷

5. Public House.—A religious society, entitled to the use of a meeting-house for all religious purposes, but who are not the owners of the fee therein, this being a separate society composed of the pew-holders in the meeting-house, cannot maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit for a breaking and entering into the meeting-house, whereby the exercise of their right was interrupted. Religious Congregational Soc. v. Baker, 15 Vt. 119; 40 Am. Dec. 668.

Where a parish erected and occupied a meeting-house, and used the land around it for purposes connected with the meeting-house as a place of public worship, under a vote of the town appropriating the land for that purpose, though the town had subsequently sold some part of the land so appropriated, it was held that the parish might maintain trespass against a person who plowed up a portion of the land so used. First Parish v. Smith, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 297.

The use of a church for divine worship by a religious society, and keeping it locked at other times, is a sufficient occupation to enable the trustee of the society, although not a constant attendant at church, to maintain trespass quare clausum fregit against a person breaking into it. Carrine v. Westerfield, 3 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 331.

The minister of a religious society cannot, as such, maintain trespass quare clausum fregit for the use of the society. Cox v. Walker, 26 Me. 504.

Where land is conveyed to several persons as trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church, they may maintain trespass quare clausum fregit for an injury to the land, although not appointed trustees in the manner pointed out by the statute. Walker v. Fawcett, 7 Ired. (N. Car.) 44. The legal title is in them, and that is sufficient to enable them to support the action; and if they sue as trustees, such description of them is mere surplusage, and may be rejected. See, generally, RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES, vol. 20, p. 773.

6. See HIGHWAY, vol. 9, p. 362.

7. Trespasses on Highways.—One who deposits rails on a highway, commits a trespass against the owner of the soil. Lewis v. Jones, 1 Pa. St. 336; 44 Am. Dec. 138.

One who, not being duly authorized by a town, undertakes to alter a highway, is liable to the owner of the land in trespass. Hunt v. Rich, 38 Me. 195.

The removal of sidewalks by a village, laid at its expense, renders the village liable. Rogers v. Randall, 29 Mich. 41.

Making a bridge over a ditch on the side of a public road and cutting timbers for the same, is not such a

b. WHEN IMPASSABLE.—When the highway is blocked, by reason of some sudden or unexpected obstruction, the public have the right to pass over adjoining property, to get around the obstruction, without being deemed guilty of a trespass.¹

c. OVERHANGING EAVES, WINDOWS, AND DOORS.—Adjoining property owners have a right to a reasonable use of the highway for swinging doors, windows, or overhanging eaves.²

4. Private Ways.—One owning land over which others have a right of way, has such property in the right of way as will support trespass.³

5. Boundaries.—Land need not have marked boundaries to support an action for a trespass upon the land,⁴ so long as it can be possession as will maintain trespass. Morris v. Hayes, 2 Jones (N. Car.) 93.

A party in possession of land under a title liable to be divested upon a future contingency, may maintain trespass against one who has no title; as where the highway over the land of the plaintiff has been discontinued by a vote of the town. Bigelow v. Hillman, 37 Me. 52.

A private individual has been held liable to adjoining owners for widening a highway, although the highway surveyor might lawfully have done the same thing. Hollenbeck v. Rowley, 8 Allen (Mass.) 473.

A highway inclosed by an individual and used for more than twenty years under claim of right, gives a prescriptive right to the land so occupied against the selectmen of the town, who removed the fence to the original line or highway. Knight v. Heaton, 22 Vt. 480.

If the fee of the highway is in the state, a town cannot maintain trespass against a railroad for using the same. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Summit, 3 Ill. App. 155.

One who has placed a house upon the highway, under a license from the owner of the adjoining land for a limited time, has no such title as will enable him to maintain an action against the owner of the land, at the expiration of the time, excavating the soil around the house and thereby endangering its safety. Mason v. Holt, 1 Allen (Mass.) 45.

The plaintiff, owning a lot in Portland, constructed at his own expense and from his own materials, a sidewalk in front of the lot, some of which materials the city for certain purposes removed and sold, and the defendant assisted in carrying them away. It was held that the defendant was liable to plaintiff in trespass, for the value of the materials removed. Muzzey v. Davis, 54 Me. 361.

By contemporaneous conveyances of lots on an alley, by descriptions bounding thereon, with a right of way over the alley in common with the other owners, the title passes, unless there are express words of exclusion, to the center line of the alley, subject to the private way; and for an injury to the soil and things affixed thereto an action of trespass will lie by an owner in possession of the adjoining lot. Freeman v. Sayre, 48 N. J. L. 37.

4. One owner may maintain trespass, under the code, against his neighbor, to recover treble damages for cutting trees standing on the dividing line, because, though each has, abstractedly, a right to cut the half standing on his own land, yet he cannot be allowed so to use his half as to destroy his neighbor's. Relyea v. Beaver, 34 Barb. (N. Y.) 547.

A tree whose trunk stands on the land of A, extending some of its branches over, and some of its roots into, the land of B, is, with such overhanging branches and the fruit thereon, the sole property of A; and if B gathers the fruit from such branches, and appropriates it to his own use, he is identified. Trees on the line and other monuments belong to each of the adjoining owners.¹

6. Party Walls.—(See PARTY WALLS, vol. 18, p. 3.)

7. Fences.—Fences are part of the freehold, though accidentally detached.² A fence built on the land of another belongs to him;³ if by agreement on the line, to both.⁴ Trespass lies for removing the fence of another, or a party fence.⁵ No action lies for obstructing light, air, or view by either wall or fence.⁶

8. Easements.—(See EASEMENTS, vol. 6, p. 139.)

9. Support of Adjacent Soil.—The owner has the right to lateral support for his land;⁷ but this right of lateral support for the liable in trespass to A. Lyman v. Hale, 11 Conn. 177; 27 Am. Dec. 728; Skinner v. Wilder, 38 Vt. 115; 88 Am. Dec. 645.

Line Trees.—Dubois v. Beaver, 25 N. Y. 123; 82 Am. Dec. 326.

The principle of the common law which has treated every entry upon another's land, even by cattle, unless by the owner's lease, as an injury for which an action for trespass will lie, is not applicable to the uncultivated, uninclosed, wild prairie lands of Nebraska. Delaney v. Erickson, 10 Neb. 492.

2. Fences.—Goodrich v. Jones, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 142; Walker v. Sherman, 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 640; Hannibal, etc., R. Co. v. Crawford, 68 Mo. 80.

3. Dietrich v. Berk, 24 Pa. St. 470.

4. Burrell v. Burrell, 11 Mass. 294. This was an action for entering on the plaintiff's land, and taking away a fence on the dividing line between premises owned by the parties respectively. The part of the fence removed by the defendant was made of rails; and he proved that he built it twenty-three years previous, and had ever since kept it in repair; and that, at the time of the alleged trespass, he took away the rails in order to replace them by a stone wall, which he built the following year, putting it nearer to his own than the place where the rail fence had stood. The court held there was nothing from which an entry on the plaintiff's land could be inferred, unless such entry was necessary for the purpose of taking down the fence in order to rebuild it, which would not be tortious. The part of the fence assigned to the defendant to keep in repair was his property, so far, at least, that the removal of it for lawful purposes could not make him a trespasser; and we do not think there was any joint tenancy or tenancy in common of the materials of which the fence was composed.

5. Wells v. Rubenacher (Ky. 1891), 15 S. W. Rep. 1063. Owners of adjoining lands with a division fence between them, built one-half by each, and established for more than twenty-one years, have not such an ownership in the materials of which it is made, as will justify a removal by either of the portion built by him, against the consent of the other, and for such a removal an action of trespass will lie. Stoner v. Hunsicker, 47 Pa. St. 514; Rawson v. Ward, 128 Mass. 552; Brake v. Crider, 107 Pa. St. 210.

No action lies against a person for removing, with as little injury as possible, a fence separating a highway from a navigable creek, at a place over which he has a right to pass, although he does so for the purpose of filling up the creek, and thus committing a nuisance. Harvard College v. Stearns, 15 Gray (Mass.) 1.

6. Guest v. Reynolds, 68 Ill. 478; 18 Am. Rep. 570, holds that an owner of land who erects thereon a fence or wall which obstructs the access of light and air to a house on adjacent land, and also obstructs the view from such house, is not liable in damages for the obstruction to the owner of such adjoining premises, if the latter has no adverse right by prescription or otherwise, as no positive right is invaded; light and air being not subjects of property beyond the moment of actual occupancy.

7. In Humphries v. Brogden, 1 L. & Eq. R. 241. Lord Campbell, C. J., said that the right to lateral support "stands on natural justice, and is essential to the protection and enjoyment of property in the soil. Although it places a restraint on what a man may do with his own property, it is in accordance with the principle, sic utere tuo ut alienum non ledas." And again he adjacent land does not extend to the support of buildings placed on such adjacent land.¹

IV. ENTRY ON ANOTHER'S LAND—1. Under Protection of Process.—Persons or officers acting under and within the authority of process regularly issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, will be protected thereby from trespass.³ This is true, if the process or says: "The right to lateral support from the adjoining soil, is not like the support of one building upon another supposed to be gained by grant, but is a right of property passing with the soil."

1. Thurston v. Hancock, 12 Mass. 220; 7 Am. Dec. 57; Lasala v. Holbrook, 4 Paige (N. Y.) 169; 25 Am. Dec. 524; Farrand v. Marshall, 21 Barb. (N. Y.) 409.

In the absence of a prescriptive right, a party, by erecting a house near the boundary line of his lot, does not acquire any right of support over the adjoining land, and the owner of the adjacent premises may lawfully excavate the same for the purpose of erecting a building thereon; and in such event, even though he should be guilty of negligence in failing to give notice thereof to the other party, or in making the excavation in an unskillful manner, he cannot be made liable in an action of trespass. Mamer v. Lussem, 65 Ill. 484.

In Wyatt v. Harrison, 3 B. & Ad. 871, Tenterson, C. J., said: "It may be true, that if my land adjoins that of another, and I have not, by building, increased the weight upon my soil, and my neighbor digs his land so as to occasion mine to fall in, he may be liable to an action. But if I have laid an additional weight upon my land, it does not follow that he is to be deprived of the right of digging his own ground, because mine will then become incapable of supporting the artificial weight which I have laid upon it."

See, generally, LATERAL AND SUBJACENT SUPPORT, vol. 12, p. 933.

2. Trespass quare clausum fregit lies for trespass on lands covered with water, if the subject of grant. Smith v. Ingram, 7 Ired. (N. Car.) 175.

Fishing, fowling, boating, bathing, skating, or riding upon the ice, taking water for domestic or agricultural purposes, or for use in the arts, and the cutting and taking of ice, are lawful and free upon the great ponds, of Massachusetts to all persons who own land adjoining them, or can obtain access to them without trespass, so far as they do not interfere with the reasonable use of the ponds by others, or with the public right, unless in cases where the legislature have otherwise directed. West Roxbury v. Stoddard, 7 Allen (Mass.) 158.

3. Protection of Process.—Wall v. Farnham, 46 Me. 525; Hill v. Figley, 25 Ill. 156; Bogert v. Phelps, 14 Wis. 88; Young v. Wise, 7 Wis. 128.

If a rate bill and warrant issued by a board of school trustees, under the Missouri act, providing for the organization of schools, is regular and valid upon its face, the constable will be protected in executing it, although there may have been errors in the previous proceedings. Turner v. Franklin, 29 Mo. 285.

An execution issued by a court of competent jurisdiction is a legal justification to an officer for taking and selling the judgment debtor's property thereon, and he is not bound to investigate the genuineness or sufficiency of a receipt shown to him by the debtor in settlement of the judgment. Twitchell v. Shaw, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 46; 57 Am. Dec. 80.

The theater of the plaintiff was assessed, but erroneously, as a dwelling warrant is regular on its face, even though there was some irregularity in issuing it.¹ The protection extends to those whom the officer may lawfully call on for assistance.² If the process shall house; a tax collector executed a warrant of distress under such assessment. It was held that an action of trespass did not lie against him as a ministerial officer for executing such warrant. Henderson v. Brown, 1 Cai. (N. Y.) 92; 2 Am. Dec. 164.

Where the court has jurisdiction and the proceedings are regular on their face, trespass will not lie. Putnam v. Man, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 202; 20 Am. Dec. 686.

1. Even if Irregularly Issued.—Yeager v. Carpenter, 8 Leigh. (Va.) 454; 31 Am. Dec. 665; Horton v. Hendershot, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 118; Wilton Mfg. Co. v. Butler, 34 Me. 431; Averett v. Thompson, 15 Ala. 678; Mower v. Stickney, 5 Minn. 397; Billings v. Russell, 23 Pa. St. 189; 62 Am. Dec. 330; Lovier v. Gilpin, 6 Dana (Ky.) 321; Hodgson v. Millward, 3 Grant's Cas. (Pa.) 406; Donahoe v. Shed, 8 Met. (Mass.) 326; Thornburg v. Hand, 7 Cal. 554.

When the holder of a note for a greater sum than $100, in order to sue in a justice's court, relinquished the excess of the note above that sum, and the justice issued a distress warrant thereupon, no bond being given nor affidavit made till after the issuing of the warrant; and the defendant appeared, and made no objection, but, by agreement; the matter was submitted to arbitrators, and upon their award in the plaintiff's favor, an execution was issued by the justice, and the defendant's goods sold, it was held, that the defendant could not maintain trespass against the justice, either on the ground of jurisdiction, or of the improper issuance of the distress, he having waived the right by his appearance and submission. Mabry v. Little, 19 Tex. 337.

Where an officer acts under process in the discharge of his ministerial duty, and does not exceed his authority, he will be protected, though the process is not sufficient; but where he acts officiously and as a volunteer, he must, himself, show that the process was legal and sufficient. Hunt v. Ballew, 9 B. Mon. (Ky.) 390.

An officer who acts according to his precept in making an arrest, is not a trespasser, although the party arrested is privileged from arrest. Chase v.

Fish, 16 Me. 132; Carle v. Delesdernier, 13 Me. 363; 29 Am. Dec. 508. See also Woods v. Davis, 34 N. H. 328.

Where a person acting under a void deputation levied on property, and the property, together with the execution, was returned into the hands of the sheriff, and by him sold, it was held, that the sheriff was protected by such execution in a suit against him. Crockett v. Latimer, 1 Humph. (Tenn.) 272.

Trespass cannot be maintained for an act done under the authority of a constitutional statute. Brown v. Beatty, 34 Miss. 227; 69 Am. Dec. 389.

An officer, who holds an execution in the common form, issued by a court having jurisdiction against the defendant, who had been discharged under the insolvent law of Massachusetts of 1838, ch. 163, after the judgment on which the execution issued was rendered, is not liable to an action of trespass for arresting and committing such defendant on the execution, although the defendant shows his discharge to the officer before he is arrested. Wilmarth v. Burt, 7 Met. (Mass.) 257.

An action will not lie against an officer who arrests Jonathan A. Trull on an execution against George A. Trull, the former being the real defendant, and having been served with the original process, by the same erroneous name, but having suffered judgment by default. Trull v. Howland, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 109; 57 Am. Dec. 82.

The fact that a note has been paid before judgment upon it, does not make the judgment void, so that the judgment creditor becomes a trespasser by suing out an execution upon it. Barnett v. Reed, 51 Pa. St. 190; 88 Am. Dec. 574.

2. Those Assisting Protected.—The person who assists an officer in making a legal levy, will not become a trespasser, by a subsequent abuse by the officer of his authority. Wheelock v. Archer, 26 Vt. 380.

The process, being sufficient to justify the marshal acting under it, was held sufficient for the protection of the other defendants who were acting as his aids, and they were not required to prove any formal deputation. Killpatrick v. Frost, 2 Grant's Cas. (Pa.) 168.

Persons summoned by an officer to have been irregularly issued, although the officer may be protected, those at whose instance it was issued are liable.¹ The officer serving process must, at his peril, see that it is regular on its face and issued by a court of competent authority.² Only the person to whom it is directed can serve process.³ The officer must assist in the execution of legal process, are justifiable in their acts to the same extent that the officer would be. Payne v. Green, 10 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 507.

When the party does not control or direct the course of an officer, but requires him to proceed at his peril, and the officer makes a mistake of law in judging of his official duty, whereby he becomes a trespasser by relation, the party is not affected by it, even when he receives the money coming by such irregularity, although aware of the course pursued by the officer. He is not liable unless he consents to the officer's course or subsequently adopts it. Hyde v. Hooper, 26 Vt. 552.

In trespass, the defendant may show as a justification, that he acted under the command of an officer in the execution of process, although the process may not be regular and valid; but if he acted officiously, he must show a valid process. Reed v. Rice, 2 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 44; 19 Am Dec. 122.

If Officer Not Protected, Deputy Not.—A sheriff who, acting by his deputy under color of his office, makes an unauthorized conversion of intoxicating liquors held in Maine, is liable in an action of trespass de bonis, whether such liquors are intended for illegal sale in this, or another state, or not. Hamilton v. Goding, 55 Me. 419.

Where the officer is not justified by the process, one assisting him by his command is liable as a trespasser. Elder v. Morrison, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 128; 25 Am. Dec. 548; Hooker v. Smith, 19 Vt. 151; 47 Am. Dec. 679.

1. Those Having Warrant Irregularly Issued Liable.—One who procures and has served a replevin writ by which the property of a third person is taken, is liable in trespass to the owner, and the fact that he acted as the servant of the officer, in making the service, would not protect him, even though the officer himself might have a valid defense. Williams v. Bunker, 78 Me. 373.

A writ unlawfully sued out in the name of another by the defendant, and irregularly served by his procurement, can afford him no protection in taking the property of another under color thereof. Baldwin v. Whittier, 16 Me. 33.

An execution, not supported by any judgment authorizing it, is no justification for taking goods. Lincoln v. Cross, 11 Wis. 91.

Although, in trespass, an officer may justify under final process, regular upon its face, issued from a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, without showing the judgment on which it is founded, yet the plaintiff in the process, or a stranger, must show a regular judgment. Dixon v. Watkins, 9 Ark. 139.

2. Issued by Proper Authority.—Under the laws of Minnesota, a writ of attachment cannot be allowed by a clerk of the court; and one so issued is void, and the sheriff taking property thereunder, is liable for trespass. Guerin v. Hunt, 8 Minn. 477; Merritt v. St. Paul, 11 Minn. 223.

An order from the plaintiff's attorney to a prothonotary to issue a fi. fa. on a justice's judgment, will not protect him from liability to the defendant in the judgment, if he issues the fi. fa. without a certificate of the justice, of his execution issued and returned. Frankem v. Trimble, 5 Pa. St. 520.

The order of highway commissioners is no justification in trespass for opening the plaintiff's fence so as to let cattle into his corn, when it is not shown that there was a highway legally established at the place. Caldwell v. Evans, 85 Ill. 170.

Where a justice notifies a constable that an appeal has been entered and an execution in his hands superseded, any subsequent sale under the execution is void, and the constable is a trespasser. The regularity of the appeal is the justice's business and not the constable's. O'Donnell v. Mullin, 27 Pa. St. 199; 67 Am. Dec. 458.

3. Person to Whom Directed Must Serve.—No one but the proper officer can execute a search warrant; and if any other person undertakes to do so, the warrant will afford him no protection. Halsted v. Brice, 13 Mo. 171.

A constable who levies upon and sells property under an execution not not exceed the authority of his process,¹ and must levy it on the proper property or person.² A mere levy, unauthorized, is trespass.³ Voidable process may be a protection, void process is not.⁴

directed to him, and illegally in his hands, may be treated as a mere trespasser; the constable must derive his authority from the justice who rendered the judgment or his successor in office. Barley v. Tipton, 29 Mo. 206.

1. Must Not Exceed Authority.—A special officer, holding an execution against the debtor's property, but none against his body, with the creditor, attempted to levy on a mare which the debtor had sold to W., but in the scuffle arising by the debtor's and W.'s resisting the change of halters, the mare escaped, and was overtaken and was ridden off by W. The officer then directed the creditor to seize and hold the debtor, while he went after the mare, although the debtor had not threatened to interfere to prevent the officer's going for her. It was held that in so confining the debtor, the officer and the creditor were joint trespassers. Leach v. Francis, 41 Vt. 670.

The mere fact that the execution debtor was found on the land, is no justification to the officer for digging up and removing gold-bearing earth. Rowe v. Bradley, 12 Cal. 226.

A writ of attachment, not returned to the court to which it is returnable, constitutes, after the time limited by law for its return, no justification of an officer who has attached and removed property under it. Williams v. Ives, 25 Conn. 568.

An officer seizing intoxicating liquors by a warrant issued under Massachusetts Laws (1855), ch. 215, § 25, is liable as a trespasser, upon the subsequent abatement of the proceedings, because the notice to the keeper was not returned to the proper court; although no order is passed for the return of the liquors, and notwithstanding section 38. Ewings v. Walker, 9 Gray (Mass.) 95.

2. Must Levy on Right Property or Person.—An entry upon the land of a stranger to the process, under a writ of possession, will not oust him of his possession, or right of possession; but the entry, and every subsequent act done under it, will be a trespass. Warren v. Cochran, 30 N. H. 379.

In Ohio, a writ of replevin issues, to enforce the claim of an owner of property for its delivery to him, by one who wrongfully detains it, and for that purpose the property is specifically described, but it confers no authority on the officer to seize property which is not actually or constructively in the possession of the party named in the process, and where the property is taken from the possession of a third person, who is the bona fide owner thereof, the process will not justify the officer, although the property is the identical property described therein. State v. Jennings, 14 Ohio. St. 73.

If horses belonging to two persons are accidentally placed in a stable together, and an officer selects two of them as the horses of one of the persons and attaches them, intending to hold them at all events, and insists upon holding them after notice that one of them belongs to the other person, the officer will be liable in trespass if the horse did belong to the person claiming it, and the latter will not be estopped to claim it by some fraudulent act on his part. Moore v. Bowman, 47 N. H. 494. See also Colt v. Eves, 12 Conn. 243.

3. Mere Levy a Trespass.—A mere levy upon personal property by an officer, where it is not authorized by law, is without either a sale or a removal, a trespass. Stewart v. Wells, 6 Barb. (N. Y.) 79; Gibbs v. Chase, 10 Mass. 125; Robinson v. Mansfield, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 139; Miller v. Baker, 1 Met. (Mass.) 27; Stevens v. Somerindyke, 4 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 418; Welsh v. Bell, 32 Pa. St. 12.

4. Void Process.—An execution which is voidable only, and not void, affords full and ample protection to the officer who obeys its mandate. Cogburn v. Spence, 15 Ala. 549; 50 Am. Dec. 140; Sheldon v. Stryker, 34 Barb. (N. Y.) 116; Kissock v. Grant, 34 Barb. (N. Y.) 144.

An execution issued by a magistrate against a person who has not been summoned before him, is void, and the constable who levies such an execution is a trespasser. Tobin v. Addison, 2 Strobb. (S. Car.) 3.

Trespass lies against a sheriff pro-

2. Trespasser Ab Initio; Abuse of Process.—A trespasser ab initio is one who goes upon the premises of another under authority of law, and does any unwarrantable act; such an one is deemed a trespasser ab initio, and is held responsible for all the injury committed.¹ If one goes upon the property of another by the latter's authority, and does unwarrantable acts, he is not a trespasser ab initio, but may be held responsible for the particular wrongful act.² Trespass ab initio frequently occurs through abuse of authority vested in one by the law, as for abuse of process;³ to make one so liable it must be shown that he grossly abused his authority. Such a mistake as a person of ordinary care and intelligence might make will not amount to such an abuse.⁴

ceeding to sell under an execution where the judgment has been satisfied. Kuhn v. North, 10 S. & R. (Pa.) 399.

1. Authority for Entry as Affecting Unlawful Act.—The Six Carpenters' Case, 8 Coke 146 A; Smith's Lead. Cas., vol. 1 (5th Am. ed.), 257, is the leading case on this subject. In this case, six carpenters entered a tavern, and were served with wine, for which they paid; they were afterwards, at their request, served with bread and more wine, for which they refused to pay. On these facts, an action in trespass was brought against the six carpenters, and the point in the case was, whether the non-payment made the entry into the tavern tortious. It was decided that the mere non-payment did not make the carpenters trespassers ab initio.

Further illustrations are: a sheriff or other officer, either by himself or his agent, unlawfully selling property. Everett v. Herrin, 48 Me. 537; Griel v. Hunter, 40 Ala. 542; Brackett v. Vining, 49 Me. 356; Bond v. Wilder, 16 Vt. 393; Pierce v. Benjamin, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 356; 25 Am. Dec. 396; Smith v. Gates, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 55; Purington v. Loring, 7 Mass. 388; Frisbee v. Langworthy, 11 Wis. 375. So one wrongfully impounding cattle before damages have been ascertained. Sackrider v. McDonald, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 253; Hopkins v. Hopkins, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 369. 3. Abuse of Process Makes One a Trespasser Ab Initio.—Mussey v. Cummings, 34 Me. 74; Burton v. Calaway, 20 Ind. 469; Bradley v. Davis, 14 Me.

44; 30 Am. Dec. 729; Jarratt v. Gwathmey, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 237; Wilson v. Ellis, 28 Pa. St. 238; Freeman v. Smith, 30 Pa. St. 264; Parish v. Wilhelm, 63 N. Car. 50; McGough v. Wellington, 6 Allen (Mass.) 505.

Not Held as Trespassers Ab Initio.—Where an officer used property held by him, see Paul v. Slason, 22 Vt. 231; and levied an attachment in favor of creditors against the rights of those holding under a fraudulent conveyance, although there was no order of court for the levy. Hartshorn v. Williams, 31 Ala. 149.

Omission to take out the execution within thirty days, where the officer afterwards levied on goods upon the original writ. McGough v. Wellington, 4 Allen (Mass.) 502.

4. To make one, who originally acted with propriety under legal process, liable, ab initio, for subsequent illegal acts, he must be shown to have grossly abused the authority under which he acted; such a mistake as a person of ordinary care and common intelligence might commit, will not amount to an abuse; but there must be such an illegal exercise of the authority, to the prejudice of another, as will warrant the conclusion that its perpetrator intended from the first to do wrong, and to use his legal authority as a cover to his illegal conduct. Taylor v. Jones, 42 N. H. 25.

Where an act is lawfully done, it cannot be made unlawful ab initio, unless by some positive act incompatible with the exercise of the legal right to do the first act. The mere intention of doing a subsequent illegal act will not render the first act unlawful. Gates v. Lounsbury, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 427.

An officer who, after selling on an execution sufficient property to satisfy it, proceeds to sell other property of the judgment debtor, does not merely become liable as a trespasser, ab initio, to one who holds an unrecorded mortgage of a portion of the property which was rightfully sold. Wolcott v. Root, 2 Allen (Mass.) 194.

An officer who serves a search warrant, which commands him to search a dwelling-house therein described, for sole-leather and other goods, is not rendered a trespasser ab initio merely by taking and examining a case of "uppers" found in the house, and laying them down again, although they were not specially mentioned in his warrant, and he knew they were not, if in so doing he acted in good faith; or by searching a shop without license, before searching the dwelling-house. Dwinnels v. Boynton, 3 Allen (Mass.) 310.

Public officers cannot be made trespassers ab initio, unless by proof of some positive wrongful act, giving character to the original act, incompatible with the exercise of the legal right to do the first act. Stoughton v. Mott, 25 Vt. 668.

A revenue officer, who has seized a vessel, may become a trespasser ab initio, by violating his trust. Van Brunt v. Schenck, Anth. (N. Y.) 157.

1. Orders of President or Cabinet Officer.—It is a good defense to an action of trespass against an officer of the navy for acts done by him, to show that the same were done by virtue of lawful and public orders from the president of the United States and the secretary of the navy. Durand v. Hollins, 4 Blatchf. (U. S.) 451.

In trespass by the United States, a permit to enter upon the lands which contained lead ore, may be admitted in evidence to show the nature and object of the entry. U. S. v. Gear, 3 McLean (U. S.) 571.

Authority of Statute.—Where trespass is brought against a supervisor, executing powers given by the Indiana Revised Statutes of 1843, he is bound to show that he acted in good faith, and in a proper discharge of his duty to the public. Conwell v. Emrie, 4 Ind. 209.

A surveyor of highways, in Maine, was required by the selectmen of a town to put a road therein, then lately laid out, and running through the land of A, in a condition to be traveled with safety and convenience; and, in doing it, he, and those acting under his direction, took for the purpose, from the land of A, which lay contiguous to the way, "not planted or inclosed," a quantity of stone, necessary for the proper repair of the road. It was held that A could not maintain trespass quare clausum fregit against the surveyor or those acting under him, such act being authorized by Rev. Stat., ch. 25, § 72, and the remedy for compensation being in a different mode. Keene v. Chapman, 25 Me. 126.

Authority of Military and Navy.—Trespass will not lie for an actual trespass committed under orders of a military officer in a case of extreme necessity. Barrow v. Page, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.) 97.

Trespass does not lie against the commander of a national ship for stopping, under instructions from the secretary of the navy, a neutral ship, though the neutral is afterwards captured on that account, unless there is collusion between the captor and commander. Ruan v. Perry, 3 Cal. (N. Y.) 120.

The command of a superior to commit a trespass, or other unlawful act, is no justification to his inferior. Brown v. Howard, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 119.

A person in command of armed forces of the so-called Confederate States, is not liable for a trespass committed by any of his command without his knowledge or abetment; but if he advises or aids such trespass, the fact that he was acting under such so-called government is no defense. Echols v. Staunton, 3 W. Va. 574.

Authority of State.—Where the legislature authorizes an act which, in its natural consequences, may be injurious to the property of another, and prescribes the method in which damages are to be ascertained, he who does the act is not liable as a trespasser. Woods v. Nashua Mfg. Co., 4 N. H. 527; Lebanon v. Olcott, 1 N. H. 339.

4. Under Title, Possession, or Right of Possession.—One having title to property, and wrongfully denied possession, can enter without being guilty of trespass;¹ so a tenant, mortgagor, or other

Although a trespass is committed by order of the authorities of a state, acting in pursuance of the law thereof, it cannot be justified when the state is engaged in rebellion against the government and laws of the United States. Lively v. Ballard, 2 W. Va. 496.

Where one who seeks a license under the statute, to erect a milldam, makes parties to the proceeding all who should be made parties, he is not liable for an injury to the land of others, where such injury could not have been foreseen. Wilson v. Hanthorn, 72 Iowa 451.

A surveyor of highways may lawfully remove a fence run across the highway, without first requiring the owner to remove it. Cool v. Crommet, 13 Me. 250.

In case of an intrusion upon private property, there is no presumption of lawful authority arising from the commission of the act, simply because done or directed by a municipal corporation having general powers in respect to acts of the kind in question. Bradt v. Albany, 5 Hun (N. Y.) 591.

Public Necessity.—A house in a town may be pulled down and removed, to arrest the spread of a fire, where it is inevitable that it will take fire and be consumed, and, in such case, will inevitably spread the fire to other houses; but it must be impossible in such case, to prevent its taking fire, or to prevent its communicating fire to other houses, by use of the means within the power of the parties pulling it down. Beach v. Trudgain, 2 Gratt. (Va.) 219.

The defendants, one as superintendent of public streets, and the other as dockmaster, of the city of New York, notified the plaintiff, who was the owner of a quantity of pig iron lying on a pier in North River, to remove the same on or before a specified day, or it would be taken to the public yard, and there disposed of as the ordinances of the city direct. On the morning and early part of the afternoon of the day specified, the defendants caused the iron to be removed, and the plaintiff was obliged to pay a large amount of charges and expenses to obtain the possession and return of it. The iron would have been removed the same day by one who had purchased it, had it not been taken to the public yard. It was held first, that under the notice, the plaintiff had a right to the whole of the day specified in which to make the removal of the iron, and that the defendants were therefore trespassers; second, that the defendants, as public officers, were bound to conform to the ordinances of the city and the terms of the notice, and could not set up in defense that, as private citizens, they were authorized to remove the iron as a nuisance. Coddington v. White, 2 Duer (N. Y.) 390.

1. Owner Denied Possession Can Enter.—Smith v. McAdam, 3 Mich. 506; Walker v. Newhouse, 14 Mo. 373; Henderson v. Grewell, 8 Cal. 581; Tribble v. Frame, 7 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 617; Cann v. Warren, 1 Houst. (Del.) 188; Gatewood v. Head, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 60; Freeman v. Thayer, 29 Me. 369; Dabney v. Manning, 3 Ohio 321; 17 Am. Dec. 597; Erwin v. Olmstead, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 229.

A person cannot be made liable in trespass quare clausum fregit for entering upon his own land, in the wrongful possession of another, and exerting a right of ownership; nor can any unlawful acts, committed in the exertion of this right, be so connected with it, as to make him liable in damages as a trespasser ab initio. Johnson v. Hannahan, 1 Strobb. (S. Car.) 313.

A person having the right of entry upon land, is not liable in trespass quare clausum fregit for entering against the will of the person in possession. Yeates v. Allin, 2 Dana (Ky.) 134; Walton v. File, 1 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 567.

In an action of trespass, where the plaintiff had title, and at least constructive possession, and the defendant had knowledge that he was cutting on the plaintiff's premises, with no evidence to show any right in the defendant, and no connection with a stranger who claimed title, it was held that the defendant was a mere intruder, and that evidence of title in a third person would not justify the act, or present an available defense. Miller v. Decker, 40 Barb. (N. Y.) 228.

A, with the permission of B, erected a house on B's land, and then conveyed the house to C, but continued to person, without title, may have a present right of possession which will justify his entry, or enable him, if in possession, to maintain trespass for the wrongful entry of another.¹

reside in it. B conveyed the land on which the house stood to D, who requested A to leave the house, and, upon A's refusal, entered and tore down the chimneys, and put it in such a situation that A could not reside in it. It was held that A could not maintain trespass for such breaking and entering. Harris v. Gellingham, 6 N. H. 9; 23 Am. Dec. 701.

It is no trespass for the owner of the freehold to enter, cut and carry away the grain of one in wrongful possession. Barnes v. Dean, 5 Watts (Pa.) 543; 30 Am. Dec. 346.

Right of Owner to Use Force.—Whether one having right of entry may use force if necessary to exert his right, is an unsettled question, according to common law; but the authorities may be reconciled on this distinction. One having a right of entry may use force, provided it does not amount to a breach of the peace; but one not having such right is guilty of indictable trespass, if he enter with a strong hand, under circumstances calculated to excite terror, although the force used does not amount to a breach of the peace. State v. Ross, 4 Jones (N. Car.) 315; 69 Am. Dec. 751.

1. Right of Possession Entitles One to Enter.—Ralph v. Bayley, 11 Vt. 521; McCrary v. Miller, 14 Vt. 128; Rossiter v. Russell, 18 N. H. 73; Culver v. Smart, 1 Ind. 65; Hope v. Cason, 3 B. Wetherly*, 1 Jones (N. Car.) 327; Sloane v. McConahy, 4 Ohio 157; Ives v. Ives, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 235; Hyatt v. Wood, 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 150; 4 Am. Dec. 258; Van Deusen v. Young, 29 N. Y. 9.

Occasional entries and the commission of acts of trespass upon the land of another, do not constitute such a possession as will interfere with that which is incident to the ownership of the legal title. The owner may maintain trespass quare clausum fregit against such a party. Hughes v. Stevens, 36 Pa. St. 320.

In an action of trespass, the defendant may offer as many titles to the land in dispute as he pleases, and if they all fail him, he may resort to, and depend upon, his possessory rights. Mackay v. Reynolds, 2 Bay (S. Car.) 474; Strange v. Durham, 2 Bay (S. Car.) 429.

A mortgagee of a house entered into it, with an officer, by opening the outer door thereof, in the absence of the mortgagor and his family, before the condition of the mortgage was broken, and without giving notice to the mortgagor to quit, and the officer, by the mortgagee's directions, attached the mortgagor's goods in the house. The mortgagor brought an action of trespass against the mortgagee and the officer, for breaking and entering the house and carrying away the goods. It was held that the action could not be maintained. Lackey v. Holbrook, 11 Met. (Mass.) 458.

A town laid out certain lots, which had been reserved, by its charter, for public schools and other purposes; part of these lots were afterward annexed to the territory of the neighboring town, and the parts so annexed passed into the possession of the plaintiff. It was held that leases of these lots executed by the proper authorities of the first town, to the defendant after the annexation, were a sufficient defense for the defendant in an action of trespass. White v. Fuller, 38 Vt. 193.

Where a person who has entered under a parol agreement for the purchase of land, cuts timber, and afterwards rescinds the agreement, he is a trespasser. Clough v. Hosford, 6 N. H. 231.

An execution creditor, who cuts hay upon land of which he is in possession under the levy of his execution, and before he reconveys his interest in the land, is not liable in trespass quare clausum fregit for remaining in possession, or for removing the hay while in possession, after such conveyance. Drown v. Foss, 39 N. H. 525.

A mere possessory title is sufficient to support a plea of liberum tenementum, in an action by a person holding without color or claim of title. Hyatt v. Wood, 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 150; 4 Am. Dec. 258; Wood v. Hyatt, 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 313; Concord v. McIntire, 6 N. H. 527. See also Shank v. Cross, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 160.

V. TRESPASS AS TO PERSONS—1. False Imprisonment.—(SEE FALSE IMPRISONMENT, vol. 7, p. 675.)

2. Assault and Battery.—(See ASSAULT, vol. 1, p. 778.)

VI. TRESPASS AS TO PERSONALTY—1. What Constitutes—a. IN GENERAL.—Every unlawful interference by one person with the goods of another is a trespass.¹ An actual and forcible manucaption of goods is not necessary to constitute a trespass, but any exercise or claim of dominion, though by mere words, may warrant an action of trespass.² So a mere levy upon personal property not authorized by law is a trespass, although there has been neither a sale nor a removal.³ And, in the case of an actual taking, it is not necessary to show that the act was done with a

The same doctrine is applicable in trespass as in trover. See TROVER, vol. 26.

License Revoked.—One who interferes with goods which he held under a license which has been revoked, is a trespasser ab initio. A sale of lumber to be taken and measured from a larger bulk, is not complete, as between the parties, until selected and measured; and a mere license, after the contract of sale, for the purchaser to measure and take the lumber, may be revoked; and if he takes the lumber after revocation, he will be a trespasser. Ockington v. Ritchie, 41 N. H. 275.

2. McCombie v. Davies, 6 East 540; Baldwin v. Cole, 6 Mod. 212; Syeds v. Hay, 4 T. R. 260; Price v. Helyar, 4 Bing. 597; Wilson v. Baker, 4 B. & Ald. 614; Miller v. Baker, 1 Met. (Mass.) 27; Reynolds v. Shuler, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 326; Gibbs v. Chase, 10 Mass. 125.

Merely making an inventory and threatening to remove goods, if prevented by giving a receipt for them, is sufficient, though they were not attached by the officer. Winteringham v. Lafoy, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 735. See also Hardy v. Clendening, 25 Ark. 436.

It has been held that trespass was committed against a passenger in unlawfully carrying his baggage beyond the terminus without allowing him time to land the baggage. Holmes v. Doane, 3 Gray (Mass.) 328.

Wrongful Distress.—A party making a distress of animals damage feasant, who fails to comply with the statutory requirements, is a trespasser ab initio. Brewster v. Wilson, 43 Hun (N. Y.) 261.

A landlord who distrains upon goods, knowing them to be the property of another, left with the tenant for sale on commission, is a trespasser ab initio and is liable to the owner of the goods in an action of trespass. Brown v. Stackhouse, 155 Pa. St. 582.

Part Owner in Possession.—The part-owner of goods who is in possession, may recover all the damages resulting from a trespass committed upon the goods by a stranger. Hasbrouck v. Winkler, 48 N. J. L. 431; Luse v. Jones, 39 N. J. L. 707.

3. Robinson v. Mansfield, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 139; Miller v. Baker, 1 Met. (Mass.) 27; Gibbs v. Chase, 10 Mass. 125; Welch v. Bell, 32 Pa. St. 12; Stewart v. Wells, 6 Barb. (N. Y.) 79; Stevens v. Somerimdyke, 4 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 418.

After an officer has obtained access to, and control over, property, with intent to attach the same, the attachment is complete, and if it is wrongful, the owner's right to maintain trespass accrues immediately. Morse v. Hurd, 17 N. H. 246.

In Bayles v. Usher, 4 Moo. & P. 790, a broker distraining, who merely left a memorandum stating that he had seized all the goods on the premises, and put a man nominally in possession, although the tenant was never interrupted for one moment in the free use of his goods, was held liable for the seizure, and damages were recovered.

A private person who, assuming to act as a constable, seizes the property of another, cannot escape liability for wrongful intent, but it is sufficient if it has been done without justifiable cause, though by accident or mistake.¹

b. WRONGFUL LEVY OR ATTACHMENT.—A sheriff or other officer may be liable for a trespass for wrongful levy or attachment, as where goods are seized which are exempt by law;² or trespass by the fact that he then had in his possession an execution against such person lawfully issued. M'Mellen v. Rowe, 15 Neb. 620.

1. Colwell v. Reeves, 2 Camp. 576; Guille v. Swan, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 381; Pearson v. Inlow, 20 Wis. 322; Hazleton v. Week, 49 Wis. 661; Dexter v. Cole, 6 Wis. 320.

In Hobart v. Hagett, 12 Me. 67, an action of trespass was brought for taking an ox belonging to the plaintiff. It was shown that the defendant met the plaintiff in the street and bought of the latter an ox, which the plaintiff directed him to go and take out of his inclosure, and the defendant by mistake took the wrong ox. He was held liable in an action of trespass. The court said: "Taking the plaintiff's ox was a deliberate and voluntary act of the defendant. He might not have intended to commit a trespass in so doing; neither does the officer when, on a precept against A, he takes by mistake the property of B, intend to commit a trespass; nor does he intend to become a trespasser who, believing that he is cutting timber on his own land, by mistaking the line of division cuts timber on his neighbor's land; and yet in both cases the law would hold them as trespassers."

In Guille v. Swan, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 381, Spencer, C. J., said: "The intent with which an act is done is by no means the test of the liability of a party to an action of trespass. If the act cause the immediate injury, whether intentional or unintentional, trespass is the proper action to redress the wrong."

What is essentially a trespass cannot become lawful from having been done with good intention; neither can the manner of doing the thing affect it; if unlawful in its nature, it must continue to be so. Untying and removing a horse from a hitching post standing in the highway, to which he had been hitched by the plaintiff, being the owner, and to the use of which post the plaintiff had, if not an exclusive right, as good a right as defendant, amounts to at least a technical trespass, and is sufficient to warrant the recovery of nominal damages. Burch v. Carter, 32 N. J. L. 554.

Wife's Consent No Defense.—It is no defense to an action of trespass for carrying away personal property from the plaintiff's house, that it was done with the approval, and at the request, of the plaintiff's wife, then living apart from her husband, although some of the property belonged to her before marriage. Schindel v. Schindel, 12 Md. 108.

Parties volunteering to aid one to take away chattels that have been conveyed by a bill of sale which was absolute on its face, but in fact a security for a debt since extinguished, will not be heard to allege ignorance of this fact, but must stand, if at all, upon the justification of the principal. Wallard v. Worthman, 84 Ill. 446.

2. Gibson v. Jenney, 15 Mass. 204; Brown v. Waite, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 470; Foss v. Stewart, 14 Me. 312; Cook v. Baine, 37 Ala. 350; Van Dusen v. King, 34 Pa. St. 201; Wilson v. Ellis, 28 Pa. St. 238; Freeman v. Smith, 30 Pa. St. 264; Perry v. Lewis, 49 Miss. 443; Spencer v. Long, 39 Cal. 700; Tuller v. Sparks, 39 Tex. 136; Elliott v. Whitmore, 3 Mich. 532.

A purchaser from the defendant in execution, of property exempt from levy and sale, may maintain an action against the sheriff for a subsequent levy and sale. Cook v. Baine, 37 Ala. 350.

An officer who seizes all the property of a debtor, knowing that part of it is exempt, cannot justify, by the omission of the debtor to designate the exempt portion. Cantwell v. Connor, 51 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 45; Sullivan v. Farley, 63 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 371; Frost v. Mott, 34 N. Y. 253.

A mere levy upon personal property when it is not authorized by law, is, without either a sale or removal, a trespass. Stewart v. Wells, 6 Barb. (N. Y.) 19; Freeman v. Apple, 39 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 180.

Withdrawal of Consent to Levy.—In Hutchinson v. Campbell, 25 Pa. St. 273, it was held that where a defendant in an execution consented to a levy on articles where the levy or attachment was made upon property of a third person.¹ A valid and lawful act cannot be accomplished by any unlawful means; so an attachment made upon property, the possession of which has been obtained by fraud, renders the parties thereto liable as trespassers.² The officer, however, is not alone liable, but the attorney who ordered, and the plaintiff who by some act or direction connects himself with the wrongful act, are likewise trespassers.³ If the party in whose name and for whose benefit the trespass is committed, with full knowledge of the facts, sanctioned the act and appropriated the proceeds of the trespass, which were exempt, it was competent for him to withdraw such consent before the day of sale, and that the officer selling such articles after notice of such withdrawal was liable to an action for so doing.

Wrongful Sale.—Trespass lies against a sheriff who makes a lawful levy, but sells on only five days' notice. Carrier v. Esbaugh, 70 Pa. St. 239.

1. State v. Conover, 28 N. J. L. 224; Pike v. Colvin, 67 Ill. 227; Boulware v. Craddock, 30 Cal. 190; Markley v. Rand, 12 Cal. 276; Yarborough v. Harper, 25 Miss. 112; Weston v. Dorr, 25 Me. 176; Weber v. Henry, 16 Mich. 399; Freeman v. Apple, 39 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 180; Gillingham v. Clark, 1 Phila. (Pa.) 51.

In an action against a constable for levying on and selling the plaintiff's goods under an execution against a third person, it is no defense, as to unlawful seizure and detention, that the plaintiff subsequently recovered the goods in replevin against the purchaser at the constable's sale. Nagle v. Mullison, 34 Pa. St. 48.

Trespass lies for a wrongful levy, although the sale took place after the commencement of the suit. Graheem v. Lane, 3 Brew. (Pa.) 92.

A return of "attached," when the goods are the property of a third person, renders the sheriff liable in trespass, without a manual seizure. Paxton v. Steckel, 2 Pa. St. 93.

Partnership Property.—If the title of one partner to a moiety of partnership chattels be bad as against an execution creditor, and the title of the firm be good as to the other moiety, the partners may maintain a joint action in trespass against the officer seizing and selling the entire property. Farrel v. Colwell, 30 N. J. L. 123.

2. In Parsons v. Dickinson, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 352, where unlawful means had been used to keep the property of the debtor from passing to the vendee, and to continue its liability to attachment until the next day, and an attachment was thereupon made, it was held that such attachment was ineffectual and that the parties making it were trespassers. See also Ilseley v. Nichols, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 270.

So, in Deyo v. Jennison, 10 Allen (Mass.) 410, where a debtor, who resided in another state, was fraudulently induced by procurement of his creditors to bring into the state property, which by the law of his residence was exempt from attachment, in order that it might be attached, and it was so attached, the attachment was held to be void and both the creditors and the officer who made the attachment were liable as trespassers, although the officer did not know of the fraud and simply obeyed the terms of his precept.

3. Bates v. Pilling, 7 B. & C. 38; 13 E. C. L. 104; McDougold v. Dougherty, 12 Ga. 613; Atkinson v. Gatcher, 23 Ark. 101; Goodyear v. Williston, 42 Cal. 11; Cainfax v. Chapman, 7 Mo. 175; Stewart v. Wells, 6 Barb. (N. Y.) 79; Allen v. Carey, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 349; Newberry v. Lee, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 523; Armstrong v. Dubois, 1 Abb. App. (N. Y.) 11.

An attorney is not liable for a tortious seizure of goods, who merely issues the execution and conveys to the sheriff the instruction of his client to seize the goods in question. Ford v. Williams, 13 N. Y. 577.

In an action of trespass for the unlawful taking of property under attachment, brought against the constable and original plaintiff, wherein they answered jointly, admitting the taking, but denying ownership in the present plaintiff, it was held that the attachment plaintiff would be held to have adopted the taking, and to be jointly liable with the constable. Taylor v. Ryan, 15 Neb. 573.

this is evidence for the jury from which they may infer a previous command or authority.¹ But the law will not presume an authority from the parties to commit a trespass or do an unlawful act, and no liability will attach unless it appear that such party directed or assented to it.²

c. RECEIPT OF GOODS FROM TRESPASSER.—One who innocently purchases or acquires possession of goods taken by a trespasser without his knowledge or subsequent assent, and not for his benefit, is not guilty of a trespass, though he may sell the property;³ but to bring one within this principle, it must appear that he obtained possession of the property by delivery and with-

A receipt by the parties of the proceeds of a sale, in ignorance of the facts, is not a ratification, and they are not affected by knowledge on the part of their attorney, as he has no authority to bind them by directing a trespass, or by ratifying one when committed. Clark v. Woodruff, 83 N. Y. 518. See also Averill v. Williams, 4 Den. (N. Y.) 295.

(N. Y.) 333; Barrett v. Warren, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 348; Talmadge v. Scudder, 36 Pa. St. 517; Hammon v. Fisher, 2 Grant (Pa.) 330; Ward v. Taylor, 1 Pa. St. 238.

In Brooks v. Olmstead, 17 Pa. St. 28, Porter, J., said: "It is, no doubt, true that one who comes to the possession of goods by delivery, and who has been guilty of no fault on his part, although it may turn out that the person who made the delivery to him had no title himself and was a wrongdoer, yet the receiver, guilty of no fault, cannot be treated as a trespasser; for, in such case, he has done no act which aided in depriving the true owner of his property. He, nevertheless, holds the property of the true owner, who may recover in trover, if the receiver of the property has converted it to his own use; or he is liable in replevin. So it may be stated, safely, that he who buys property from a trespasser, without any knowledge whatever of the original trespass, cannot be treated as a trespasser himself, because he has been guilty of no fault, nor assisted in any way in depriving the true owner of his property."

In Bac. Abr., "Trespass" E 3, the rule is thus stated: "If the goods of J. S. are legally taken in execution by a sheriff, and delivered by him to J. N., trespass will not lie against the latter because he obtained the possession of the goods lawfully." So in Day v. Olmstead, Owen 70, it was held that, "If a stranger take my horse or goods and sell it to J. S., and J. S. take it accordingly, no action of trespass lies against him."

In McCarty v. Vickery, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 348, the defendant removed a quantity of wood, which the plaintiff had sold, and although the purchaser had obtained the delivery by fraud, it was held that trespass would not lie against the defendant. In Barrett v. Warren, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 348, Bronson, J., in criticising this case, said: "I am aware that this decision was questioned by Cowen, J., in Carey v. Hotelling, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 313, and if the case, as he assumes, is to be taken as deciding that the owner could not maintain trespass against the fraudulent vendee, then I agree that the decision cannot be supported, but it should be observed that the action was brought against a third person, who had probably acted under the authority of the vendee, and then the case comes within the principle that one, who, without any fault on his part, receives goods from a wrongdoer, cannot be made answerable in trespass; as against him the remedy of the owner is an action of trover, and unless he out any fault on his part;¹ and in the case of a purchaser it is held that if he take the goods without delivery from a trespasser, he is himself a wrongdoer, and liable for trespass.²

2. Property Subject to Trespass.—Everything in which the law recognizes property, may be the subject of trespass.³ A dog is a species of property, for an injury to which an action may be maintained, and it is not necessary to show that he has a pecuniary value.⁴ In general, the action will lie for injuries to all domestic animals,⁵ or wild animals which have been reclaimed.⁶

has sold or otherwise converted the goods, that action will not lie without a demand."

Purchaser at Judicial Sale.—A mere purchaser at a sale by an officer, who receives from him immediate possession, is not responsible in trespass. His purchase does not, of itself, make him a participant in the wrongful seizure, and he is not made a trespasser by relation. Gloss v. Black, 91 Pa. St. 418.

1. Millspaugh v. Mitchell, 8 Barb. (N. Y.) 333; in the absence of such proof, a demand need not be shown. Tallman v. Turck, 26 Barb. (N. Y.) 167. In Pierce v. Van Dyke, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 613, a promissory note had been taken from the pocket of the plaintiff's intestate and delivered to the defendant, an attorney, who claimed that he had received it for collection; but failing to show that he had received it for that purpose, a non-suit, granted in his favor, was set aside. Bronson, J., said: "The burden lies on the purchaser or bailee to show that he came to the possession of the property for a lawful purpose and in good faith. If he knew, or had any reason to believe, that he was dealing with one who acquired the property unlawfully, he may then be treated as a wrongdoer without any demand by the owner. The fact that he is an attorney standing alone proves nothing to the purpose; it is the naked case of a man's receiving goods by delivery from a trespasser without showing why or to what end the delivery was made. I think the owner may treat such a one as a wrongdoer without any prior demand. Trespass or replevin in the cepi would lie."

2. Stanley v. Gaylord, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 136; Hyde v. Noble, 13 N. H. 495.

So, where goods are sold by a carrier, and the purchaser takes them without delivery, it seems that trespass or replevin in the cepi will lie by the owner against the purchaser, although he bought the goods in good faith. Ehle v. Ehle, 5 Comst. (N. Y.) 506.

"If I bail goods to a man, and he gives or sells them to a stranger, and the stranger takes them without delivery, he is a trespasser, and I shall have a writ of trespass against him, for by the gift or sale the property was not changed, but by the taking; but if he make delivery of them to the vendee or donee, then I shall not have a writ." Bac. Abr., "Trespass" E 20; Vin. Abr., "Trespass" M 11.

So, if a bailee of a chattel who has no authority as against the bailor to retain or dispose of the property mortgaged as a security for his own debt, and the mortgagee takes possession under the mortgage, the bailor may maintain trespass against him. Stanley v. Gaylord, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 536.

Sales by an Infant.—So, if an infant gives or sells his goods and delivers them with his own hands, the act is voidable only; but if he gives or sells goods, and the donee or vendee takes them by force of the gift or sale, the act is void, and the infant may bring trespass. Vonda v. Van Horne, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 631.

6. Pursuit alone gives no right of property in animals fera natura, and an action will not lie against a man for killing and taking an animal pursued by and in view of the person who originally found, started or chased it, and was on the point of seizing it. Pierson v. Post, 8 Cai. (N. Y.) 175. One who pursues a deer and wounds it, and follows it until night, and then abandons pursuit until morning, when he resumes it, cannot maintain trespass against one who killed it the night before. Buster v. Newkirk, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 75.

Bees.—Bees are feræ naturæ, but when hived and reclaimed, a person may have a qualified property in them by the law of nature, as well as the civil law. Occupation, that is, hiving or inclosing them, gives property in them. If a swarm fly from the hive of another, his qualified property continues so long as he can keep them in sight, and possesses the power to pursue them, and the owner may bring an action of trespass against the person who cuts down a tree into which the bees have entered on the soil of another, destroys the bees and takes the honey. Goff v. Kilts, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 550. See also Adams v. Burton, 43 Vt. 30; Ferguson v. Miller, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 243.

Oysters.—In Fleet v. Hageman, 14 Wend. (N. Y.) 42, it was held that oysters planted by an individual in a bed clearly designated in a bay or arm of the sea, which is a common fishery, are the property of him who planted them, and that for the taking or destruction by another, trespass will lie. See also Lowndes v. Dickerson, 34 Hun (N. Y.) 586; State v. Taylor, 27 N. J. L. 117. Others cannot impair his title by depositing other oysters in the same place, if the first planter has sufficiently marked and designated his bed. Decker v. Fisher, 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 592. See also OYSTERS, vol. 17, p. 306.

Fish.—In Young v. Hichens, 6 Ad. & El., N. S. 606; 51 E. C. L. 606, it was held that a person who had nearly encompassed a quantity of fish with his net, had no title to them so as to have an action against a party who, by rowing his boat and splashing the water, frightened the fish so that they escaped.

In Van Brunt v. Schenck, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 385, Van Ness, J., said: "For an injury done to a personal chattel, the person who has the general property, provided he is entitled to immediate possession, may support this action, although he has never had actual possession; the general property draws to it the possession so as to enable the owner to maintain trespass, and this rule holds even by relation, as in the case of executors and administrators, who may maintain trespass for an injury done to the goods of their testator or intestate, after his death or before probate or administration; so may a legatee after the executor assented to the legacy, for a trespass committed before such assent."

A commissioned her brother to buy a cow for her, which he did, but before the animal had either passed into A's hands or she had assented to the purchase, the cow was taken by the defendant. It was held that A had such a property in the cow as would entitle her to maintain an action of trespass. Thomas v. Phillips, 7 C. & P. 573.

If the owner of a chattel gratuitously permits another to use it, the owner may maintain trespass for injury done to it while it is so used. Lotan v. Cross, 2 Campb. 464. Trespass lies in favor of the owner for killing a dog which was at the time in the possession of a third person under a loan. White v. Brantley, 37 Ala. 430.

One who cuts and stacks hay on an uninclosed prairie owned by others, without authority, acquires no property in such hay, and, having neither ownership nor possession, cannot maintain an action for its destruction. Murphy v. Sioux City, etc., R. Co., 55 Iowa 473; Tuly v. Tucker, 6 Mo. 583.

An owner of a farm who is the actual owner of personality thereon, may, without having any actual or constructive possession at the time, maintain trespass de bonis asportatis for its wrongful removal from the farm under an execution against a tenant or occupant in a state where the distinction between that action and trespass

The general owner may so part with his right to possession as not to be able to maintain the action,¹ as where he so parts with on the case is abolished. Coe v. English, 6 Houst. (Del.) 456.

When the owner of property permits it to remain in the possession of a third person, and while in his possession it is sold at a sheriff's sale, on an execution against such third person, but the purchaser does not take possession of it, but suffers it to remain there as before, the owner is not divested of his right to the property, nor can the creditor of the purchaser take it under attachment, unless there is fraud. Cilley v. Cushman, 12 Vt. 494.

The real owner of a stock of goods exposed for sale, though only occasionally present himself in his store and conducting his business through clerks and servants, is, in contemplation of law, the actual possessor of the goods, and an action of trespass for seizing them wrongfully must be brought in his name, and not that of such clerks and servants so trusted by him; nor is such a one less owner than the actual possessor because he had bought the goods in the name of another and shipped them in that name, if he paid for them with his own money. Willis v. Hudson, 63 Tex. 678.

One who buys property at an execution sale, which in fact is owned by another person than the judgment debtor, and who does not take possession, acquires no right by which he can maintain trespass against the owner for taking and converting the property to his own use. Austin v. Tilden, 14 Vt. 325.

Where an act authorized the widow of minor children of a decedent to retain property to the value of $300, and the widow of an intestate whose entire property consisted of less than $300, had transferred her interest in the chattel to the children, it was held that the children had sufficient ownership in the property to entitle them to bring trespass against a stranger. Roberts v. Messinger, 134 Pa. St. 298.

In Pennsylvania, an action in the form of trespass may be maintained upon facts showing the cause of action in trespass on the case, or trover, under the act of May 25th, 1887, P. L. 271, abolishing the distinction in such acts so far as procedure is concerned. Duffield v. Rosenz, 144 Pa. St. 520.

One who has goods taken under distress against another, and who refuses to bring replevin therefor, as required by the statute, when requested by the landlord, cannot maintain an action of trespass for the wrongful seizure. Easterly Machine Co. v. Spencer (Pa.), 29 W. N. C. 493.

Possession of Attached Property.—The owner of goods wrongfully attached cannot maintain trespass therefor, where, at the time they were attached, they were not in his possession, but were in the possession of the sheriff, under prior attachments by other of his creditors. Joseph v. Henderson (Ala. 1892), 10 So. Rep. 843.

Action by Widow.—Where the administrator refuses or neglects, upon requests made, to allow the property, claimed to be appraised and set apart for the widow, she cannot maintain trespass, for she has neither a general nor special property in any particular goods after election and appraisal; her remedy is a special action on the case, unless the estate has been sold and converted into money. Neely v. McCormack, 25 Pa. St. 255.

Assignment.—An assignment of chattels by which the right of property passes, draws after it the constructive possession, and the assignee may maintain trespass upon injury thereto. North v. Turner, 9 S. & R. (Pa.) 244; Power v. Geesman, 17 S. & R. (Pa.) 251.

1. Bourne v. Merritt, 22 Vt. 429; Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. (U. S.) 371; Lewis v. Carsan, 15 Pa. St. 31.

When property was sold by a conditional sale and the time of payment for the same by the vendee had not elapsed, and while in possession of the vendee it was attached by one of his creditors, it was held that, although the vendor continued the general owner, yet not having the right of the present possession, he could not maintain trespass for the property against the attaching creditor of the vendee. Hurd v. Fleming, 34 Vt. 171.

If the vendor has parted with the possession he cannot maintain trespass, though the purchaser be insolvent. McCarty v. Vickery, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 348.

Trespass does not lie by the general owner for taking from the pledgee personal property pledged for a debt. Gay v. Smith, 38 N. H. 171.

his possession as to give the bailee a right to use the property.¹ Where one has made a parol lease of personal property for a specified time, he cannot maintain trespass for the taking of the property, if taken during that time, as the property of the lessee.² If a second trespasser takes goods out of the possession of the first trespasser, the owner may maintain an action against such trespasser, the injury being against his possession.³

b. PERSONS HAVING SPECIAL PROPERTY—MORTGAGEES, PLEDGEES, ETC.—One having special property may maintain an action against a stranger and recover the full value of the property;⁴ and bare possession is prima facie sufficient to entitle

Right to Immediate Possession.—If, however, the general owner parting with the custody to a mere bailee, retains the right to immediate possession, he may maintain trespass. Becker v. Smith, 59 Pa. St. 469.

A party having a lien upon goods may transfer the possession subject to the lien of a third person, who may lawfully hold the property until the lien be paid; if the transferee sells the goods, the owner is remitted to his original rights, free from the lien, and may bring trover against him. The owner, however, cannot bring trespass, as the transferee came lawfully into possession by the delivery of the bailee. Nash v. Mosher, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 431.

2. Lunt v. Brown, 13 Me. 236. In Ward v. Macauley, 4 T. R. 480, the plaintiff had let to Lord Mountford a ready furnished house, and the lease contained a schedule of the furniture; pending the lease the defendants seized part of the furniture on execution against Lord Mountford. It was held that trespass did not lie against the defendants, because the plaintiffs had neither possession nor a right of possession at the time.

Upon default, however, the general owner may bring an action of trespass. Horn v. Davis, 155 Pa. St. 57.

3. Wilbraham v. Snow, Sid. 438. The taking of property held by an officer under an attachment against the owners is an unlawful act against the possession of the owner. Cox v. Hall, 18 Vt. 191.

Vendee.—A vendee of goods may recover in trespass, before they are delivered, against one who takes them from the custody of the vendor. North v. Turner, 9 S. & R. (Pa.) 244.

4. Haythorn v. Rushforth, 19 N. J. L. 160; Outcalt v. Durling, 25 N. J. L. 443; Browning v. Skillman, 24 N. J. L. 352; Pool v. Simons, 1 N. H. 289; Harker v. Dement, 9 Gill (Md.) 7.

In Haydon's Case, 6 Coke 69, the rule is thus stated: "He who hath a special property of the goods at a certain time shall have a general action of trespass against him who hath the general property, and upon the evidence, damages shall be mitigated; but clearly the bailee, or he who hath a special property, shall have a general action of trespass against a stranger and shall recover all damages because that he is chargeable over."

Lessee.—The lessee of stock, under a lease to return the same in good condition at its expiration, may maintain an action of trespass for an injury to such stock while in his possession, by a railroad. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Taylor, 57 Ark. 136; St. Louis v. Biggs, 50 Ark. 169.

One who takes up an animal as an estray, may maintain trespass against a wrongdoer, who takes it out of his possession. Hendricks v. Decker, 35 Barb. (N. Y.) 298.

Custodian of Property.—When one is in possession of property, under such an arrangement that he is accountable for it or for any injury to it in any event, such person may sue to recover for any loss or injury done the property while in his possession. In such a case the person in possession is treated as the owner, and is entitled to all the rights of the owner. Welty v. Indianapolis, etc., R. Co., 105 Ind. 55; *New York, etc., R. Co. v. Mere peaceable possession will support the action as against one who disturbs the possession without right. Warner v. Capps, 37 Ark. 32. Bare possession is itself sufficient title against all the world except the true owner. Potter v. Washburn, 13 Vt. 564.

Actual possession, though without the consent of the real owner, when even adverse to him, will be sufficient as against the wrongdoer, or one who can show no better title. Miller v. Kirby, 74 Ill. 242; Hurd v. West, 7 Cow (N. Y.) 752.

Immediate right to the possession is sufficient against one who takes or injures property tortiously. Hare v. Fuller, 7 Ala. 717; Davis v. Young, 20 Ala. 151.

One who has possession of a cow, title to which is in his wife, may maintain trespass against one who shot it. Taylor v. Hayes, 63 Vt. 475.

Although the plaintiff has not title to the property, if lawfully in possession he may maintain the action. So where the owner of goods assigns and delivers them to another person as security for the payment of a debt by a valid assignment, and the assignee makes an assignment of them to the plaintiff, by an instrument which is void as against the provisions of the statute in that state, and delivers them over to the plaintiff, with the assent of the original owner, the plaintiff may maintain an action of trespass against one who takes them without right. Barker v. Chase, 24 Me. 230.

Possession under an equitable title is sufficient to maintain trespass. McCurdy v. Potts, 2 Dall. (Pa.) 98.

Where the property is owned by the state, which, it has declared, it holds for the common benefit of all its citizens, one citizen cannot obtain possession, so as to exclude another. La. Land, etc., Co. v. Gasquet (La.), 13 So. Rep. 171.

Possession of agent is that of his principal, for the purpose of enabling the latter to maintain trespass. Gillett v. Ball, 9 Pa. St. 13.

2. See Murphy v. Sioux City, etc., R. Co., 55 Iowa 473.

In Turley v. Tucker, 6 Mo. 583, in delivering the opinion of the court, Napton, J., said: "To maintain this action, plaintiff must have a property, either absolute or special, and the possession or right to immediate possession of the goods which are the subject of controversy. There is no pretense that plaintiff had the absolute. . . . had he such a special property as will enable him to maintain an action of trover? The cases of special property, referred to by the authorities in the illustration of the maxim that mere possession is sufficient prima facie evidence of property to maintain an action against a wrongdoer, are those of a bailee, a carrier, a lessee for life, a lord who seizes an estray, a sheriff who levies on goods, and the finder of a jewel. In all these cases, and every other instance of special property, the possession has been peaceable and lawful possession, or a possession acquired by some show of title from the absolute owner. Did plaintiff, by cutting the timber on government land, acquire such possession? There is no case of a mere trespasser acquiring by his trespass such constructive possession. It seems to be contrary to settled usage of law for courts to interfere in such cases, and aid one trespasser against another. For the peace of society the law will interfere so far as to protect actual possession, but will not raise a presumptive possession as the foundation of a special property."

The mortgagee of personal property, who has the right to take possession whenever he deems himself in danger of losing the mortgage debt, cannot sustain trespass, unless the contingency on which his right to the possession was to accrue has happened, followed or the right to immediate possession,¹ or by a pledgee,² or a naked bailee.³ The second mortgagee in possession, though the prior mortgage is unsatisfied and the legal title is in the first mortgagee, by some act on his part asserting such right. Skiff v. Solace, 23 Vt. 279.

Where, under a mortgage, the mortgagee is authorized to take possession and sell the property, should the mortgagor fail to pay the indebtedness at the time and in the manner provided, or should sell or attempt to sell the property or any part thereof, or should move the same beyond the limits of the county, or should the property be levied on or taken possession of by any other person, the right to immediate possession is simultaneous with the levy, and the moment the right of possession accrues by reason of a levy, the mortgagee may maintain trespass if the levy is forcible and unlawful, being regarded as having constructive possession. Dunlap v. Steele, 80 Ala. 484; Nelson v. Bondurant, 26 Ala. 441; Welch v. Whitmore, 25 Me. 26.

In the absence of any stipulation that the possession shall remain with the mortgagor, the right of possession follows as an incident to the right of property, and the possession of the mortgagor is the possession of the mortgagee. Boise v. Knox, 10 Met. (Mass.) 43.

"Though a mere servant has not such a special property as will enable him to maintain trover, yet a bailee or trustee or other person who is responsible to his principal may maintain an action, and lawful possession is prima facie evidence of property." Faulkland v. Brown, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 63.

A shopkeeper who has the possession of goods sent to him on sale or return, may maintain trespass for the injury in his own name. Colwell v. Reeves, 2 Campb. 575.

Even a gratuitous bailee may maintain trespass against a wrongdoer. Rooth v. Wilson, 1 B. & Ald. 59.

An expressman who is in possession of goods for the purpose of moving them for the owner, may maintain trespass against one who wrongfully seizes them. Matthews v. Smith's Exp. Co., (Co. Ct.) 23 N. Y. Supp. 132.

"This distinction was formerly taken, namely: that if goods which have been delivered generally to a man to be kept, are taken from him by a stranger, the bailee may maintain an action of trespass, because he is answerable for the goods to the owner; but that if goods, which have been delivered to a man to be kept as he keeps his own, are taken by a stranger, the bailee cannot maintain this action; because he is not answerable for the goods to the owner. But in a modern case, in which Southcote's Case (4 Rep. 84), and all the old cases were considered, this distinction is exploded. It is in this case laid down, that the bailee of goods which have been delivered to be kept, is not, although the delivery is general, answerable to the owner for the goods, unless they were lost or injured by neglect or default of the bailee; for that it would be very unreasonable to make a man, who receives no benefit from keeping the goods of another, answerable for the taking or injuring thereof, unless he has been guilty of neglect or default. It seems to follow from this case, that the bailee of goods, when delivered generally to be kept, cannot maintain an action of trespass for the taking or injuring of them by a stranger." Bac. Abr. "Trespass," C.

Action by Bailor or Bailee.—Unless the bailee has an absolute right to retain the possession of the property for a definite time, trespass may be brought against the wrongdoer for the property either in the name of the bailee or bailor. Strong v. Adams, 30 Vt. 221. See also Overby v. McGee, 15 Ark. 459.

Fixtures.—Where an auctioneer was put into possession of goods attached to the freehold for the purpose of selling them, the purchaser being bound to detach and remove them, it was held that may maintain trespass against a stranger.¹ The action may be maintained by an administrator or an executor for an injury done to the property of the deceased after his death;² and by an executor de son tort, who has not obtained probate at the time of trial.³

The finder of an article may maintain the action against anyone save the true owner.⁴

c. PUBLIC OFFICERS.—Trespass may be maintained by a sheriff, or other officer who holds goods under legal process, when such goods are taken from him or injured while in his possession.⁵ The action, however, will not lie if the levy be void;⁶ or if the officer has so parted with his goods as not to be entitled to immediate possession.⁷ The possession of a receptor, however, is the

Where a sheriff seizes goods of one person upon process against another, and the real owner rescues them, he may, in an action by the sheriff, show his right and defeat the action. Merritt v. Miller, 13 Vt. 417. But see Wudensaul v. Reynolds, 49 Pa. St. 73. 7. Blade v. Arundal, 1 Maule & S. 711, where a sheriff, after making a levy on personal property, left the property in the possession of two other persons than the defendant in the execution, taking from them a paper under seal, by which they acknowledged the receipt of the property from the sheriff, and agreed to deliver it at a certain time and place specified, it was held that trespass would not lie by the sheriff against the defendant for taking away the property levied on before the time of delivery had expired, because till its expiration he was not entitled to the possession of the property. Lewis v. Parsons, 15 Pa. St. 31.

In Taintor v. Williams, 7 Conn. 271, where an officer, by attachment, on the 8th of May, took the goods of A, in that part of the house which A occupied, and, without removing them, put them into the custody of B; on the next day, C, who lived in another part of the same house, at the request of the officer, took the goods into his charge, and had the custody of them until the 10th; from that time till the 12th, they remained in A's part of the house under the particular charge of no one; on the 12th the officer removed them into C's part of the house, and put them into his possession, but he immediately afterwards bade the officer take them away, declaring that he wished to have nothing to do with them; there they remained, though not in C's custody, until the 14th, when they were taken and carried away by a stranger, it was held, in an action of trespass de bonis aspor- possession of the sheriff, and his special property necessary to maintain the action continues.¹

VII. REMEDIES—1. Trespass; Case; Trover.—Sometimes either case or trespass may be brought, and frequently trespass and trover are concurrent remedies.²

2. Trespass.—The action, generally called "trespass," sometimes regulated by statute, may be brought for a great variety of injuries either to the person or property.³

tatis brought by the officer against such stranger, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

1. Hanchett v. Ives, 33 Ill. App. 471.

Where goods attached by a deputy of the sheriff, are deposited in the hands of a keeper, to be forthcoming on demand, the sheriff has a special property in them, and may maintain an action for them, against the keeper for the benefit of the attaching creditor. Baker v. Fuller, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 318.

3. Case or Trespass.—Either trespass or case will lie against an officer for selling a defendant's goods under an execution, in disregard of his claim for the benefit of the exemption law. They are concurrent remedies. Van Dresor v. King, 34 Pa. St. 201; 75 Am. Dec. 643.

Where the direct cause of an injury was the act of the defendant, but unintentionally and through negligence on his part, either trespass or case may be maintained. Johnson v. Castleman, 2 Dana (Ky.) 377. But see Case v. Mark, 2 Ohio 169. See TRESPASS ON THE CASE, vol. 26.

Trespass or Trover.—Sanders v. Vance, 7 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 209.

A person is liable in trover for killing swine which have broken through his inclosures, the fence viewers having found such inclosures sufficient, and which he has impounded; but if the swine when killed were not in the pound, but at large and trespassing on his land, he is liable only in trespass, the act abolishing the distinction between case and trespass not going so far as to allow either trespass or trover to lie in the latter case. Cannon v. Horsey, 1 Houst. (Del.) 440; Conrad v. Pacific Ins. Co., 6 Pet. (U. S.) 262; Phillips v. Hall, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 610; 24 Am. Dec. 108; Hayden v. Shed, 11 Mass. 500; *Prince v. 3. Trespass Quare Clausum Fregit.—The action of quare clausum fregit is the remedy made use of for a violent or forcible injury to the real property.¹ The close or parcel of land trespassed must be described either by ancient names, abutments, or, generally council. Gay v. Bradstreet, 49 Me. 580; 77 Am. Dec. 272.

Not against sheriff for lawful acts. Farmers' Bank v. McKinney, 7 Watts (Pa.) 214.

Not where adequate and full remedy already pursued. Parker v. Hall, 55 Me. 362.

Not against tenant in possession. Brown v. Carter, 52 Mo. 46.

Not for killing wild animals. Piereson v. Post, 3 Cal. (N. Y.) 175; 2 Am. Dec. 264.

Not where consent has waived. Hogwood v. Edwards, Phil. (N. Car.) 350.

It will not lie for milk sold and delivered. Weisberger v. White, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 224. Nor by the owner of the fee in a highway against a railway company for committing acts of trespass thereon while constructing the approaches of a bridge, the acts merely being against the possession and not against the fee. Fitch v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 59 Conn. 414. Nor where the injury is occasioned by the execution of a regular process of a court of competent jurisdiction. Lowry v. Hatley, 30 Ill. App. 297. Nor where entry upon land is by virtue of a valid execution. Bergeron v. Dartmouth Savings' Bank, 62 N. H. 655.

One may take his property from the possession of a wrongful holder, if he can do so without a breach of the peace. Harding v. Sandy, 43 Ill. App. 442. But one is not justified in breaking the close of another and taking the lands in his possession under claim of right, although he is the lawful owner. Salisbury v. Green, 17 R. I. 758.

One summoned by a marshal to appraise goods is not liable to the owner for a trespass—he is bound to obey. Thrallkill v. Dally, 16 Neb. 114.

Trover Instead of Trespass.—Where a party became possessed of the wagon of another, and changed part of its appendages, and the owner then repossessed himself of it, without knowledge of the changes, it was held that trespass would not lie against him for the substituted article. Trover is the proper remedy, if any. Parker v. Walrod, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 296; 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 514; 30 Am. Dec. 124.

The bona fide purchaser of goods wrongfully taken from the owner, is not answerable to the owner in trespass, but only in trover or replevin in the detinet, after demand. Barrett v. Warren, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 348.

1. Definition.—Walker's Am. Law (8th ed.), p. 593. Trespass quare clausum lies for every unlawful intrusion, whether the land is inclosed or not, though only the grass is trodden. Dougherty v. Stepp, 1 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 371.

Trespass quare clausum will not lie for breaking and entering a wooden "tent" or other property not real estate. Burleigh v. Ford, 59 N. H. 536.

The entering upon real estate, and severing a part therefrom and carrying it away, by one continuous act, can be recovered for, by the tenant, only by an action of trespass quare clausum. Sturgis v. Warren, 11 Vt. 433; Haskin v. Record, 32 Vt. 575.

Proof of cutting and removing wood is sufficient. Maxwell v. Maxwell, 31 Me. 184; 50 Am. Dec. 657; Oswalt v. Smith (Ala.), 12 So. Rep. 109; so building, Russell v. Brown, 63 Me. 203; so permitting hogs to damage, Morrison v. Mitchell, 4 Houst. (Del.) 324.

An action for forcibly entering upon land owned and possessed by the plaintiff, and tearing down a dwelling house and out-buildings and carrying away the materials of which they were built, and for digging up and carrying away fruit trees, is quare clausum fregit. Uttendorffer v. Saegers, 50 Cal. 496; not for consequential injuries. Richardson v. Milburn, 11 Md. 340. The working of quarries and blasting of rocks, whereby large quantities of rocks and stones were thrown upon the dwelling house and premises of the plaintiff, breaking the doors, windows, etc., is a case for an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, and not for an action on the case, Scott v. Bay, 3 Md. 431; action survives, McCallion v. Gegan, 1 Pa. Leg. Gaz. Rep. 414; force is necessary, Pearson v. Smith, Cam. & N. (N. Car.) 376; act must be unlawful, Munson v. Mallory, 36 Conn. 165; 4 Am. Rep. 52.

Trespass quare clausum does not lie for being prevented from using the water of a well on the land of the de-

in the United States, by lines and distances, any mistake being fatal.¹ The gist of the action is the disturbance of possession.² The action can be brought by³ or against a corporation aggregate.⁴

4. Trespass for Meane Profits.—This form of action is supplemental to an action of ejectment, brought against the tenant in possession to recover the profits which he has unlawfully received during the time of his occupation.⁵ The plaintiff is only entitled to it after judgment in ejectment.⁶ The right of recovery is based on four things: first, title to, or possession of premises; second, expulsion of plaintiff; third, reception of rents or profits by defendant; fourth, re-entry by plaintiff.⁷ A judgment in ejectment is conclusive as to possession of defendant at service of writ, but not defendant, but which the plaintiff had the right to use; the proper remedy is case. Shafer v. Smith, 7 Har. & J. (Md.) 67.

If a party claiming to be landlord enter upon the premises occupied by his alleged tenant, under valid legal process, the tenant cannot maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit; his remedy is on the case for suing out the process maliciously. Melson v. Dickson, 63 Ga. 682; 36 Am. Rep. 128.

Trespass quare clausum fregit, will not lie in favor of one who has a right of way across a proprietor's land against another, for using the way under permission of the proprietor. Morgan v. Boyes, 65 Me. 124. But it will in favor of a mortgagee having a right to cut grass from the mortgaged premises and apply the proceeds to the discharge of the debt, against a stranger cutting grass, Burley v. Pike, 62 N. H. 495; or the lessee of a pond with a right to cut ice, against a stranger encroaching on his right. Richards v. Gauffret, 145 Mass. 486.

In cases of disseisin, the owner may maintain trespass if the entry was made while he was himself in possession. Scheffel v. Weller, 41 Ill. App. 85.

In Rogers v. Duhart, 97 Cal. 500, it was held that although plaintiff could not maintain trespass quare clausum for want of possession, yet as under the California Code technical forms of action are discarded, the allegation of possession was immaterial and might be treated as surplusage.

If the plaintiff negatives possession in his pleadings, he cannot recover. Moon v. Avery, 42 Minn. 405.

As to what is sufficient evidence of possession to enable an alleged owner to maintain trespass, see Odd Fellows' Savings Bank v. Turman (Cal. 1892), 30 Pac. Rep. 966.

Trespass quare clausum fregit lies, however temporary plaintiff's interest may be, even though it be merely in the profits of the soil as vesture terra, etc., if it be in exclusion of others. Plaintiff brought an action against defendant for breaking into his close and destroying the crops. The evidence showed that the title to the lands entered was in plaintiff's wife. Plaintiff's witnesses testified that the crops injured were plaintiff's. It was held sufficient to sustain a finding in favor of plaintiff. Stevens v. Adams, 1 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 587.

4. Trespass quare clausum fregit will lie against a railroad company or other private corporation. Main v. North-Eastern R. Co., 12 Rich. (S. Car.) 82; Riddle v. Proprietor, 7 Mass. 169; 5 Am. Dec. 35. And see CORPORATIONS, vol. 4, p. 250.

It cannot be maintained by the lessor against the mortgagee making formal after.¹ After recovery by default in ejectment, the defendant is precluded from setting up any defense that might have been done in the original action, as that he was not in possession.² The trespasser cannot recover the whole value of improvements made while in possession; but if made in good faith, he may offset them to the extent of rent and profits.³

5. Forcible Entry and Detainer.—(See FORCIBLE ENTRY, vol. 8, p. 101.)

6. Trespass Vi et Armis.—This is the form of action which lies to recover damages for an injury which is the immediate consequence of a forcible wrongful act done to the person or personal property.⁴ It will lie in a great variety of cases.⁵

7. Criminal Trespass.—(See FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER, vol. 8, p. 101).—Usually there is a criminal action for trespass, by statute in the several states, where certain circumstances connected entry upon the premises in possession of a tenant in order to foreclose his mortgage, unless he shows actual possession, or a reception of the rents and profits, or an ouster himself by defendant, notwithstanding the mortgage is invalid. Baker v. Kimball, 140 Mass. 120.

4. Definition.—Bouvier L. Dict., vol. 2, p. 748.

Trespass vi et armis lies if the injury be immediate and direct, but if it be consequential, the action will be trespass on the case. Trespass on the case lies for a violent and immediate injury, unless willful, if occasioned by the carelessness or negligence of the defendant. Jordan v. Wyatt, 4 Gratt. (Va.) 151; 47 Am. Dec. 720. Plaintiff had wood on defendant's land. Defendant set fire to some rubbish on another part of the land. The fire escaped him and unintentionally burned plaintiff's wood. It was held that trespass vi et armis would lie against the defendant for the injury.

Trespass for direct injury. Where an act not willful, but the result of negligence, is the immediate and direct cause of an injury, trespass vi et armis will lie. Accordingly, where a belligerent cruiser chased a neutral, supposing her to be an enemy, and through negligence ran her down in the night and sunk her, trespass vi et armis will lie for the damages sustained. Percival v. Hickey, 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 257; 9 Am. Dec. 210.

5. The following instances will serve to illustrate when an action of trespass vi et armis will lie: It will lie for chasing the plaintiff's horse with dogs, and causing her to run upon a stake, so that she died. James v. Caldwell, 7 Yerg. (Tenn.) 38. See Scott v. Shepherd, 2 Wil. 403, a similar case.

"The place or premises sometimes known and called as the little place" is a sufficient description. Watson v. State, 63 Ala. 19. An action for pursuing with dogs and killing a hog. Thompson v. State, 67 Ala. 106; 42 Am. Rep. 101. "For willfully and maliciously cutting timber on another's land." Pippen v. State, 77 Ala. 81. "Premises" means an inclosed pasture a mile from the dwelling house. Sandy v. State, 60 Ala. 18. For opening a road on another's premises without sufficient necessity, prosecution must be undertaken by owner. Bellinger v. State, 92 Ala. 86. Since Alabama Code, 1886, § 3861, interdicts and punishes the taking for temporary use, or using temporarily, of another's animal or vehicle, without the owner's consent, and prescribes no other element of the misdemeanor, an instruction, or indictment for such offense, to acquit if there was no wrongful intent coupled with the wrongful act, is properly refused. Bellinger v. State, 92 Ala. 86.

Arkansas.—Malicious mischief includes all malicious physical injuries to the rights of another which impair utility or materially diminish value, and is an indictable offense under the common law of this country. State v. Watts, 48 Ark. 56.

The Arkansas Act of 1838 (Mansfield's Digest, section 1658), making it a misdemeanor to carry away wood or timber from the owner's ground, is not repealed by Arkansas Act of March 18th, 1883 (Mansfield's Digest, § 1659). State v. Malone, 46 Ark. 140.

An indictment for trespass upon a sixteenth section of land, appropriated to the use of common schools, need not have the name of the prosecutor indorsed thereon, in Arkansas; this is required only in case of trespass on private property. State v. Brown, 10 Ark. 104.

Connecticut.—Knowledge that the act was unlawful is immaterial. Gen. St. Conn., § 1454, provides that every person who shall enter upon the inclosed land of another, without the permission of the owner thereof, for the purpose of fishing, etc., shall be fined. It was held in a prosecution by a grand juror for a violation of such statute, that the knowledge of defendant that his act was unlawful is immaterial, and evidence thereof will be excluded.

In a prosecution for entering on the inclosed land of another without the owner's permission, for the purpose of fishing, evidence that signs forbidding fishing had been posted upon adjoining land by a fishing club, which had no control thereof, introduced to show that defendant believed the signs upon the land in question to be also invalid, was immaterial.

The fact that the complaint was not prosecuted by the owner of the land on which the alleged offense occurred, is immaterial. State v. Turner, 60 Conn. 222.

Georgia.—One may be guilty, criminally, of malicious mischief in wantonly destroying crops on land over which defendant is authorized to open a way, if he uses his right maliciously. Harris v. State, 73 Ga. 41.

An indictment for malicious mischief, held defective for not naming the day and month when the offense was committed. Bailey v. State, 65 Ga. 410.

One cannot be accused criminally of taking and carrying away cotton without consent of owner, as a criminal trespass, as to that cotton of which he has the rightful possession, and in which he has a beneficial interest. Padgett v. State, 81 Ga. 466.

Indiana.—Carrying off and converting property of another is not malicious trespass. State v. Cole, 90 Ind. 112. Entry without license is not indictable. Arbuckle v. State, 32 Ind. 34. One not guilty of criminal trespass, if in possession by virtue of a contract obtained through fraud, Arbuckle v. State, 32 Ind. 34, must allege kind and character of injury done. Brown v. State, 76 Ind. 85. A dog held to be property that may be the subject of malicious trespass. Kinsman v. State, 77 Ind. 132. One not guilty for removing fence of another in good faith which obstructs a road he has been using. Palmer v. State, 45 Ind. 388. For hunting with fire-arms on land of another without consent. Winlock v. State, 121 Ind. 531. Requisites for allegation and proof. Squires v. State, 59 Ind. 261. See also Hughes v. State, 103 Ind. 344; Sample v. State, 104 Ind. 289; State v. Burns, 123 Ind. 427; State v. McKee, 109 Ind. 497; Beggs v. State, 122 Ind. 54; State v. Blackwell, 3 Ind. 529; Boswell v. State, 8 Ind. 499; State v. Pitzer, 62 Ind. 362; State v. Sparks, 60 Ind. 298; Lossen v. State, 62 Ind. 437.

Iowa.—An indictment for trespass on real estate, charging that defendant, at a time stated, wrongfully cut down trees growing upon certain tracts of land described, which were in different sections, and which were not contiguous, is not bad for duplicity.

An indictment charging that defendant did "wrongfully . . . cut down . . . and then and there carry . . . and haul away" certain trees, does not charge two offenses, under Iowa Code, § 3983, which provides: "If any person commits any trespass by cutting down or destroying any timber or wood standing or growing upon the land of another, or by carrying away any timber or wood being on such land, . . . he shall be punished," etc. State v. Paul, 81 Iowa 596.

Kentucky.—A claimant of land who, aided by others, enters against the will of the owner in possession, and in violent and abusive language announces his intention to hold possession, commits a breach of the peace. Both his entry and his holding are forcible. Johnson v. Clem, 82 Ky. 84.

Kansas.—Where a person acting in good faith, and with reasonable prudence, cuts down a tree growing on the land of another, he is not liable to a criminal prosecution under Kansas Comp. L. (1879), ch. 113. Wagstaff v. Schippel, 27 Can. 450.

An information for a trespass on school lands, under Kansas laws (1876) 287, ch. 122, § 26, must aver the amount or value of the damage done; for, without this, the fine of "double the amount of damage proved" cannot be computed. State v. Grewell, 19 Kan. 189.

A complaint under Kansas Comp. L. (1879), ch. 31, § 107, for maliciously severing growing corn from a freehold, must allege that the owner of the corn had some possessory right in the land. State v. Haney, 32 Kan. 428.

Either or both the criminal prosecution and the civil action allowed by Kansas Gen. Stat. 1096, ch. 113, § 2, for a trespass, may be prosecuted by the injured party, but the two cannot be united in one proceeding. Manville v. Felter, 19 Kan. 253.

The provision of the Kansas Laws of 1862, ch. 208, which punishes any person who shall cut down or carry away any tree growing for use, "or any timber, rails, or wood, standing, being, or growing on the land of any other person," embraces the wrongful cutting and carrying away of any kind of trees of value from the land of another. Simpson v. Woodward, 5 Kan. 571.

Louisiana.—A trespasser convicted and sentenced to fine and imprisonment, cannot claim indemnification from one at whose instigation, or by whose misrepresentations, he had been induced to commit the trespass. Landreaux v. Marsoudet, 4 La. Ann. 335.

On an indictment for cutting timber from the land of another, it is error to refuse a charge that, in order to convict, it must be proved that the act was done knowingly and willfully, and not through mistake or inadvertence. State v. Prince, 42 La. Ann. 817.

Missouri.—In Missouri, a prosecutor is not necessary on an indictment for a trespass to school lands. A prosecutor is only necessary in case of trespasses to private property. State v. Roberts, 11 Mo. 510.

Under the Missouri statute making it an offense to cut timber on land not one's own, there can be no conviction without proof of a criminal intent. One believing himself to have a right to cut cannot be punished. State v. Kempf, 26 Mo. 429.

An information, charging the defendant with having wantonly cut down the hedge of another, is not sustained by proof that he cut the hedge properly as an act of husbandry, believing it to be on his own land. State v. Zinn, 26 Mo. App. 17.

Where a trespasser acts simply upon a mistaken view of his rights, and not from wantonness or other evil intent, he is not amenable to a statute punishing criminally a party guilty of malicious trespass. State v. Newkirk, 49 Mo. 84.

Mississippi.—If a party intending to cut timber on public land, through mistake cuts timber on the land of another person, he is liable under the statute. Perkins v. Hackleman, 26 Miss. 41; 59 Am. Dec. 243.

Under the Mississippi statute, neither the title nor the right to possession is involved. Nor is defendant's honest belief that he had a right to enter on the land a defense. Knight v. State, 64 Miss. 802.

A person who has occupied land, merely by permission of the owner, without pretense of title thereto, and who has abandoned the actual occupancy and gone elsewhere, intending to return at some indefinite time, though he has "posted" the place before leaving, has not such possession as will bring a person entering upon the land within Mississippi Code, § 2980, which makes a person liable to a fine for going upon the land of another without his consent. Hester v. State, 67 Miss. 129.

Michigan.—The complaint under How. Michigan St., § 9174, is sufficient in charging the intent of the entry in the words of the statute, without averring such intent to have been malicious. People v. O'Brien, 60 Mich. 8.

As the statute aforesaid applies to trespasses on "improved land," it cannot be construed to apply to lands within the limits of a highway.

New York.—An indictment, charging that the defendant, "with force and arms, unlawfully, willfully and maliciously, did break in pieces and destroy two windows in the dwelling house of A, to the great damage of A, and against the peace," etc., does not set forth any offense indictable, the act charged being merely a private trespass. Kilpatrick v. People, 5 Den. (N. Y.) 277.

Under the statute which gives the court of special sessions jurisdiction over "malicious trespass on lands, trees or timber," a warrant issued out of that court charging defendant with having committed "malicious trespass" on designated land is sufficient, without stating the circumstances of the offense. People v. Upton (Supreme Ct.), 9 N. Y. Supp. 684.

An indictment under the statute providing that any person guilty of using any force or violence in entering upon the possessions of another, except in the cases and the manner allowed by law, is guilty of a misdemeanor, need not specify the particular force or evidence used. People v. Farrell (Supreme Ct.), 8 N. Y. Supp. 230.

New York Penal Code, section 467, makes it an indictable offense to intrude on land without authority. It was held on the trial of an indictment, that evidence that defendant entered under legal advice was properly excluded, the facts making it apparent that there was no color of right of entry. People v. Stevens, 109 N. Y. 159.

Under that statute, providing a penalty for willfully severing from the freehold of another anything attached thereto, it is not necessary to show malice, but it is sufficient to show that the act was done intentionally with design. Anderson v. How, 116 N. Y. 336.

North Carolina.—There must be such a demonstration of force as is calculated to intimidate. State v. Covington, 70 N. Car. 71. Entry under void warrant constitutes forcible trespass. State v. Yarborough, 70 N. Car. 250; Atlantic, etc., R. Co. v. Johnston, 70 N. Car. 348. Compare Perry v. Tupper, 70 N. Car. 538.

Shouting, cursing, and using violent and menacing language in the highway in front of prosecutor's house is sufficient. State v. Widenhouse, 71 N. Car. 279.

In forcible trespass, the offense must have been committed in the presence of the owner. State v. Love, 2 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 267; State v. Mills, 2 Dev. (N. Car.) 420; State v. Fort, 4 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 192; State v. Bennett, 4 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 43.

Threats and a show of guns and pistols and an array of numbers, by which one is driven out of the house, give the latter the action. State v. Smith, 100 N. Car. 466; State v. Lyle, 100 N. Car. 497; State v. Tolever, 5 Ired. (N. Car.) 452.

Actual force must be used. State v. Armfield, 5 Ired. (N. Car.) 207; State v. Ray, 10 Ired. (N. Car.) 39; State v. King, 74 N. Car. 177; State v. Lloyd, 85 N. Car. 573. But see State v. Fisher, 1 Dev. (N. Car.) 504; State v. Drake, 1 Winst. (N. Car.) 241.

Intentionally and willfully injuring personal property includes an injury to stock unlawfully running at large. State v. Brigman, 94 N. Car. 888.

To constitute forcible trespass there must be a breach of the peace. State v. Jacobs, 94 N. Car. 950.

Forcible trespass is the high-handed invasion of actual possession of another. State v. Laney, 87 N. Car. 535. In forcible trespass, it was shown that defendant rode into the yard of prosecutrix after being forbidden by her, and asked where her husband was; she ordered him off; but he remained cursing her and her husband; she told him the second time to leave, and that, if he did not, she would call A., when defendant left. It was held that the facts showed a case of forcible trespass. State v. Hinson, 83 N. Car. 640.

Entry without license, after being forbidden, does not include the case of the servant of a bona fide claimant, who enters at his master's commands. State v. Winslow, 95 N. Car. 649; State v. Mace, 65 N. Car. 345. Mere entry on land after being forbidden, without a display of weapons or threats of violence, and without doing or saying anything which should intimidate a man of ordinary firmness, does not amount to forcible trespass. State v. Mills, 104 N. Car. 905.

On an indictment under the statute for going or entering on land after being forbidden, and without a license, defendant may show that he went on the land in good faith, claiming or having title thereto; but such defense will not avail unless he show reasonable ground for a belief that his claim was well founded. State v. Crawley, 103 N. Car. 353.

Breaking the outer door to levy an attachment is forcible trespass. State v. Whitaker, 107 N. Car. 802.

See also State v. Barefoot, 89 N. Car. 565; State v. Hause, 71 N. Car. 518; State v. Tolever, 5 Ired. (N. Car.) 452; State v. Armfield, 5 Ired. (N. Car.) 207; White v. Fort, 3 Hawks (N. Car.) 251; State v. Hemphill, 4 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 109; State v. Bogue, 9 Ired. (N. Car.) 360; State v. Walker, 10 Ired. (N. Car.) 234; State v. Talbot, 97 N. Car. 494.

Pennsylvania.—An entry into a building under a claim of right, without violence and a strong hand, or other circumstances of terror, cannot be made the subject of a criminal prosecution. Thompson v. Com., 116 Pa. St. 155; Hoffman v. Com., 123 Pa. St. 75. An indictment cannot be supported against an individual, for being in the frequent practice of going to the house of another, and grossly abusing his family, thereby rendering their lives uncomfortable, this being a mere civil injury. Nor is it an offense for which the party may be held to surety of the peace. Com. v. Edwards, 1 Ashm. (Pa.) 46.

Rhode Island.—The statute providing for the punishment of "every person who shall be convicted of taking and carrying away, without the consent of the owner thereof," any growing fruit, etc., although not containing the word "wantonly" or "maliciously," does not apply to taking openly, under a fair claim of right; and the question of the good faith of the accused therein is for the jury. State v. Luther, 8 R. I. 151.

South Carolina.—A's verbal permission to B to plant a patch of turnips in A's field, without consideration or specification of the portion thereof, does not give to B such possession as to support an indictment for malicious trespass against A for destroying B's growing turnips. State v. Gadsden, 20 S. Car. 456.

Trespass to the person is indictable, but trespass to goods and chattels is not. Hence, to stop one's carriage forcibly, without intention to do bodily harm, is not an indictable assault. In such a case, the jury should be instructed to find the defendant guilty or not, according as they should decide that he intended to do an injury to the person of the prosecutor or not. State v. Edge, 1 Strobb. (S. Car.) 91.

The South Carolina Act declaring that "Every entry on the inclosed or uninclosed lands of another, after notice from the owner or tenant, prohibiting the same, shall be deemed a misdemeanor," was not directed only against those who have entered claiming title. The language of the act is used in its ordinary acceptation. State v. Cockfield, 15 Rich. (S. Car.) 53.

South Carolina Gen. St., § 2507, makes it a misdemeanor to enter on land after notice from the owner or tenant. One put into possession by the owner cannot be convicted on proof of notice from one whose rights were equitable, and which might or might not have been enforced in a suit for specific performance. State v. Mays, 24 S. Car. 190.

Texas.—Knowingly cutting timber on land of another is trespass. State v. Arnold, 39 Tex. 74.

To constitute malicious mischief,

8. Trespass De Bonis Asportatis.—This action lies for goods that have been carried away.¹ It is brought to recover damages for the goods as carried away; trover and replevin are generally concurrent remedies.²

VIII. PLEADING—1. Declaration.—(See DECLARATION, vol. 5, p. 349.)

a. THE ALLEGATIONS.—The declaration, petition, or summons is the statement of the plaintiff's cause of action, and should con-under the Texas statute, the articles injured and destroyed must be an agricultural product or property, not a set of buggy harness, Terry v. State, 25 Tex. App. 714; nor a private storehouse. Beeson v. State, 23 Tex. App. 406.

Under a statute making it an offense to pull down the fence of another without his consent, one joint owner of the fence may be convicted, if he pulls it down without the consent of the other. Hurlburt v. State, 12 Tex. App. 252.

One may be guilty of malicious mischief in pulling down a fence, although he claims title, if another was in peaceable possession. Carter v. State, 18 Tex. App. 573.

In a suit for damages for maliciously poisoning plaintiff's dogs, the defendant's acts need not be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, but only by a preponderance of evidence, notwithstanding they constitute a crime also. Heiligmann v. Rose, 81 Tex. 222. See also Brumley v. State, 12 Tex. App. 609; Coggins v. State, 12 Tex. App. 109; White v. State, 14 Tex. App. 449; Lackey v. State, 14 Tex. App. 164.

Tennessee.—An entry without force, although unlawful, is only a civil trespass. Temple v. State, 6 Baxt. (Tenn.) 496.

To make the crime of maliciously destroying, injuring, or secreting personal property, the primary motive must be to do injury and thus gratify a malevolent disposition. Hampton v. State, 10 Lea (Tenn.) 639.

One found masked in a hen-house, for the purpose of stealing chickens, was held properly convicted under the "ku-klux" law, and sentenced to not less than ten years in the penitentiary. Walpole v. State, 9 Baxt. (Tenn.) 370.

If the owner of land removes therefrom a building placed upon it without right by a mere trespasser, the owner cannot be charged with malicious mischief under Tennessee Code, § 4652. Malone v. State, 11 Lea (Tenn.) 701.

Virginia.—A party indicted for a trespass, with force and arms, may be prosecuted to outlawry, in Virginia. Com. v. Hale, 2 Va. Cas. 241. In such case, the coroner ought to pronounce the judgment of outlawry, and his name ought to be stated by the sheriff, in his return to the exigent. Com. v. Anderson, 2 Va. Cas. 245.

An indictment, under Virginia Laws (1822-3), ch. 34, § 1, for punishing willful trespasses, must allege that the property taken away by the defendant belonged to another person, and that the taking was "knowingly and willfully without lawful authority," in the terms of the statute. Israel's Case, 4 Leigh (Va.) 675; Percavill's Case, 4 Leigh (Va.) 686.

1. Bouv. Law Dict., vol. 2, p. 748.

Trespass de bonis asportatis may be maintained for taking and carrying away fixtures, or the portions of a building temporarily dismembered therefrom. Wadleigh v. Janvrin, 41 N. H. 503; 77 Am. Dec. 780.

The owner of land having, for a valuable consideration, given license to another by parol to build a bridge on his land, an action of trespass de bonis asportatis will lie against him, for taking away the bridge without the consent of him who erected it. Ricker v. Kelly, 1 Me. 117; 10 Am. Dec. 38.

In Grafton v. Carmichael, 48 Wis. 660, the complaint alleged that on, etc., defendant broke and entered upon plaintiff's farm, and took from his possession certain personal property of the plaintiff, carried it away and converted it to his own use. This was held an action de bonis asportatis, and not of trover.

tain a distinct and positive¹ allegation of every fact essential to state completely the cause of action.² It need, however, only

Warren, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 348; Pierce v. Van Dyke, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 613; Ely v. Ehle, 3 N. Y. 506; Erisman v. Walters, 26 Pa. St. 467; Parker v. Hall, 55 Me. 362.

1. Recitals Positively Made.—If in trespass, the plaintiff declares "for that whereas," etc., it is not a positive averment and is bad. Moore v. Dawney, 3 Hen. & M. (Va.) 127; Hord v. Dishman, 2 Hen. & M. (Va.) 595; Collier v. Moulton, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 109; Gordon v. Hood, Minor (Ala.) 122.

Where trespass is relied upon as the ground of action, it should be set forth distinctly, so that the principal act complained of may be seen with reasonable certainty, and kept distinct from matters alleged merely in aggravation. Clark v. Langworthy, 12 Wis. 441.

An act of trespass cannot be alleged by way of recital under a quod cum. Sturdevant v. Gains, 5 Ala. 435.

Vi et armis, should be stated, but if not stated, does not make the declaration bad except on special demurrer. Marshall v. White, Harp. (S. Car.) 122; Higgins v. Hayward, 5 Vt. 73.

Where a count alleged that the defendant vi et armis, broke and entered, etc., and vi et armis committed a certain trespass on a chattel there being, on special demurrer, that the close was not alleged to be the plaintiff's, it was held that, as there appeared sufficient in the count to sustain trespass to the chattel, the breach and entry might be considered as surplussage, the defective statement of which would not vitiate. Hawley v. Clerk, 2 Tyler (Vt.) 20.

The plaintiff had a verdict for damages, in an action of trespass vi et armis, for the "abduction" of his daughter, who was under twenty-one years of age; and on motion in arrest of judgment, the action was held to be maintainable, although it was not laid in the declaration that thereby the plaintiff lost the services of his child, and although there was no evidence of a forcible taking. Kirkpatrick v. Lockhart, 2 Brev. (S. Car.) 276.

2. Allegations.—In an action for stopping the plaintiff's lights, it is not necessary to allege an ancient or a prescriptive right to the lights. Story v. Odin, 12 Mass. 157; 7 Am. Dec. 46.

No more trespasses can be recovered for than are laid in the declaration. Gillen v. Wilson, 2 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 11.

Under Illinois statute, the "owner" can bring trespass; such owner must allege he is the owner in fee simple. Wright v. Bennett, 4 Ill. 258; Edwards v. Hill, 11 Ill. 22.

One suing on contract for a personal injury must set up such contract. Moseley v. Wilkinson, 24 Ala. 411. A declaration in trespass for shooting a horse must describe the shooting as "willful and malicious." Ridge v. Featherston, 15 Ark. 159. Must give defendant's name accurately. Perkins v. Maysville, etc., Assoc. (Ky. 1889), 10 S. W. Rep. 659. Must distinctly state every essential fact. Hall's Case, 5 Me. 409.

An allegation in a complaint that a wrong complained of was done without the fault or negligence of the plaintiff, is not necessary in a case of trespass, and where the wrong complained of was committed by some positive, affirmative act; it is necessary only where the issue is solely a question of negligence. Roll v. Indianapolis, 52 Ind. 547.

Illustrations; Good Declaration.—A complaint charging that defendant "unlawfully broke and entered plaintiff's close, situate . . . and took and carried away two hundred dozen sheaves of wheat, plaintiff's personal property, without license, to his damage," etc., sufficiently charges an injury to personal property and states a cause of action. Richardson v. Brewer, 81 Ind. 107.

A complaint charging defendant with malicious trespass, in entering plaintiff's close in a designated township, and breaking down plaintiff's "grain" there growing, is open to the objection of not sufficiently describing either the land or the grain; but these objections will be deemed waived if not taken at the trial. People v. O'Brien, 60 Mich. 8.

A petition in trespass which alleges the conversion of trees, etc., cut and carried away from the land of plaintiff, etc., sets out a good cause of action at common law, and is not bad on demurrer, although it calls for treble damages awarded by the statute, and fails to state that defendant has no interest or right in the timber, or is otherwise insufficient as a statutory pleading. Nor is it held bad for failing to state in terms that the trees were the property of plaintiff. Atlantic, etc., R. Co. v. Freeman, 61 Mo. 80.

In trespass qu. cl. fr., the declaration alleged, that the defendant on a day specified, broke and entered the plaintiff's close, and ejected him therefrom, and kept and continued him so ejected from thence hitherto, whereby the plaintiff, during all that time, lost the use of the benefit of said close. It was held that the declaration was good; that it did not present a claim for damages for the continuance of the trespass, but only showed the character of the original trespass, as being a complete disseisin, and not mere temporary possession. Bailey v. Butcher, 6 Gratt. (Va.) 144.

Where, in an action of trespass qu. cl. fr. the petition alleges the unlawful entry upon plaintiff's land, and that the defendant unlawfully cut and felled timber growing thereon, and carried off and converted the same to his own use, "to the injury of said land and damage of your petitioner $1,000," it is a sufficient allegation to admit proof of the value of the timber so cut and removed without any more particular averment of the same. Kolb v. Bankhead, 18 Tex. 228.

A complaint in an action of trespass against a railroad company, which alleges that the company on, etc., entered on lands of which the plaintiff was possessed and seised in fee (describing them), and constructed its roads over the same, and ever since used its portions over which the track was constructed, by running trains of cars over it, to the damage of the plaintiff, sets forth a good cause of action in trespass. Pomeroy v. Milwaukee, etc., R. Co., 16 Wis. 640.

A declaration in trespass for cutting down and carrying away the plaintiff's trees, is good, without an averment that the land where the trees were growing belonged to the plaintiff. Gronour v. Daniels, 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 108.

A declaration in an action of trespass, for taking and conveying away "four horses, the property of the plaintiff," is sufficiently certain and descriptive of the property taken. Beaumont v. Yantz, 1 Ill. 26.

It is sufficient where the facts set forth in a complaint for trespass, show a "wrongful" taking, although this phrase is not used in the plea. Buck v. Colbath, 7 Minn. 310; 82 Am. Dec. 91.

In an action for killing cattle, declaring that they were "his" cattle is a sufficient assertion of property in the plaintiff. Heath v. Conway, 1 Bibb. (Ky.) 398; Smith v. Hancock, 4 Bibb. (Ky.) 222.

An indictment charging the defendant with cutting and removing from the land of B, a certain quantity of ice of the value of ten dollars, the property of B, held good, although it was not alleged how B acquired property in the ice. State v. Pottmeyer, 30 Ind. 287.

In Griffin v. Gilbert, 28 Conn. 493, the following was held on error to be a sufficient count in trespass: Then and there to answer unto the plaintiff in a plea of the case, whereupon the plaintiff declares that on, etc., he being lawfully seised of a certain tract of land (describing it), on which his dwelling house stood, the defendant did, on, etc., without law or right, and for the purpose of vexing and injuring the plaintiff, wrongfully and wantonly plow and dig a deep ditch on the highway and land of the plaintiff, in the front part of said tract of land, thereby obstructing and endangering the plaintiff in going to and from his dwelling house and premises to said highway; and the defendant then and there obstructed the water course leading from the pond of the plaintiff on said premises to other land of the plaintiff on the opposite side of said highway; and did then and there also wantonly and wrongfully dig up and draw a large rock from said highway, and place the same on said tract of land of the plaintiff, within said inclosure, to his great injury and annoyance, whereby the plaintiff has been put to great inconvenience and damage. The above count was preceded by two counts in trespass, for an entry at the same time.

A count which avers that the defendant falsely and maliciously made an affidavit, in writing, etc., and upon said affidavit falsely and maliciously caused and procured said plaintiff to be arrested by his body and to be imprisoned, and to be kept and detained in prison for a long time, to wit, for the space of ten days then next following, at the expiration of which said time the said plaintiff, in order to procure his release and discharge from said imprisonment, was forced and obliged to, and did, then and there, pay to said defendant a large sum of money, to wit, etc., and was state such facts as uncontradicted would warrant the plaintiff's recovery.¹

b. MATTERS IN AGGRAVATION.—Matters in aggravation need not be stated to make a good cause of action; they may be shown in evidence.²

thereupon discharged and released from said arrest and imprisonment, etc., is a good cause in trespass. Sheppard v. Furniss, 19 Ala. 760.

Bad Declaration.—A declaration which alleges that defendant railroad company, without leave or license, tore down plaintiff's fences, dug up and removed the soil, made excavations and embankments, and built a road bed on plaintiff's land, excluding plaintiff from the possession of the part thus occupied, sounds in trespass, though it recites that plaintiff complains of defendant "of a plea of trespass on the case." Wood v. Michigan Cent., etc., R. Co., 81 Mich. 358.

A declaration in trespass for the taking of documents and receipts to prove the plaintiff's claim for $1,200 due from the British government, sundry notes of hand and accounts in five books, and other papers of the plaintiff, and a plea thereto, justifying the taking of the "books and certain papers of the plaintiff, viz., a quantity of papers in a fruit basket, part of the goods in the declaration mentioned," as an officer, are both bad for uncertainty. Oystead v. Shed, 12 Mass. 506.

A special finding of a jury will not remedy the defect in a declaration in which the description is too general. Freen v. Cruikshanks, 3 McCord (S. Car.) 84.

A declaration against a corporation in case alleged, in two counts, that the plaintiff was possessed of a dwelling house situated on a public street, and that the defendants, by their agents and servants, unjustly and wrongfully cut a deep canal across the street, and kept it open for five months, by which the plaintiff was obliged to go further to transact business, obtain necessities, etc. It was also charged that the defendants, by their agents and servants, wrongfully and unjustly blasted and threw large quantities of gravel, slate, and stones, upon the dwelling house of the plaintiff, breaking the windows, chimney, etc., of the house, and also shut and darkened the windows of the house. The plaintiff showed that he was in possession of the dwelling house, and that the acts alleged were committed by a contractor and his servants, employed by the defendants. It was held that the declaration might be sustained as a declaration in case, notwithstanding the defendants owned the fee of the land where the rocks were blasted, and also of the public street. Hay v. Cohoes Co., 3 Barb. (N. Y.) 42.

1. Facts to be Stated.—If one aver the breaking and entering, he need not recite the damage which would be a matter of aggravation. Van Leuven v. Lyke, 1 N. Y. 515; 49 Am. Dec. 346; Loeb v. Mathis, 37 Ind. 306.

2. Matter in Aggravation.—In actions of trespass qu. cl., where the declaration, in addition to the averments of breaking and entering the plaintiff's close, contains allegations of other matters, such as the expulsion of the plaintiff from the premises, or the taking and carrying away of personal property, leaving it equivocal whether the plaintiff intends such additional matter as an aggravation of the principal trespass, or whether it was inserted as a distinct trespass, for which the plaintiff seeks to recover, as a substantive ground of action, the defendant has a right to regard it as aggravation merely, and in his plea pass over it in silence, answering only the alleged trespass on the freehold. Carpenter v. Barber, 44 Vt. 441.

Separate entries on land are properly united in one action of trespass; and allegations of injury to personal property which constitutes mere matter of aggravation are properly set forth. Whatling v. Nash, 41 Hun (N. Y.) 579.

A count in trespass alleged that defendant broke plaintiff's close on a day stated, and then and there trod down the grass and assaulted and beat plaintiff. It was held that the count was good, but one cause of action being stated, and the other matter being but in aggravation. Gilbert v. Pritchard, 41 Hun (N. Y.) 46.

In trespass qu. cl., the gist of the action is the breaking and entering the plaintiff's close. The injury done therein is a matter of aggravation only. In such case it is not an objection to the

c. POSSESSION.—The gist of an action for injury to realty is the possession,¹ which should be alleged in the declaration.² The action in trespass may be good, although possession may not be alleged, when an averment of ownership is made,³ or where other language is used showing a right of action.⁴ A declaration bad on whole count, that the matter in aggravation is not well laid. Rucker v. M'Neely, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 179.

A complaint which alleges that the defendant, with force and arms, entered the plaintiff's dwelling house, and then and there, with force and arms, assaulted, debauched, and carnally knew one B., then and there being the daughter and servant of the said plaintiff, and her did forcibly ravish and deflower, against her consent, to the damage of the plaintiff, etc., is not demurrable for want of an allegation of loss of service, the gist of the action being the trespass in entering the plaintiff's dwelling house, and the other allegations being merely consequential and in aggravation of damages. Donohue v. Dyer, 23 Ind. 521.

In a declaration of trespass qu. cl. fr., allegations of trespass to the person and of conversion may be inserted as matters of aggravation. Waldo v. Waldo, 52 Mich. 94.

In New York, in a complaint charging a trespass by the defendant's horses on the plaintiff's lands, and alleging, by way of aggravation, the kicking and breaking of the collar-bone of the plaintiff's horse, it is not necessary to aver that the defendant's horses were accustomed to kick, or that the defendant had notice of their vicious propensity. Dunkle v. Kocker, 11 Barb. (N. Y.) 387.

The advantage of specially pleading matters of aggravation is to put an adversary on notice of claim. Dickinson v. Boyle, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 78; 28 Am. Dec. 281.

1. Gist of Action is Possession.—1 Chitty Pl. 188, 195; 2 Greenl. Ev., § 614.

2. Possession Should be Alleged.—O'Connor v. Corbitt, 3 Cal. 370; McDonald v. Bear River Water, etc., Co., 13 Cal. 220; Cowenhoven v. Brooklyn, 38 Barb. (N. Y.) 9.

3. Allegation of Ownership Sufficient.—Renshaw v. Lloyd, 50 Mo. 368; Leihy v. Ashland Lumbering Co., 49 Wis. 165; Humphreys v. Merritt, 51 Ind. 197.

A petition in an action for trespass to land, and for carrying away timber therefrom, which alleges that defendant "entered the close of plaintiff—that is to say, a certain tract of land, and the lines and boundaries thereof," and cut down and carried away a lot of timber therefrom, without otherwise alleging possession or seisin of the land, or ownership of the wood by plaintiff, is demurrable. The Kentucky Act of March 10th, 1854, allowing an owner of land, although not in actual possession, to maintain trespass qu. cl., is not in force, and possession must be shown. Duzan v. Ferguson (Ky. 1886), 1 S. W. Rep. 539.

A declaration in trespass, for entering and cutting timber on plaintiff's close, need not aver that the plaintiff was in possession. Gray v. Cooper, Wright (Ohio) 500.

The allegation in the declaration, in an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., that the "defendant broke and entered the plaintiff's close," is a sufficient averment of possession. Finch v. Alston, 2 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 83.

In an action of trespass, the declaration alleged that the plaintiff was the lawful owner and possessor of a farm abutting on the highway, and that in front of his farm, and nearer to his land than any other person's, was a pond of water, from which the owners of the farm had immemorially enjoyed the privilege of taking water and manure. It was held that this was not an averment that the plaintiff was in possession of the pond or of such privilege. Wetmore v. Robinson, 2 Conn. 529.

4. In an action of trespass for taking and carrying away certain goods, it is sufficient to aver in the declaration that the goods were the property of the plaintiff, without also averring that they were in the possession of the plaintiff at the time of the taking. Donaghe v. Roudeboush, 4 Munf. (Va.) 251.

A petition in trespass need not state that the plaintiff was in possession of the real estate at the time of the alleged injuries thereto. Fitzpatrick v. Gebhart, 7 Kan. 35.

A mortgagee who would maintain an action against a trespasser on the mortgaged property must allege facts demurrer may be cured by verdict.¹ If the action is brought under a statute, the statute should be strictly followed.² In trespass de bonis asportatis, title must be alleged.³

d. WHERE ACTION BROUGHT.—Usually the action is brought in the county in which the locus in quo is situated.⁴

e. JOINDER OF COUNTS.—Different counts, if not inconsistent, showing that something is still due on the mortgage. Vogel v. Walker, 3 Utah 227.

In trespass qu. cl. the plaintiff need not set out his title in his petition. Dorsey v. Patterson, 7 Iowa 420.

1. Verdict May Cure.—If, on the general issue in an action of trespass, the facts stated in the declaration are proved, and are not disproved by the defendant, the plaintiff is not entitled to a verdict, even though the declaration might be bad on demurrer. Allen v. Parkhurst, 10 Vt. 557.

In an action of trespass for taking and carrying away goods, the omission to state the value of the goods in the declaration, is a matter of form only, and is cured by pleading in chief as well as by verdict, and is not a ground of exception to the admission of evidence to prove the value. Baker v. Baker, 13 Met. (Mass.) 125; 46 Am. Dec. 725.

In an action of trespass for an injury to the plaintiff's cattle, without taking or converting them, the averment of value is not material. If it were, the want of it could only be taken advantage of by special demurrer, and is therefore cured by the Massachusetts Act of 1826, ch. 273, § 3, by which special demurrers are abolished. Such defect would also be cured as a circumstantial error, by Rev. Stat., ch. 100, § 21. Dean v. Green, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 279.

2. Statute Must Be Followed.—Var-den v. Ritchie, 86 Mich. 197; Campbell v. Bridwell, 5 Oregon 311; Keiny v. Ingraham, 66 Barb. (N. Y.) 250; Mitchell v. Smith, 4 Md. 403; Bowen v. Fuller, 2 Tyler (Vt.) 86; Hall's Case, 5 Me. 409; Sawyer v. Goodwin, 34 Me. 419; Gebhart v. Adams, 23 Ill. 397; 76 Am. Dec. 702; Boyle v. Lindsley, 2 N. J. L. 250; Jessup v. Sharp, 2 N. J. L. 344.

The provisions of Louisiana Act of March 18th, 1855, that the right of action for damages on account of "personal injuries shall survive, in cases of death, in favor of the minor children and widow of the deceased, or either of them, and in default of them, in favor of the surviving father or mother, or either of them, for the space of one year from the death," is a legal subrogation in favor of the persons designated, to the right of action of the deceased; and in case of a suit under that subrogation, the plaintiff should allege that his cause of action was derived from the deceased under the statute, and a neglect to do this will be fatal. Earhart v. New Orleans, etc., R. Co., 17 La. Ann. 243.

3. De Bonis Asportatis.—The declaration in trespass de bonis asportatis must aver the plaintiff's title to the goods. Carlisle v. Weston, 1 Met. (Mass.) 26; Neal v. Clautice, 7 Har. & J. (Md.) 372; Hite v. Long, 6 Rand. (Va.) 457; 18 Am. Dec. 719.

Where a declaration in trespass de bonis asportatis omitted to allege that the goods taken were the property of the plaintiff, and the defendant did not appear, and the plaintiff proved the trespass complained of, and that the property was his, it was held that the declaration was sufficient to uphold the judgment, although it would have been bad on demurrer. Copley v. Rose, 2 N. Y. 115.

4. Action Brought in County of Locus Quo.—Chapman v. Morgan, 2 Greene (Iowa) 374; Prichard v. Campbell, 5 Ind. 494; Loeb v. Mathis, 37 Ind. 306.

In some states, by statute, the action is brought, not in the county of the locus in quo, but in the county wherein the defendant may be found.

Under the Code, the complaint in trespass qu. cl. fr., need not state that the land on which the alleged trespass was committed, is in the county in which the action is brought. Pike v. Elliott, 36 Ala. 69.

In Alabama, it is a sufficient description of the locus in quo, simply to allege and prove the county in which the trespass was committed. Jean v. Sandiford, 39 Ala. 317.

A citizen of one state cannot bring an action against a citizen of another state for trespass. Hurd v. Miller, 2 Hilt. (N. Y.) 540; Doulson v. Matthews, 4 T. R. 503.

may be joined in the declaration; a count for de bonis asportatis may be joined with a count for trespass quare clausum fregit;¹ vi et armis with trespass quare clausum fregit,² and other counts illustrated below.³

f. DESCRIPTION OF CLOSE.—It is not necessary at common law to describe the premises by boundaries.⁴ The plaintiff may show in evidence where the close is situated.⁵ A substantial description is sufficient, though not exact or accurate.⁶ In England,

1. De Bonis Asportatis and Quare Clausum.—A count for the asportation of goods may be joined with a count for trespass qu. cl. fr. Wilson v. Johnson, 1 Greene (Iowa) 147; Heimer v. Wilcox, 1 Ind. 29; Moulton v. Smith, 32 Me. 406; Carter v. Wallace, 2 Tex. 206; McClees v. Sikes, 1 Jones (N. Car.) 310; Floyd v. Floyd, 4 Rich. (S. Car.) 23.

2. Vi et Armis and Quare Clausum.—In trespass vi et armis, counts for distinct trespasses on lands and goods may be joined. Floyd v. Floyd, 4 Rich. (S. Car.) 23; McClees v. Sikes, 1 Jones (N. Car.) 310; Moats v. Witmer, 3 Gill & J. (Md.) 118.

3. Other Cases Illustrated.—It is not a misjoinder of counts in trespass to charge in the first count that the trespass was committed by defendant as a corporation, and in the second that defendant committed it by its agent. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Latimer, 128 Ill. 163.

A complaint in trespass, alleging that defendants entered plaintiff's close, and diverted the waters of his well, and frightened his wife, is not objectionable as presenting a misjoinder of causes of action. Razzo v. Varni, 81 Cal. 289.

The Kentucky Act of 1838-9 does not change the common-law form of proceeding in trespass, nor authorize a joint action for several trespasses. Fergusons v. Terry, 1 B. Mon. (Ky.) 96.

A count in trespass for forcibly entering the plaintiff's close may be joined with a count for an assault and battery. Flinn v. Anders, 9 Ired. (N. Car.) 328; Sampon v. Henry, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 36.

Counts in trespass and trover cannot be joined. Hines v. Kinnison, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 119.

The Connecticut statute which allows the joining in the same declaration of trespass on the case with trespass and also with assumpsit, does not authorize the joining of trespass with assumpsit; nor the joining of case, trespass and assumpsit. McWheeney v. Waterbury, 46 Conn. 295.

A trespass for damage feasant may be joined with a count for rescue, or pound breach. Baker v. Dumbolton, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 240.

Where a count for trespass to real property contained also an allegation for personal injuries, it was held that the plaintiff might recover for the latter, although he could not sustain an action for trespass to the real estate. Wright v. Chandler, 4 Bibb (Ky.) 422.

It is no misjoinder of causes of action to claim, in an action of trespass to try title to land, damages for trespasses committed on the premises. Hillman v. Baumbach, 21 Tex. 203.

An action for willfully killing a horse may be joined with a count for trespass in entering on the plaintiff's tenement. Ripley v. Miller, 1 Jones (N. Car.) 480; 62 Am. Dec. 177.

4. Boundaries Unnecessary.—In a declaration in trespass qu. cl. fr. it is not necessary to describe the close either by name or by abutments. Noyes v. Colby, 30 N. H. 143; Palmer v. Tuttle, 39 N. H. 486. But see Moody v. Hinkley, 34 Me. 200; Smethurst v. Journey, 1 Houst. (Del.) 196; Whitaker v. Forbes, 68 N. Car. 228; State v. Guernsey, 9 Mo. App. 312; Hall v. Mayo, 97 Mass. 416.

5. Noyes v. Colby, 30 N. H. 143; Palmer v. Tuttle, 39 N. H. 486; Goodright v. Rich, 7 T. R. 335.

6. What Sufficient Description.—A declaration, in an action of trespass qu. cl. fr. described the close as bounded northerly by land of S. and others, easterly by the old N. B. turnpike, southerly by the road leading to W., and westerly on W. river. It was held that the description sufficiently complied with the Massachusetts Act of 1839, ch. 159, § 3, which requires that "the close or place of the alleged trespass shall be designated by name or abutments, or this common-law rule has been changed, and the place where the trespass was committed must be described in the declaration.¹

g. ALLEGATIONS AS TO TIME.—The plaintiff need not state the time of the act of trespass exactly,² and he can prove any act at any time before the filing of the declaration.³ A trespass may be charged with a continuando for trespasses committed continuously from day to day, where it is desired to recover all the damages in other proper description." Forbush v. Lombard, 13 Met. (Mass.) 109.

In trespass, premises are sufficiently described as "the close of the plaintiff, situated, lying and being in A," naming the town. Rice v. Hathaway, Brayt. (Vt.) 231.

An indictment for trespass to lands charged that the defendants, on, etc., at, etc., did unlawfully cut down and remove, on and from land belonging to M. S., in said county, one tree of the value, etc. It was held that this description of the land upon which the trespass was committed was sufficiently certain. Newland v. State, 30 Ind. 111.

A declaration in trespass described the premises entered by stating the number and street in a certain city, and referring to a certain recorded deed. Defendant did not demur, or ask for a statement of particulars, as provided by statute. It was held that he was not entitled at the trial, to a ruling that the declaration was insufficient under Massachusetts Pub. St., ch. 167, § 6, providing that in such a declaration, "the place of the alleged trespass shall be designated . . . by name, abutments, or other proper description." Leatherbee v. Barrett, 152 Mass. 532.

In an action of trespass for damages before a justice, a statement in these words: "E. W. Warne in account with Calvin C. Burt, Dr. To damage done to building and premises in block 84 of the city of St. Louis, $50," is sufficient, under the Missouri statute. Burt v. Warne, 31 Mo. 296.

In an action of trespass, the declaration alleged that the defendant "broke and entered the plaintiff's dwelling house, occupied by the plaintiff, with force and arms, and did then and there imprison the plaintiff for the space of one hour, without any legal or probable cause." It was held that this was an action of trespass on real estate—an action of trespass qu. cl.—and that the place of the alleged trespass was sufficiently designated by name, according to the requisition of the statute. Sawyer v. Ryan, 13 Met. (Mass.) 144.

Where a close was described as abutting southerly on W.'s land, it was held that this did not imply that it was abutting all the way southerly on W.'s land. Wheeler v. Rowell, 6 N. H. 215.

Plaintiff alleged that he was seised and possessed of certain premises, which were described by metes and bounds, subject to a public easement in a part thereof used as a public street; that defendant unlawfully entered on that portion so used as a highway, and committed a trespass. It was held that a cause of action was set forth. Hussner v. Brooklyn City R. Co., 96 N. Y. 18.

1. Waterman on Trespass, vol. 2, p. 456.

2. Time.—It is not material to state, in a declaration in trespass, the exact day on which the injury was committed, if it is proved to have been committed prior to the commencement of the action. Caldwell v. Julian, 2 Mill (S. Car.) 294; Knapp v. Slocomb, 9 Gray (Mass.) 73. Where a day is laid in the declaration, and from such day to the commencement of the action, divers trespasses were committed, one trespass only may be proved prior to the day named, but divers may be proved within the time laid. U. S. v. Kennedy, 3 McLean (U. S.) 175.

3. Under a declaration in trespass, which alleges that the defendants on a certain day, and on divers other days and times between that day and another day specified, broke and entered the plaintiff's barn, and took and carried away his hay, the plaintiff may recover for as many distinct acts of trespass as he can prove were committed by the defendants between the days mentioned in his declaration. Myrick v. Downer, 18 Vt. 360.

The levy, the carrying away, and the sale of a sheriff's goods, although taking place upon different days, will constitute but one act of trespass, and the plaintiff cannot be put to his election, as to which he will proceed upon. Browning v. Skillman, 24 N. J. L. 351.

one action.¹ Where the trespasses are separate and distinct, it has been held that they could not be laid with a continuando.²

h. ALLEGATIONS AS TO DAMAGES—(See infra, this title, Damages). To recover damages they need not be specially averred.³

i. AMENDMENT OF DECLARATION.—The declaration in trespass quare clausum may be amended by adding a count alleging the

1. The allegata and probata must correspond; but a trespass of a permanent nature may be declared against with a continuando. Sanders v. Palmer, 1 McCord (S. Car.) 165.

Successive trespasses of the same kind to personal property may be sued for, and damages recovered therefor, under a declaration containing one count with a continuando. Folger v. Fields, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 93.

A declaration in trespass, for an assault and battery with a plank, "and there afterwards continuing" the assault with a rope, was held not to import a technical continuando, and to be good. Benson v. Swift, 2 Mass. 50.

2. When Continuando Not Allowed.—Where a declaration in trespass is not for a continuing trespass, begun at one time, and continued up to another, but for a series of distinct acts of trespass, the first being laid on or about a specified day, and the others at divers other times, it is competent for the court to put the plaintiff to his election, by confining him to proof, either of a single act prior to the date specified, or of so many as the truth allows between that date and the commencement of suit. McDiarmid v. Caruthers, 34 Mich. 49.

It is not competent for a plaintiff to declare with a continuando for injuries occasioned by the obstruction, or sufficiency, of a highway, or to allege a repetition of such injuries upon diverse days and times between a day specified and the commencement of a suit. It is the per quod, in such case, which is the gravamen of the action, and not the insufficiency of the road; and the injury sustained at any one time cannot be continued or repeated. Baxter v. Winooski Turnpike Co., 22 Vt. 114; 52 Am. Dec. 84.

Although a declaration in trespass against a person for cutting down trees on the land of the plaintiff, on several occasions, may allege the trespasses to have been committed on different days and times, yet they cannot be laid with a continuando. Rucker v. McNeely, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 179.

In two actions of tort for trespasses qu. cl. fr., by a plaintiff against the same defendant, the fact that the time described in one declaration is included in the other, raises no presumption that both refer to the same trespass. Wilcox v. Conway, 115 Mass. 561.

3. Averment of Damages.—To recover damages in an action of trespass for the necessary and natural results of the injury charged, no special averment is necessary. Argotsinger v. Vines, 82 N. Y. 308.

A state of demand in an action for damage by swine, which does not state upon whose land the damage was done, nor that it was done upon any; nor that the defendant had notice that the damage had been appraised, is deficient. Voorheis v. Perrine, 16 N. J. L. 359.

In an action of trespass on the case, one count disclosed injuries for which damages were recoverable in trespass, the other for which they were recoverable in case, and part of the proof sustained the latter count. It was held that a prayer which required the court to treat all the injuries complained of as resulting in damages recoverable in trespass and not in case, was erroneous, and was properly rejected. Scott v. Bay, 3 Md. 431.

In trespass, the complaint need not allege that the damage is due and unpaid. Atkinson v. Mott, 102 Ind. 431.

A declaration charging an entry on premises without a license must set up consequential damages in order to sustain a recovery. Ives v. Williams, 53 Mich. 636.

Damages consisting in the loss of profits on plaintiff's crops of vegetables are special, and if recoverable at all, must be pleaded. Razzo v. Varni, 81 Cal. 289.

In an action before a justice of the peace for damages sustained from trespassing animals, under Indiana Rev. Stat., ch. 22, §§ 5, 6, 7, a demand for payment of such damage need not be alleged in the declaration, although it must be proved. Smith v. McFall, 1 Ind. 127.

facts, already set up, by way of aggravation of damages;¹ but not by setting up in a new count the facts already alleged in aggravation;² in other words, it is not usually allowed to add a new cause of action by amendment.³

2. Pleas—a. GENERAL ISSUE.—The plea of the general issue raises the question of the commission of the trespass, and puts in issue the title of the plaintiff, whether in freehold or in possession.⁴ If there be a new assignment to the cause of action, the general issue denies the whole cause of action.⁵ The defendant may plead the general issue as to part, and some special plea as to

1. Amendment—When Allowed.—An action of trespass cannot be changed by an amendment of the complaint into a special action on the case. Mobile, etc., R. Co. v. McKellar, 59 Ala. 458.

In Pennsylvania, a wide range is allowed in making amendments. The rule that a plaintiff may add a count substantially different from the declaration, if he adheres to the original cause of action, applies both to actions ex delicto and actions ex contractu. Thus, in trespass quare clausum fregit, de bonis asportatis, he may amend a declaration charging the asportation of oak, ash, beech and chestnut trees, by a count charging the taking of hickory logs. Knapp v. Hartung, 73 Pa. St. 290.

A declaration in trespass qu. cl. fr. is amendable, where the amendment does not require a change in the plea nor defense, and where, from the original declaration, the defendant could not have failed to understand the case. Kelly v. Bragg, 76 Me. 207.

2. In Cunninge v. Rawson, 7 Mass. 440, the plaintiff was allowed to amend by alleging any other torts in the same close.

In Melvin v. Smith, 12 N. H. 462, the declaration alleged that the defendant, by reason of the cutting of divers trees upon the plaintiff's lands, had become liable to certain penalties, which the plaintiff claimed a right to recover. An amended declaration charged the breaking and entering of the close and cutting the plaintiff's trees. It was held that the proposed amendment changed the cause of action.

3. Sawyer v. Goodwin, 34 Me. 419.

4. General Issue.—The commission of the trespass and the title are raised by the general issue. Lyon v. Fairbanks, 79 Wis. 455; Maxim v. Wedge, 69 Wis. 547.

The plea of "not guilty," in an action of trespass to try title, is an answer to the entire petition, and entitles the defendant to prove any defense, whether legal or equitable; but to recover compensation for improvements made in good faith, he must aver that he entered under claim of title. Ragsdale v. Gohlke, 36 Tex. 286.

A plea that the defendant did not commit the act complained of on the land where he was alleged to have committed it in the plaintiff's declaration, but on another lot where he was justified in committing it, amounts to the general issue, and the plaintiff will be entitled to judgment on demurrer to the plea. Dorman v. Long, 2 Barb. (N. Y.) 214.

Where a defendant in trespass wishes to defend as having the right of possession, he must plead the general issue; he cannot plead such right specially. Sage v. Keesecker, Morr. (Iowa) 338.

A plea in trespass qu. cl. fr., that a third person was seised in fee, and demised to the defendant for years, without giving express color to the plaintiff, amounts to the general issue, and is bad on special demurrer. Collet v. Flinn, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 466.

Where, in trespass qu. cl., after a new assignment, setting forth the locus as being a certain close called A B farm, the defendant pleaded thereto that the locus was the freehold of the defendant, and no part of the A B farm, it was held that the plea was bad, as amounting to the general issue. Phillips v. Phillips, 21 N. J. L. 42.

As to Personality.—A plea in trespass de bonis, that the goods belonged to a third person, and were taken by virtue of an execution against him, is bad, as amounting to the general issue. Brown v. Artcher, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 266; Harris v. Miner, 28 Ill. 135.

5. The general issue denies the cause of action after a new assignment of the same. Hodges v. Raymond, 9 Mass. 316; Stewart v. Henry, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 445.

another part of the declaration.¹ The defense of stale demand may be set up under the general issue.²

b. SPECIAL PLEAS; WHEN REQUIRED.—A special plea is required when the declaration makes out a prima facie case of trespass, and the defendant justifies by authority of some title or easement which gives him the legal right to do the act which is the subject of the alleged trespass.³

(1) License.—Justification under a license should be specially pleaded, and usually cannot be set up under the general issue.⁴

1. General issue and special plea may be together pleaded as general issue and justification. Hodges v. Raymond, 9 Mass. 316. The pleas of the general issue and of liberum tenementum may be pleaded together. Hext v. Jarrell, 2 Strobb. (S. Car.) 172.

Where one defendant in trespass pleaded son assault demesne, and the others general issue, with notice of justification, molliter manus, etc., and verdict against him who pleaded specially, and part of the others, on appeal, they were ordered to plead de novo. Kenny v. Kettle, 2 Tyler (Vt.) 84.

In an answer to a complaint for an assault and battery, the defendant will not be allowed first to deny the charge, and then to set up son assault demesne. Schneider v. Schultz, 4 Sandf. (N. Y.) 664.

Where, in trespass, two defendants plead the general issue jointly, any separate justification which one might have pleaded is gone. Bradley v. Powers, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 330.

The defense of estoppel may be raised under a plea of not guilty. Dooley v. Montgomery, 72 Tex. 429.

In trespass de bonis asportatis, facts in mitigation cannot be specially pleaded, but must be given in evidence under the general issue. Hopple v. Higbee, 23 N. J. L. 342.

The declaration in an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., set out a breaking and entering and a conversion of goods; defendants pleaded the general issue and to the taking a special plea in bar, setting up an action of replevin, brought by plaintiff for the same goods, in which action plaintiff recovered judgment. It was held that a demurrer to the plea was properly sustained, as the gist of the action was the breaking, and the conversion was merely a matter of aggravation. Savage v. French, 13 Ill. App. 17.

2. Stale Demand.—The equitable defense of stale demand can be made under the plea of not guilty. Montgomery v. Noyes, 73 Tex. 203.

Where plaintiff, alleging that land, the legal title to which was in his father, was subject to a resulting trust in plaintiff's favor as heir of his mother, delayed bringing suit to enforce the trust for a number of years, and until after the death of the father, who would have been an important witness as to the alleged trust, relief is properly denied, under the doctrine of stale demand. Mayes v. Manning, 73 Tex. 43.

A mere trespasser cannot defeat an action by the assignee of a bond to convey the land by a plea of stale demand. Wright v. Dunn, 73 Tex. 293.

Upon the issuance of a patent, the legal title passes by estoppel to the patentee's prior grantee, and, as the deed by operation of law gave constructive possession, the doctrine of stale demand does not apply. Daniel v. Bridges, 73 Tex. 149.

The plea of stale demand is not applicable, where plaintiff claims under legal title. Bullock v. Smith, 72 Tex. 545.

3. Special Plea.—Williams' ed. of Saunders' Reports, 2d vol., p. 402 n; 1 Chitty, 2 Pl. 495, says: "A justification under a rent charge or in respect of any easement or incorporeal right must be specially pleaded." Starkie on Ev. 1462, citing Hawkins v. Wallis, 2 Wils. 173.

In trespass, things done by authority should be specially pleaded. Martin v. Clark, 1 Hempst. (U. S.) 259.

If the plaintiff's title is proved or admitted, matters in discharge of the right of action must be specially pleaded. Riley v. Denny, 2 Rich. (S. Car. 539; Walker v. Hitchcock, 19 Vt. 634.

4. License.—In a suit for trespass to land, if defendant relies upon a license, it must be specially pleaded, and cannot be given in evidence under the general issue; but it is sufficient if the facts

(2) Justification.—Any facts in justification of the alleged trespass should be specially pleaded, and generally cannot be set up under the general issue.¹ A plea of justification admits the truth, and goes to the whole, of the declaration.² Where the defendant constituting the license are averred. Lockhart v. Geir, 54 Wis. 133; Senecal v. Labadie, 42 Mich. 126; Hill v. Morey, 26 Vt. 178; Ruggles v. Lesure, 24 Pick. (Mass.) 187; Stambaugh v. Hollabaugh, 10 S. & R. (Pa.) 357.

In trespass to personal property, a license from the plaintiff to do the act complained of, if not specially pleaded, cannot be used in justification, but only in mitigation of damages. Hendrix v. Trapp, 2 Rich. (S. Car.) 93.

In trespass, the defense of license requires a special plea, only when such license was given by the plaintiff himself, and not when it was given to the defendant, by one claiming title against the plaintiff. Child v. Allen, 33 Vt. 476.

In trespass qu. cl., defendant may set up a license obtained on a verbal and executed contract, and founded on a sufficient consideration. Pursell v. Stover, 110 Pa. St. 43.

A plea or license in an action qu. cl. fr., from one having only a possessory right to the locus in quo, without giving color to the plaintiff, is bad, as amounting only to the general issue. Underwood v. Campbell, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 78.

The freemen of M., in 1746, voted to sell a beach belonging to the town to E., in case he "will allow all such privileges as shall be thought necessary for the service of the town by a committee," hereafter chosen, etc. A committee was appointed to sell said beach, "to reserve the privileges by bond to be recorded with the deed; . . . the town clerk to give the deed," etc. The committee reported the sale of the beach, and the town clerk gave a deed thereof, and the purchaser a bond to the town treasurer, upon condition that he, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, should grant and allow the inhabitants of the town convenient drift ways to pass and repass, and full liberty to fetch sand, seaweed, shells, and certain drift stuff therefrom, etc. In 1885, an action of trespass was brought against defendant, an inhabitant of the town of M., for asporting sand and gravel from said beach, by the plaintiff, the successor in title of the purchaser E. Defendant pleaded an equitable defense under Rhode Island Pub. St., ch. 204, § 33, setting forth the above bond, averring he was an inhabitant of M. at the time of the alleged trespass, and as such lawfully took sand and gravel from said beach, and plaintiff demurred. It was held that the plea was bad. The defendant is neither party nor privy to the contract, nor assignee, for a mere license does not amount to an interest, until the licensee has incurred expense or labor in consequence of it. Newport Hospital v. Carter, 15 R. I. 285.

1. Matters in justification must be specially pleaded. Johnson v. Cuddington, 35 Ind. 43.

In trespass qu. cl. fr. et de bonis asportatis, a plea justifying the breaking and entering only, is sufficient. Herdon v. Bartlett, 4 Port. (Ala.) 481. In trespass for entering plaintiff's close, and diverting the waters of his well, where plaintiff shows peaceable possession under a paper title for several years, if defendants have any right of entry it must be pleaded in justification. Razzo v. Varni, 81 Cal. 289.

2. Admits Truth of Declaration.—Kingsbury v. Pond, 3 N. H. 511; Burton v. Sweaney, 4 Mo. 1. A declaration in trespass containing two counts, in each of which it is alleged that the defendant took and carried away a gig, is answered by a plea justifying the taking of the said gig, in the several counts of the declaration mentioned. Beekman v. Traver, 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 67.

A declaration in trespass charged the defendant with taking a horse from the plaintiff's possession, but not his property, and with stopping his wagon and team, the rest of the horses being the plaintiff's property. The plea averred that the defendant's horse was geared with the others; that the plaintiff's wagoner attempted to carry off the defendant's horse by driving his team violently; and that the defendant stopped his team to retake his horse, using no more force than was necessary for that purpose. It was held that the plea was good, the defendant being justified in stopping the team for that purpose. Hilte v. Long, 6 Rand. (Va.) 457; 18 Am. Dec. 719.

Complaint in three paragraphs for files this plea, he must make an exact enumeration of the personality of which he justifies the taking, or, if realty is the subject of the trespass, give an exact description of the same.¹

(3) Title in Third Party.—That the title is in a third person must be specially pleaded.²

(4) Liberum Tenementum.—The plea of liberum tenementum with a right of entry justifies a trespass quare clausum fregit.³

trespass to land. Each paragraph alleged the trespass to have been committed on the same day, "and at divers other times since that time and before the commencement of this action," and the act of trespass was described in all of the paragraphs in the same terms. It was held that each paragraph of the complaint covered all of the alleged trespasses, and in justifying by answer the trespasses charged in one paragraph, the defendant in fact justified all, though his answer in terms professed to be directed to one paragraph only of the complaint. Holcraft v. King, 25 Ind. 352.

Effect of Plea.—In an action of trespass de bonis asportatis against several, they filed a special plea of justification, admitting that all took and carried away the property and converted it to their own use, but failed to make good their plea of justification. It was held that all were not bound by the admission, though there was no evidence of the taking, etc., as to some of the defendants. Norris v. Norton, 19 Ark. 319.

Trespass to Different Closes.—In trespass qu. cl., the plaintiff alleged several trespasses on several closes at different times, and the defendant pleaded that the several closes were one and the same close, and that it was his freehold, etc. It was held that this plea was bad; that defendant should have justified as to all the closes, or have denied the trespasses as to all the closes except one, and justified as to that. Nevins v. Keeler, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 63.

A plea justifying a "taking," need not traverse an allegation of detention and conversion. Burton v. Sweaney, 4 Mo. 1.

1. Exact Description.—A plea of justification in trespass for taking goods, that they were taken under process, must specify and particularly describe the process, and set out every fact necessary to show the justification; and if it varies, it cannot be given in evidence. Harrison v. Davis, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 350.

In trespass qu. cl. fr., the defendant pleaded, as to so much of the land described in the declaration as lay on one side of a line described in a conveyance referred to, soil and freehold; and as to the rest of it, not guilty. It was held that as the plea did not describe the line by fixed monuments on the land, it was bad on the demurrer. Orange v. Berry, 24 N. H. 105.

Where in trespass de bonis asportatis, the plaintiff specifies in his declaration the articles of property taken, and the defendant justifies the taking by virtue of process, and in so doing enumerates the articles taken, the enumeration must contain all the articles specified in the declaration. Sterry v. Schuyler, 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 487.

The defendant's denial, in an action of trespass, that the property taken was of the value alleged in the complaint, is sufficient; he must allege it to be of no value or the value as he claims it to be. Lynd v. Pickett, 7 Minn. 184; 82 Am. Dec. 79.

2. Title in Third Party Specially Pleased.—Patterson v. Clark, 20 Iowa 429; Foster v. Lane, 30 N. H. 305; Richardson v. Murrill, 7 Mo. 333.

3. Liberum Tenementum.—Crockett v. Lashbrook, 5 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 530; 17 Am. Dec. 98; Jones v. Water-Lot Co., 18 Ga. 539. In an action of trespass qu. cl., the plea of liberum tenementum gives the plaintiff an implied color of title. Singleton v. Millet, 1 Nott & M. (S. Car.) 355.

In trespass qu. cl. fr., a plea of liberum tenementum is good only so far as supported by proof of right—of common or other similar right—to the specific premises described in the declaration; and the plaintiff can recover for a trespass committed on the close named therein, notwithstanding the record of a former judgment pleaded by way of estoppel, but covering only another part of the premises. Providence v. Adams, 10 R. I. 184.

The common-law right of the defendant in trespass qu. cl. fr. to justify under the plea of liberum tenementum, is not changed by the Tennessee statutes regulating proceedings in forcible entry and detainer. Roberts v. Tarver, 1 Lea (Tenn.) 441.

(5) Other Special Pleas: Accord and Satisfaction; Former Recovery; Arbitration and Award; Right of Way; Res Adjudicata; Prescriptive Right; Order of Court; Judgment; Warrant.—So, also, all matters in defense of the action, showing accord and satisfaction,¹ former recovery,² arbitration and award,³ right of way,⁴ res adjudicata,⁵ prescriptive right,⁶ order of court,⁷ judgments in settlements of plaintiff's right,⁸ or warrant,⁹ should be specially pleaded.

In trespass qu. cl., where the declaration describes the close with precision by metes and bounds, etc., the defendant may, nevertheless, plead liberum tenementum. Fisher v. Morris, 5 Whart. (Pa.) 358.

To an action of trespass qu. cl., a plea that the close was the close and soil of the defendant, is not a plea of liberum tenementum, and the defendant has only to prove right of possession. Millison v. Holmes, 1 Ind. 45.

A plea of liberum tenementum is not good to a declaration for breaking the plaintiff's close and beating him, his servants and horses. Tribble v. Frame, 3 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 13.

1. Accord and Satisfaction.—A plea of accord without satisfaction is not a good plea in defense to an action of trespass. Goff v. Mulholland, 28 Mo. 397.

2. Former Recovery.—In actions of trespass, a former recovery must be especially pleaded. Hahn v. Ritter, 12 Ill. 80.

3. Arbitration and Award.—In trespass, an arbitration and award must be specially pleaded, and cannot be given in evidence under the plea of accord and satisfaction. Hubbert v. Collier, 6 Ala. 269.

4. Right of Way.—A plea of a right of way, to an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., admits the possession of the plaintiff, but not an absolute title in him; and, if otherwise, it would not admit that the persons under whom the plaintiff claimed title many years before were not being alleged in the declaration. Law v. Hempstead, 10 Conn. 23.

In pleading a right of way, it is necessary to state that the privilege of passing extends to servants, or the justification will not extend to them. Bartlett v. Prescott, 41 N. H. 493.

5. Res Adjudicata.—In an action for breaking and entering the defendant's close and taking and carrying away stone, a plea which defends only the taking and carrying away of the stone is insufficient. If the defendant has the right to take and carry away the stone, he should plead that he entered the close for the purpose of exercising that right, and that, in so doing, he did no unnecessary damage. Goodrich v. Judevine, 40 Vt. 190.

6. Prescriptive Right.—A prescriptive right to divert part of a stream must be pleaded in an action of trespass; in case, it may be given in evidence under the general issue. Whetstone v. Bowser, 29 Pa. St. 59.

In trespass qu. cl. fr., the defendant, under the general issue, cannot give in evidence that the locus in quo was a public highway; but he must plead it. Babcock v. Lamb, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 238; Wood v. Mansell, 3 Blackf. (Ind.) 125.

7. Order of Court.—An answer, in an action of trespass for entering the inclosed land of the plaintiff and removing fences, justified the entry and the removal of the fence under an order of the county commissioners, locating a township road; but failed to aver that the supervisor gave the occupant of the land sixty days' notice in writing to remove his fences, as required by statute. It was held that the answer was bad on demurrer. Ruston v. Grimwood, 30 Ind. 364.

8. Judgments.—In an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., a sheriff pleaded justification under a judgment in ejectment, and a writ of habere facias possessionem thereon. The judgment did not include the land in question. It was held that the officer, having pleaded the judgment, could not justify under the writ alone. Clarkson v. Crummell, 37 N. J. L. 541.

9. Warrants.—In an action of trespass, a plea which alleges that the defendant, as agent of the plaintiffs in execution, directed the marshal to levy on goods in the hands of another than the defendant, because they had been fraudulently sold to him by the defend-

c. WHAT THE SPECIAL PLEA SHOULD CONTAIN.—The special plea should contain such allegations as, if true, are essential to the defense.¹ One justifying under title and possession must show ant, is good, and not obnoxious to a demurrer. McNall v. Vehon, 22 Ill. 499.

In an action for assault and battery and false imprisonment, where the defendants, by plea, attempted to justify under a warrant of distress for the collection of taxes, and it appeared by the plea that the warrant was attempted to be executed more than three years after it was delivered to the collector, and no sufficient excuse was set forth for such delay in the execution, until after three years, it was held that the plea was fatally defective, unless the defect was supplied in the replication. Shaw v. Peckett, 25 Vt. 423.

1. Special Plea Must State Essential Facts.—In Baptist Soc., etc. v. Fisher, 18 N. J. L. 240, which was a case of entering the doors and windows of a meeting house, a plea that "the defendants entered as members of a religious society, peaceably, in order to engage in religious worship, as they might lawfully do, doing no unnecessary damage, which are the supposed trespasses," is bad on demurrer, in not averring that the defendants were members of the society, and not denying the acts charged as trespasses, nor setting forth any cause in justification of them.

In Hamilton v. Windolf, 36 Md. 301, which was an action for injuring the plaintiff's wall by inserting joists in it, the defendant offered to prove in justification that such wall was used by him in the erection of an adjoining building under a parol agreement with the plaintiff. It was held that, as license from the plaintiff was not specially pleaded, the evidence could only be received in mitigation of damages.

The declaration in an action of trespass, stated that "the defendant broke and entered the close of the plaintiff, and, with his oxen, etc., destroyed and carried off 200 bushels of corn." The plea alleged that "the premises of the plaintiff were not inclosed by a sufficient fence." It was held that it was not an answer to the declaration. Miles v. Myers, Walk. (Miss.) 379.

Where a recovery of land was based on the report of a referee, to whom the parties had agreed to submit the question of the true location of a line, with a stipulation that the referee should examine that line, an answer charging that he did not, was held good on demurrer. Elder v. McLane, 60 Tex. 383.

A, B and C jointly committed a trespass on lands forming the homestead of the former owner, at that time held by the widow by virtue of her dower and quarantine rights, and ousted her therefrom. She then brought an action for the trespass, and subsequently filed a bill in chancery against A and B for dower and quarantine in said lands, and in such suit recovered judgment against them for about $4,000. In consideration of $3,000 she released B from all liability for the trespass, reserving in said release the right to enforce the balance of the decree against A, who paid it. It was held that these facts constituted no bar to her action for the trespass and ouster against C, when her complaint contained no claim for rents and profits, and that a plea setting up these facts in bar was bad on demurrer. Smith v. Gayle, 62 Ala. 446.

In trespass for entering a close and carrying away a quantity of corn, a plea "that the corn was taken, as the property of one M., by a constable under execution, and sold to the defendant," is defective in not averring that the corn was the property of M. Teril v. Thompson, 3 Bibb (Ky.) 272.

In an action of trespass against a railroad company, for breaking and entering the plaintiff's close, where the defendants justify under and by virtue of their charter, on the ground that the land in question was necessary for the construction of their railroad, and that the defendants, by their agents, surveyors and engineers, entered for the purpose of making surveys, an averment in the plea, that there was a disagreement between the plaintiff and the defendants, as to the price of the land, and that, while such disagreement existed, J. McLean, first judge, on the petition of the defendants, in writing, duly issued and delivered his warrant, etc., is a sufficient averment of the presenting of a petition; nor is it necessary in a plea to set out the names and places of abode of the twelve jurors drawn for the purpose of appraising the value of land taken for a railroad.

It is sufficient to mention the names of those who were actually sworn. Polly v. Saratoga, etc., R. Co., 9 Barb. (N. Y.) 449.

To a count in trespass qu. cl., and for "cutting down and carrying away sixteen stocks of rye," and a count for "taking and carrying away sixteen stocks of other rye," the defendant pleaded as to force, etc., "and also the whole trespass and all the trespasses in the declaration mentioned, excepting breaking," etc., "and cutting down and carrying away sixteen stocks of rye then and there growing," not guilty, and plead soil and freehold in justification. It was held that this was an answer to both counts. Parker v. Parker, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 236.

In trespass, where the declaration contains two counts, one charging an unlawful entry into a cellar, and the other into a dwelling house, the defendant, instead of averring that the several closes are one and the same, should either justify as to both the closes, or plead not guilty as to one, and justify as to the other. Sterry v. Schuyler, 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 487.

1. Justification Under Possession and Title.—Dunlap v. Glidden, 31 Me. 510; Dolloff v. Hardy, 26 Me. 545. Where the plaintiff's possession and the trespass complained of were subsequent to his discharge in bankruptcy, and the plaintiff's title is not involved, a plea of his bankruptcy is frivolous; though if the title had been involved, and it had become necessary for the plaintiff to show title in himself at the time of the bankruptcy, the schedules filed with the plaintiff's petition would be relevant to show that the premises in dispute, if embraced in them, passed, by operation of law, to another; or, if omitted, to present that fact for the consideration of the jury. Lankford v. Green, 62 Ala. 314.

A plea of justification, in trespass, cannot be objected to for the want of a venue; the place being laid in the declaration, and the trespass justified being alleged to be the same as that complained of. Levelling v. Leavel, 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 163.

Plaintiff sued defendant for undermining a wall, the parties being occupants of adjoining premises. It was held that if the defendant acted recklessly, he could not justify under a claim of right to use the wall or to dig under it; that an injury to the plaintiff's goods by flooding at a fire, caused by the falling of the wall, constituted an element of damages; and that the defendant could claim no deduction by reason of insurance money received by the plaintiff on policies taken out by him. Hammond v. Schiff, 100 N. Car. 161.

In an action for breaking and entering a close, a defendant need not set forth in his answer the lease under which he justifies. Dillon v. Brown, 11 Gray (Mass.) 179; 71 Am. Dec. 700.

Evidence of improvements offered by the defendant cannot be excluded because his plea does not state the grounds for alleging himself to be a possessor in good faith, such plea being otherwise sufficient, and not having been excepted to, though Texas Rev. St., art. 4813, requires such grounds to be set out. The objection should be taken by special demurrer. Holstein v. Adams, 72 Tex. 485.

The defendants pleaded that the locus in quo belonged to the United States, and that one of the defendants had, long before the commission of the supposed trespasses, and at the time thereof, a "claim title" to said land, and had built a dwelling house thereon, and was then and there the owner thereof, and, as such, he and the other defendants, as his servants, entered said land, as they lawfully might, and removed said dwelling house, etc. It was held that the plea was insufficient, as it did not allege possession in the defendant, at the time of the plaintiff's entry. Ross v. Nesbit, 7 Ill. 252.

In an action of trespass qu. cl., the allegations, in the plea of title, that the title was in defendant's debtor on the 15th, and that defendant attached on the 16th; that examination was levied (there being no averment that it was in life); that, by reason of such levy, defendant became seised and possessed (the prior averments not necessarily implying seisin); were held bad. Gleason v. Howard, Brayt. (Vt.) 190.

The executor of a mortgagee entered for condition broken, and leased the land. In an action of trespass brought against the lessee by the mortgagor, the lessee justified under the lessor, without alleging in his plea, in what under process,¹ or as an officer in the course of duty,² or one justificapacity the lessor held the estate. It was held that the plea was sufficient. Howe v. Lewis, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 329.

1. Under Process.—Where the defendant, in an action of trespass, assault and battery, and false imprisonment, justifies under a certificate granted by a justice of the peace in pursuance of the act of Congress respecting fugitives from labor, the plea must show that all the facts existed, at the time of granting the certificate, contemplated by that act. Fanny v. Montgomery, 1 Ill. 247.

To an action of trespass against the selectmen of a town, for causing the goods of the plaintiff to be taken and sold for taxes, a plea justifying the taking and sale of the goods, for the payment of several distinct taxes, was held not to be double. Adams v. Mack, 3 N. H. 493.

In justification under mesne process, the cause of action for which the process was issued need not be stated. Linsley v. Keys, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 123.

In justifying, in trespass under a writ of replevin, the defendant must allege a taking of a bond before the delivery of the chattels, but need not allege a delivery of a bond before the taking of them. Moors v. Parker, 3 Mass. 310; Cushman v. Churchill, 7 Mass. 97.

Under Warrant.—A plea that the goods taken were seized by a deputy sheriff, by virtue of a warrant, as the property of an absconding debtor (setting forth the proceedings, and that the plaintiff held the goods by a fraudulent conveyance from the debtor), "and the defendant, in aid of, and by command of the deputy," etc., is good. Patcher v. Sprague, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 462.

In trespass, where defendant justifies under a writ of restitution issued on a judgment rendered in his favor in an action of unlawful detainer by a justice of the peace, it is not sufficient for him to plead the writ only, but he must also plead the judgment, giving the parties, the date, the justice by whom rendered, and the fact of his jurisdiction; or else set out the judgment in hac verba. Olmstead v. Thompson, (Ala. 1890), 8 So. Rep. 755.

In a plea of justification under a search warrant, it is not necessary to allege that the complaint was signed, or any minute made of the day, month, and year, when it was exhibited, or that any recognizance for cost was given, or that the warrant was returned. Nor is it necessary to state the ground of suspicion of the person praying out the warrant. Chipman v. Bates, 15 Vt. 51; 40 Am. Dec. 663.

Where the defendants in an action of trespass, attempt to justify the taking of the plaintiff's property, by their warrant, to satisfy a tax voted to be raised by a town, the plea must allege that the money was voted to be raised for necessary purposes; and it cannot be understood, by an allegation that "the town voted to raise $2,000 for the expenditure of that year," that it was raised for legal purposes. Adams v. Mack, 3 N. H. 493.

Act of Congress.—In trespass for breaking the plaintiff's close, and carrying away stone, a plea of justification under the act of Congress for constructing a national road must aver and set forth the facts that constitute the necessity for such an invasion of private right, or it is bad. Fulton v. Monahan, 4 Ohio 426.

2. Officers.—A defendant in trespass, justifying a taking, as having been made by him as constable, by virtue of an execution, need not set out the judgment in his plea. Burton v. Sweaney, 4 Mo. 1; Traylor v. McKeown, 12 Rich. (S. Car.) 251.

When a defendant in an action of trespass justified the taking by virtue of a writ directed to him as an officer, and the action was brought against him previous to the term of court at which such writ was returnable, a special plea setting up such writ and taking thereunder, was held good on general demurrer, notwithstanding it did not allege that the writ was returned at the term of the court to which it was made returnable. Briggs v. Mason, 31 Vt. 433.

In an action against a constable, for taking the property of the plaintiff, upon three executions against third persons, the constable filed a special plea, in which he set up an indemnifying bond executed by the plaintiffs in the executions. It was held that the plea need not set out the judgments on which the executions issued. Davis v. Davis, 2 Gratt. (Va.) 363.

In a plea of justification by a tax collector, it is not necessary to set forth the facts which show that the tax was lawful, but the presumption will be taken in favor of its legality. Clemmons v. Lewis, 36 Vt. 673.

fying an assault and battery,¹ must distinctly allege every essential fact. Where the declaration alleges distinct and different acts of trespass, the plea should cover all such allegations,² for a justification as to part of a trespass is not a good answer as to the whole.³ The plea must not deny the plaintiff's right of action argumentatively, but directly confess the plaintiff's right of action but for facts set up in the plea.⁴

In an action of trespass against a sheriff, for levying upon property, he must first show that the plaintiffs named in the execution were creditors, before he can defend by showing that he made the levy in accordance with an execution against other parties, supposed to be the owners of the property, and that the present plaintiff was a fraudulent purchaser. Cook v. Miller, 11 Ill. 610.

A party sued for acts done by him as a public officer, may, under 2 New York Rev. Stat. 353, §§ 28, 29, insist upon a former adjudication as conclusive without pleading it. Doty v. Brown, 4 N. Y. 71; 53 Am. Dec. 350.

In an action of trespass for taking twelve hogs, if defendant wishes to justify the taking by reason of his being an officer, he must allege and prove that fact. Case v. Hall, 21 Ill. 632.

Where, in an action of trespass, a county treasurer justified the taking of personal property for the non-payment of taxes, under a warrant of the county judge, attached to the tax list, commanding him to collect the taxes therein mentioned, he need not set out, with a copy of the warrant, the tax list nor a copy thereof. An averment in his answer of his readiness to produce the tax list, is all that is required. Games v. Robb, 8 Iowa 193.

In an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., et de bonis asportatis, brought against a justice for issuing an attachment against the goods of the plaintiff as an absent or absconding debtor, without legal proof of the fact of concealment, the restoration of the property attached to the plaintiff cannot be pleaded in bar of the action, nor pais darrein continuance; but it may be admitted as evidence, in mitigation of damages. Vosburgh v. Welch, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 175.

1. Assault and Battery.—In an action for assault, battery, and imprisonment, if the plea to it professes to answer the assault, etc., and imprisonment, the, etc., will make the plea broad enough to answer the battery complained of. Bryan v. Bates, 15 Ill. 87.

In an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., and for an assault, battery and wounding, the defendants pleaded that the plaintiff had felled a tree across a navigable stream, down which they were conducting a boat, and that to enable them to proceed it was necessary to remove the obstruction; and that the plaintiff stood upon it with an ax, threatening to resist the removal; and they therefore gently laid hands upon him, etc. It was held that the plea was insufficient, as it did not justify the wounding. The defendants also pleaded, that the public had a prescriptive right to navigate the stream; that the plaintiff obstructed it; that they attempted to remove the obstruction, and the plaintiff having assaulted them, they, in self-defense beat and wounded him "a little," using only such force as was necessary to remove the obstruction. To this plea the plaintiff demurred. It was held that the facts pleaded were prima facie a justification of the wounding, the demurrer admitting such an assault on the part of the plaintiff, as made it necessary. If the wounding by the defendants was not a necessary consequence of the assault by the plaintiff, there should have been a replication to that effect. Brubaker v. Paul, 7 Dana (Ky.) 428; 32 Am. Dec. 111.

2. Separate Acts of Trespass in Declaration Must Be Answered by Plea.—Curlewis v. Laurie, 12 Q. B. 640; 64 E. C. L. 638; Grout v. Knapp, 40 Vt. 163.

3. Justification of Part of Trespass Is No Justification as to Whole.—Rogers v. Spence, 12 C. & F. 700; Parker v. Parker, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 236; Monprivatt v. Smith, 2 Camp. 175.

4. Must Not Be Argumentative.—Simpson v. Coe, 3 N. H. 12; Dorman v. Long, 2 Barb. (N. Y.) 214; Nevins

d. UNNECESSARY AVERMENTS IN PLEA.—Any unnecessary averments in the declaration, as matters of aggravation, need not be answered in plea.¹

e. DEMURRER TO PLEA.—The plea may be shown to be bad on demurrer,² which, if there is more than one defendant, may sometimes go to the benefit of all.³

3. Replication.—The replication need only answer the material averments of the plea.⁴ It is a general rule of pleading that

v. Keeler, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 63; Dutton v. Holden, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 643.

1. Matter stated in the declaration as matter of aggravation of damages need not be answered in plea. Law v. Hempstead, 10 Conn. 22; Grout v. Knapp, 40 Vt. 163; Bracegirdle v. Orford, 2 M. & S. 77; Donohue v. Dyer, 23 Ind. 521.

Under a complaint for breaking and carrying away goods, a plea justifying breaking is sufficient. Herndon v. Bartlett, 4 Port (Ala.) 481; Pratt v. Pratt, 6 D. & L. 20.

2. Plea Bad on Demurrer.—In trespass for an assault and imprisonment, B pleaded that he was a constable; that a felony had been committed; that a reasonable suspicion and belief existed that the plaintiff was guilty of said felony; that one A, and others, informed him, the defendant, that the plaintiff was guilty of said felony, and that, for the purpose of carrying the plaintiff before some justice of the peace to be dealt with, he had gently arrested him. It was held on general demurrer, that the plea was bad, for not showing that his informant stated the facts by which he knew or believed the plaintiff to be guilty, and for not setting out those facts. Wasson v. Canfield, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 406.

If, in an action of trespass on the person, matters are pleaded specially which do not constitute in law a justification of the trespass, an objection to such pleading may properly be sustained. McGehee v. Shafer, 9 Tex. 20.

Where, in an action of trespass before the court for the trial of small causes, the defendant pleads title to land, and the plaintiff brings suit in the supreme court, to which defendant interposes other pleas besides that of title, the question of legality thereof cannot be raised on demurrer, but on motion to strike them out. Cross v. Kemp, 45 N. J. L. 51.

3. In trespass against two defendants, they severed in their pleas. To the plea of one, the plaintiff demurred generally, and judgment was given against the demurrer. The other defendant pleaded that judgment in bar, averring that the action against him was for the same trespass. It was held that the demurrer did not estop the plaintiff from replying to the other plea and the defendant from going to trial, and recovering judgment. Lansing v. Montgomery, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 382.

Foote v. Cincinnati, 9 Ohio 31; 34 Am. Dec. 420, holds that general demurrer, in an action of trespass vi et armis, must, if sustained, inure to the advantage of all the defendants, when the act complained of could not, either in point of fact or of law, be joint.

4. Austin v. Waddell, 10 Mo. 705; M'Gee v. Givan, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 16. Where defendant pleads his improvements by way of set-off to plaintiff's claim for the wrongful use and occupation of his land, plaintiff may reply by setting up an occupation before the six years to which his recovery otherwise would be limited by statute. Hyatt v. Cochran, 85 Ind. 231.

Where, in trespass against one for assault and battery and false imprisonment, the defendant, an officer, pleaded the general issue to all except the false imprisonment, and as to that a special plea, setting forth that the arrest was made under a warrant, it was held that a replication protesting the warrant, and its delivery to the defendant to be executed, and then replying de injuria sua absque residuo causæ was good. Stickle v. Richmond, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 77.

In trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's close and stable, and taking away two horses, the plea was, that an execution of fi. fa. against a third person, was delivered to the sheriff, etc.; that the horses belonged to the execution debtor and were subject to the execution; that the sheriff by virtue of the execution, and the defendants by his command, broke and entered into the close and stable, and took the horses, etc. The replication was, that the horses did not belong to the execution debtor, but to the plaintiff. It was held on general demurrer, that the replication was sufficient. M'Gee v. Givan, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 16.

In trespass against an overseer of roads for entering land of the plaintiff, and cutting and carrying away timber, the defendant pleaded that he took the timber to repair bridges, "it being the nearest unimproved land to said bridges," etc. The plaintiff replied that it was not the nearest unimproved land, etc. It was held that the plea asserted two facts, and that the replication traversed both, and was sufficient. Austin v. Waddell, 10 Mo. 705.

Where, in trespass, the defendant pleads title, and the plaintiff replies facts which show that he was in possession at the time, and that the right of possession was out of the defendant, or those under whom he entered, though the title set up is not legally ousted in the plaintiff, the replication is good. Phillips v. Kent, 23 N. J. L. 155.

In an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., if the defendant excuses the entry, by alleging that he entered to remove a dam which flowed the land of which he was lawfully in possession, the plaintiff cannot, in avoidance of the defense, set up a title to the land flowed, which was acquired by him subsequently to the removal of the dam. Great Falls Co. v. Worster, 15 N. H. 412.

1. Materiality of Issue.—In trespass for breaking the plaintiff's close, and carrying away his lumber, the defendant pleaded soil and freehold in himself and others, and that his co-tenants had assigned the premises to him to pile his lumber in and justified the moving the lumber. The plaintiff replied that it was assigned to another of the co-tenants, and justified putting the lumber on the close, under him. A rejoinder, admitting that such person had been co-tenant, but alleging a conveyance by him before the trespass, was held to be a departure. Keay v. Goodwin, 16 Mass. 1.

To a plea in trespass de bonis asportatis of property in a stranger, and not in the plaintiff, and a justification as a deputy sheriff, a replication de injuria sua, traversing the property in the stranger, was held to present an immaterial issue. Gerrish v. Train, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 124.

In trespass for an assault and battery, a replication to a plea that the plaintiff made the first assault, that the defendant broke open the dwelling house of the plaintiff and beat him, and that the plaintiff, in defending himself, gently laid his hand on the defendant, which was the same assault in the plea mentioned, with a verification, was held bad for uncertainty. Sampson v. Henry, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 379.

In trespass for destroying a milldam, the defendants pleaded that said dam was unlawfully erected, whereby a public road and ford were obstructed, to the damage and nuisance of the citizens of the commonwealth, and that the defendants, in order to abate the nuisance, peaceably cut down and removed the dam. The plaintiff replied that said dam did not entirely obstruct said public road and ford, and that the citizens of the commonwealth were not altogether prevented from passing the same. Upon issue joined, verdict was for the plaintiff. It was held that the issue was immaterial, and that a replender should be awarded. Dimmett v. Eskridge, 6 Munf. (Va.) 308.

In trespass qu. cl., the defendant pleaded a license; upon which the plaintiff took issue. It was held that, under such issue, the plaintiff might prove that the license was obtained by fraud, without specially replying fraud, a license so obtained being not voidable only, but void. Anthony v. Wilson, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 303.

In trespass qu. cl. fr., if the defendant pleads in bar, that the locus in quo is parcel of a close called A, and that A is the soil and freehold of the defendant, the plea is merely a plea of soil and freehold, and the plaintiff may reply, that the locus in quo is the soil and freehold of the plaintiff, and not of the defendant, and conclude to the country. Simpson v. Coe, 3 N. H. 12.

To a plea in trespass qu. cl., that the close is part of a highway, and that the plaintiff wrongfully incumbered it with a gate, the plaintiff may reply a prescription to maintain a gate to be shut by persons passing through, without traversing the highway, or the wrongful incumbering by the gate. Spear v. Bicknell, 5 Mass. 125.

If a plea in trespass justifies the if not, a repleader¹ may be awarded, or advantage taken by demurrer.² Care must be taken that the replication be free from ambiguity, duplicity, or uncertainty.³ Where there is a plea of gist of the action, and the plaintiff wishes to prove that the defendant exceeded the right or authority alleged in his justification, the excess must be pleaded specially. West v. Blake, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 234.

1. Repleader.—Where a defendant, in an action of trespass for cutting down a dam, alleged in his plea that he was possessed of an undivided moiety of a certain tract of land, flowed by means of the dam, and the plaintiffs replied that they were seised in fee and in mortgage, and had the rights of possession, and issue was taken upon the rejoinder, that they had not the right of possession, it was held that the issue was immaterial, and a repleader was awarded. Great Falls Co. v. Worster, 15 N. H. 412.

If to a plea of "justification" only, in trespass, the plaintiff replies generally, no issue is joined in the cause, and, therefore, after verdict for the defendant, a repleader will be avoided. Kerr v. Dixon, 2 Call (Va.) 379.

2. Demurrer.—Where in trespass q. cl. fr., the declaration was general, describing no particular close, and the defendant, in his plea, described a large close, in which he alleged that the act complained of was committed, and to which he pleaded title, and the plaintiff replied, newly assigning a small close, parcel of the large one, as the place where the trespass was done, which he alleged was his own soil and freehold, and traversed the title of the defendant to the whole of the large close; to which the defendant rejoined, that he was not guilty of any trespass in the small close, and concluded to the country, it was held, on demurrer, that the plaintiff's traverse of the defendant's title to the whole cause was an immaterial traverse, which the defendant might well pass by; and that the rejoinder was good. Low v. Ross, 3 Me. 256; Dyson v. Wood, 3 B. & C. 449; Woods v. Durrant, 16 M. & W. 149.

In trespass for entering on plaintiff's premises, the complaint alleged, by way of aggravation, an attempt by defendant to seduce plaintiff's wife. The reply admitted defendant's plea of license to enter, but alleged that such license was obtained by defendant's fraudulently representing that he wanted to use a certain implement theretofore borrowed by plaintiff, whereas he did not want to use the implement at all, but intended from the beginning to seduce and debauch plaintiff's wife. It was held that a demurrer to the reply was properly sustained. Bennett v. McIntire, 121 Ind. 231.

3. Ambiguity, Duplicity, and Uncertainty. Repleader. Replication Bad.—Loweth v. Smith, 12 M. & W. 582. Where, in an action of trespass for driving a wagon, on the highway, against a carriage in which the plaintiff was riding, by means of which she was thrown out and injured, defendant pleaded that, at the time of the collision, the defendant was on the right side, and the plaintiff on the wrong side, of the highway, and the plaintiff, in her replication, averred that the traveled part of the highway was fifty feet wide, that the plaintiff was proceeding easterly at the rate of a mile in twelve minutes, and the defendant westerly at the rate of a mile in four minutes; that the plaintiff's wagon was within one foot of the side of the traveled part of the highway on her left hand; that there was a space of traveled road fifteen feet wide between the plaintiff's wagon and the center, over which the defendant might have passed without interference or interruption; and that defendant, just before the wagons came in contact, drove his wagon across such last mentioned space, and unnecessarily ran against plaintiff's carriage, and that the collision happened without any carelessness on the part of plaintiff, or on the part of her driver; but the replication did not aver any valid excuse for the plaintiff's being on the wrong side of the road, or that the defendant intentionally inflicted the injury, it was held that the replication was defective. Burdick v. Worral, 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 596.

In Great Falls Co. v. Worster, 15 N. H. 412, it was held that where the defendant, in an action of trespass q. cl. fr., pleads or insists upon a right, title, or interest in the close in question, the general replication de injuria is bad; but if the title alleged is to something else, and is only stated as inducement to an excuse for entering, the general replication is proper and sufficient.

liberum tenementum, and justification of removal of goods which are the subject of the trespass, a replication to the latter is sufficient.¹ Care must be taken that the plaintiff in the replication does not admit the defense.²

4. Rejoinder.—The pleadings in trespass admit of further answers

Where, to an action of trespass for entering the plaintiff's close and tearing down a dam there erected, the defendant pleads that the dam caused an injury to the land of third persons, and that he entered as their servant, for the purpose of abating it, the plea insists upon no right, title or interest, within the meaning of this rule, but sets up the title in the other lands as matter of excuse for making an entry upon the land of the plaintiff. The title of the person under whom the defendant entered is set forth as matter of inducement to excuse or justify the entry, and the replication de injuria is sufficient. If, to such action of trespass, the defendant pleads that he was possessed of an undivided moiety of certain land which was flowed by the plaintiff's dam, and that therefore he entered and took it down, a replication that the plaintiffs were seised of the whole tract in fee and in mortgage, and had the right of possession, and therefore, by means of the dam, caused the water to overflow it, is insufficient.

1. Darlington v. Pritchard, 5 Scott N. R. 10.

Libera Tenementum.—In trespass qu. cl. fr., where the defendant pleaded not guilty, and a justification "that the land in question was his freehold," it was held that the plaintiff ought to reply to the justification, as well as join issue upon the plea of not guilty. Mangum v. Flowers, 2 Munf. (Va.) 205.

A replication of a possession in virtue of a parol purchase, is good to the plea of liberum tenementum. Hope v. Cason, 3 B. Mon. (Ky.) 544.

In trespass qu. cl., to a plea of liberum tenementum, the plaintiff must reply, either by traversing the title set up, or by admitting the source of the derivative title and stating a title in himself paramount to that of the defendant. Hyatt v. Wood, 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 150; 4 Am. Dec. 258.

Replication de Injuria.—In trespass, de bonis asportatis, a replication of de injuria, etc., to a plea, stating that the goods were seized as forfeited to the United States, and were condemned in the district court, is bad.

Such replication is good only where the matter alleged in the plea is by way of excuse, and not where it is insisted on as giving a right. Plumb v. M'Crea, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 491.

Where the defendant in an action of trespass, pleads, under the New York act (1 Rev. Laws 155), that the trespass was done by authority of a statute of this state, without expressing any other matter or circumstance contained in such statute, the plaintiff must reply, de injuria sua propria, concluding to the country. A general replication, concluding with an averment, is bad. Comly v. Lockwood, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 188.

Where the defendant, in an action of trespass, denies the trespass, for that the close broken and the goods taken were the property of himself, or of another, by whose authority he acted, there the plaintiff cannot reply de injuria, etc., but must in his replication, traverse the right or interest set up in the plea. Berry v. Cahanan, 7 N. J. L. 77.

In an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., the plea was justification under a writ of possession. It was held that a replication to this plea, alleging that a supersedeas was issued and served, was defective, without a direct averment that a certiorari had been issued; and that the mere statement, by way of recital, in the supersedeas of a certiorari would not cure the defect, as no issue could be taken on such recital. McWilliams v. King, 32 N. J. L. 21.

2. Admission of Plea by Replication.—

In an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., where the declaration alleged the cutting down of the plaintiff's trees, the defendant set up in justification that the acts complained of were done lawfully by him, as an overseer of the highways. The plaintiff, without traversing this plea, made a new assignment, setting forth that he brought his action, not only for the trespasses so attempted to be justified, but also for entering and cutting down trees on other occasions, etc. It was held that the plaintiff thereby admitted the truth of the justification, and could not recover for the trespasses to which it applied. Davidson v. Schenck, 31 N. J. L. 174.

by the plaintiff or defendant, as in other causes of action, and it sometimes happens that a rejoinder is necessary.¹

5. New Assignment.—This is a restatement of the cause of action by the plaintiff with more particularity and certainty, but consistently with the statement in the declaration.² In trespass, where the defendant has justified the trespass complained of, it alleges that the plaintiff has brought the action, not for the cause supposed by the defendant, but for some other cause, to which the plea has no application.³ There may be several new assignments.⁴ In effect it is of the nature of a new declaration.⁵ The sufficiency or insufficiency of a new assignment will depend on the circumstances, the manner in which it is framed, and mode in which applied.⁶ Objection to insufficiency should be made

1. Rejoinder.—Cases under this head arise, where the defendant neglects to rejoin, when the state of the pleadings renders it necessary, or where there is some alleged defect in the rejoinder. To a plea of liberum tenementum and leave and license, the plaintiff denied the license and replied to the other plea a demise from year to year. The defense (which was sought to be proved by the admissions of the plaintiff), was, that at the time of the letting, the plaintiff had agreed to give up the possession whenever the defendant required the land. It was held that the stipulation to give up possession should have been made the subject of a rejoinder, and that it could not be gone into under the plea of leave and license. Waterman on Trespass, vol. 2, § 1037.

A declaration by S. in trespass, charged W., the defendant, with entering a dwelling house at eleven o'clock at night and seizing and carrying away certain liquors. W. pleaded the acts to be under command of A., a lawful constable, serving a warrant, etc. S. replied that A. was not a lawful constable, because he had not given the statutory bond. W. rejoined that, though A. had not given such bond, he had been lawfully elected a constable, had exercised the office, and so was an officer de facto, and that therefore W. might lawfully submit to A.'s command. On demurrer to the rejoinder, it was held that the service was at an unlawful hour, and was not in issue. Soudant v. Wadhams, 46 Conn. 218.

In trespass qu. cl., the defendant pleaded that he was put into possession of the land by a writ of hab. fa.; the plaintiff replied, de injuria sua, etc., to which the defendant rejoined, that he entered by virtue of the writ of

hab. fa., and concluded to the country. On demurrer to the rejoinder, judgment was given for the plaintiff. Lewis v. Cooke, 1 Har. & M. (Md.) 159.

4. 1 Chitty Pl. 614; Bacon Abr. "Trespass" (1 4, 2).

5. Effect.—When the declaration in trespass qu. cl., only counts upon a single act of trespass, which the defendant justifies by matter set forth in his plea, the plaintiff cannot in replication traverse the matter of such justification, and also newly assign the same or different acts of trespass. A traverse with de injuria should conclude to the country. Spencer v. Bemis, 46 Vt. 29.

The traverse of a justification of a single act of trespass, together with a new assignment, is defective for duplicity. Stults v. Buckelew, 28 N. J. L. 150.

The general issue in trespass qu. cl., notwithstanding a subsequent new assignment, continues to be an answer to the whole cause of action. Stewart v. Henry, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 445.

Where a plaintiff newly assigns, without denying the special plea in an action of trespass, he confines the issue to such trespasses as are alleged in the new assignment. Bragg v. Wetzel, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 95.

A new assignment is a waiver of the cause of action justified by the plea. Bartlett v. Prescott, 41 N. H. 493.

6. Sufficiency.—Waterman on Trespass, vol. 2, § 1032. In Harvey v. Lankerster, 14 Jur. 982, the declaration alleged that defendant broke and entered a certain shop, rooms, and apart-

by demurrer.¹ A new assignment usually becomes necessary where some special plea has been filed.² It is unnecessary if it adds nothing to the allegations made in the declaration.³

ments, part and parcel of plaintiff's house; to this defendant by plea justified the entry under license of plaintiff, that he broke and entered "the said shop, rooms, and apartments in the declaration mentioned, being one and the same, and not different apartments," and stayed there for a reasonable time only. To this the plaintiff replied, that the defendant of his own wrong, etc., committed the trespass in the plea mentioned, and newly assigned that the plaintiff brought her action, not only for the trespasses in the plea mentioned, but also for that the defendant continued in the shop a much longer time than in the plea mentioned, and also at the time when, etc., broke and entered two other rooms and apartments behind the said shop, to wit, etc., being other rooms and apartments than in the declaration mentioned, and other and different from the said shop, and stayed, etc., which were of her and different trespasses from those in the plea. To this new assignment there was a special demurrer, on the ground that it charged a further trespass, and was a departure. The demurrer was overruled.

The necessity and effect of a new assignment in pleading in actions of trespass, has been determined, in cases depending upon peculiar circumstances in Perry v. Carr, 42 Vt. 50; Warner v. Hoisington, 42 Vt. 94.

1. Lethbridge v. Winter, 8 Moore 326. In an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., where there is a novel assignment, the plea, professing to answer the whole of the new assignment, must answer the whole, or it will be bad, on general demurrer. Price v. Perry, 1 Mo. 543.

2. When Necessary.—In trespass, on plea of son assault demesne, and replication de injuria, plaintiff may show the assault unnecessary in self-defense; but if he would justify his own assault, he must newly assign the matter of justification. Elliott v. Kilburn, 2 Vt. 470.

Where a defendant, instead of pleading liberum tenementum to a general court in trespass, pleads the general issue with notice, under which he proves his freehold, the plaintiff may newly assign by testimony proving the locus in quo and his own title or possession. Williams v. Holmes, 2 Wis. 129.

In trespass qu. cl. fr., if a portion of the declaration sets forth injuries which admit of being construed as a matter of aggravation merely, the defendant is at liberty to adopt his construction, and make such a plea as will be a good defense to the gist of the action only; and if the plaintiff wishes to avail himself of such a construction of his declaration as makes the injuries first mentioned part of the gist of his action, he must bring the matter forward by new assignment. Grout v. Knapp, 40 Vt. 163.

Where a statute forbids the special plea of liberum tenementum, to an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., and requires that defense to be made by evidence, such a defense, if raised by the evidence, should be met by a new assignment of the abutments of the plaintiff's close, which can only be done by evidence. Emerson v. Sturgeon, 18 Mo. 170.

The defendants pleaded liberum tenementum, and the plaintiffs replied by way of new assignment, as follows: That the piece of land in the declaration mentioned, was and is a certain close, situated etc., and bounded as follows, etc.; that said close now is, and at said time when, etc., was in the lawful and peaceable possession of the plaintiff; which said close now is, and at said time when, etc., was, another and different close from the said close in the said plea mentioned, and therein alleged to be the soil and freehold of the defendant. It was held that the new assignment was sufficient. Halsey v. Matthews, 3 Ind. 404.

If an officer justifies in trespass, under a legal warrant, an act relied on to make him a trespasser ab initio should be newly assigned. Jarratt v. Gwathmey, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 238.

An averment of time under a vide licet is not traversable; and where, in an action of trespass, the plea justifies the whole time thus averred, the plaintiff must newly assign, if he desires to go for the unreasonable continuance in his premises. Straight v. Hanchett, 23 Ill. App. 584.

3. When Unnecessary.—The plaintiff brought an action of trespass for breaking and entering his close, which was particularly described in the declaration, and for cutting certain trees

IX. EVIDENCE—1. Admissibility.—Evidence can usually be admitted relative to any material fact stated in pleading.¹

a. UNDER THE GENERAL ISSUE.—Under the general issue, the plaintiff may show possession, that the possession is legal, and that he has title.² The defendant may give any matter which contradicts the allegations that the plaintiff is bound to prove.³

there. The defendant pleaded not guilty as to all except a certain portion of said close, which he described by specific boundaries, tendering an issue to the country; and as to that portion he justified, averring that it was his soil and freehold. The plaintiff traversed the justification, concluding to the country, and then newly assigned the trespass. It was held that the pleas covered the whole matter alleged in the declaration; that it was duly in issue for trial without the new assignment; and that the latter was therefore bad. Leave to withdraw the new assignment was ordered. Smith v. Powers, 13 N. H. 216.

If, in an action of trespass, the defendant pleads the general issue, accompanied with a notice of special matter in the defense by way of justification under process of law, the whole merits of the question are thereby opened, and a new assignment is not necessary to enable the plaintiff to recover on the matter alleged in the declaration by way of aggravation, as for a distinct and substantive cause of action. Fullan v. Stearns, 30 Vt. 443.

In an action of assault and battery, the declaration alleged generally that the defendants assaulted the plaintiff, "and then and there, with great force and violence, most wantonly and shamefully pushed, shoved, and dragged at, on, and pinched the said plaintiff," etc. The defendants pleaded their lawful possession of the premises on which the supposed trespass was committed, and that the plaintiff, being requested to leave, refused to do so, and that they used no more force than was necessary to expel her. The plaintiff replied de injuria, etc. It was held that the replication was sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover for the excess of force, if any was proven, and that no new assignment was necessary or proper. Thomas v. Black (Del. 1889), 18 Atl. Rep. 771.

A new assignment in an action for a trespass, setting forth more particularly the cause of action relied upon, is not necessary, nor allowable under the code. Stewart v. Wallis, 30 Barb. (N. Y.) 344.

In trespass qu. cl. fr., if the defendant pleads not guilty to the whole trespass alleged, with or without a brief statement, the plaintiff has no occasion to make a new assignment. Palmer v. Dougherty, 33 Me. 502; 54 Am. Dec. 636.

1. Cowlshaw v. Cheslyn, 1 C. & J. 48; Knapp v. Slocomb, 9 Gray (Mass.) 73; Fry v. Monckton, 2 M. & R. 303; Shelton v. Alcox, 11 Conn. 240.

2. Hunter v. Hatton, 4 Gill (Md.) 115; 45 Am. Dec. 117; Stone v. Hubbard, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 217; Printz v. Cheeney, 11 Iowa 469; Altmore v. Hufsmith, 45 Pa. St. 121. If the defendant, in an action of trespass, gives a special notice of his matter of justification under the general issue, in pursuance of the statute, in Vermont, the plaintiff, on trial, may avail himself of every matter which he might have successfully newly assigned, if the defendant had pleaded his defense specially. Keyes v. Howe, 18 Vt. 411.

In trespass qu. cl., originally commenced before a justice of the peace, the defendant cannot, in the court of common pleas, under the general issue, object that the plaintiff has not proved his possession. Stone v. Hubbard, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 217.

Where in trespass qu. cl. before a justice of the peace, the general issue only is pleaded, and the action carried up by appeal, the defendant cannot bring the title in issue either by brief statement or any evidence. Fillebrown v. Webster, 14 Me. 441.

If a defendant in trespass, having pleaded not guilty, introduces evidence of facts which go to confess and avoid the plaintiff's right of action, the plaintiff may introduce rebutting evidence. Hunt v. Turner, 9 Tex. 385; 60 Am. Dec. 167.

Plaintiff cannot show charter in mitigation of damages. Russell v. Shuster, 8 W. & S. (Pa.) 308.

3. Rawson v. Morse, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 27; Murray v. Webster, 5 N. H. 391.

Defendant May Prove Any Acts Denying Materially Allegations of Plaintiff.—In trespass, all the circumstances of the transaction may be shown, under the general issue, although no notice was given. Sutherland v. Ingalls, 63 Mich. 620.

Where, in an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., brought before a justice of the peace, the defendant pleads only the general issue, evidence, in the court of common pleas, that the plaintiff was not possessed of the land, is precluded by the Massachusetts Act of 1783, ch. 42, § 2. Lynch v. Rosseter, 6 Pick. (Mass.) 419.

In an action of trespass, where the general issue is pleaded, all the acts and circumstances directly connected with and attendant upon the transaction complained of, are competent for either party to prove as tending to favor or rebut the presumption of malice; but that is the extent of the rule under this plea. Perkins v. Towle, 43 N. H. 220; 80 Am. Dec. 149.

A defendant, under the general issue, cannot prove title in a stranger under whom he does not justify. Todd v. Jackson, 26 N. J. L. 525; Beach v. Livergood, 15 Ind. 496.

If an action against a railroad company, for the alleged unlawful taking of land, is brought by a subsequent owner of the premises, the company may prove, under the general issue, that they obtained the consent of the person who owned the land at the time of their taking possession. Central R. Co. v. Hetfield, 29 N. J. L. 206.

The owner of a sleigh conveyed it in mortgage to S., and afterwards delivered it in pledge to F., and R., by the authority and direction of S., took possession of the sleigh. In an action of trespass by F. against R., it was held, that evidence of said mortgage and authority was admissible, under the general issue, as an answer to the action. Fuller v. Rounceville, 29 N. H. 554.

A complaint, in an action appealed from a justice of the peace, stated that plaintiff was in possession of a farm through which the waters of the inlet to a lake were allowed to pass; that defendant raised the upper dam of the outlet of the lake, so that the waters of the lake and inlet backed up and overflowed plaintiff's farm, damaging his crops. Defendant attempted to oust the justice of jurisdiction by raising the issue of title to real estate, filing bond for removal, etc., and, in addition, pleaded the general issue. It was held that even if under the steps taken by defendant an issue as to title could not be tried on appeal to the county court, defendant was entitled, under his general issue, to show that the legislature had appropriated the dam for the use of the Erie Canal, and authorized the canal commissioners to increase its height, and to appropriate lands and water-rights necessary for the purpose, and that his actions with respect thereto were under authority of the state superintendent of public works, and that consequently plaintiff's remedy, if any, was against the state. Shaver v. Eldred (Supreme Ct.), 15 N. Y. Supp. 930.

In trespass against a constable for arresting a plaintiff and imprisoning him, the declaration stated that it was done without reasonable or probable cause. It was held that the defendant might, under the general issue, give evidence of the contents of the plaintiff's trunk, for the purpose of showing that he was addicted to burglary. Russell v. Shuster, 8 W. & S. (Pa.) 308.

In an action of trespass for taking goods, the defendant may, under the general issue, prove that the goods were taken as a distress for rent. Reed v. Stoney, 2 Rich. (S. Car.) 401.

In trespass qu. cl., a right of way over the close may be shown by the defendant under the general issue. Stropt v. Berry, 7 Mass. 385.

In trespass qu. cl., the defendant may under the general issue, show soil and freehold in himself. Monumoi v. Rogers, 1 Mass. 159.

In trespass qu. cl., the defendant may give in evidence, under the general issue, that the locus in quo was a private road belonging to himself. Saunders v. Wilson, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 338.

In an action of trespass, in a plea of "not guilty," the defendant may prove a prior possession, in the place where, etc. Baker v. Pearce, 4 Har. & M. (Md.) 502.

Under the general issue in trespass qu. cl. fr., where the plaintiff relies upon possession without title, the defendant may show that the close which he broke was not the plaintiff's close, but the close of a third party under whom he entered. Reynolds v. Baker, 4 Cranch (C. C.) 104.

In trespass on the case, anything is admissible in evidence, under the general issue, that shows that the defendant is not guilty of anything actionable

License to do the acts complained of cannot be given under the general issue, as such license should be specially pleaded.¹ Acts of justification should also be specially pleaded, and evidence as to such acts cannot be given under the general issue.²

b. AS TO ACTS DONE UNDER AUTHORITY OF LAW OR PROTECTION OF PROCESS.—An officer sued for trespass has the right to show by evidence the authority for his acts; that he was in respect to the matters charged in the declaration. Jerome v. Smith, 48 Vt. 230; 21 Am. Rep. 125.

In an action of trespass, under the plea of not guilty the defendant cannot give in evidence matter in discharge. Austin v. Norris, 11 Vt. 38.

1. License Must Be Specially Pleased.—Evidence as to license cannot be given under the general issue. Gambling v. Prince, 2 Nott & M. (S. Car.) 138; Hollenbeck v. Rowley, 8 Allen (Mass.) 473; Sawyer v. Newland, 9 Vt. 383. But see Cox v. Dove, Mart. Dec. (N. Car.) 43; Rasor v. Qualls, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 286; 30 Am. Dec. 658; Rawson v. Morse, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 127. To the contrary, Ward v. Bartlett, 12 Allen (Mass.) 419; Gronour v. Daniels, 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 108.

2. Evidence as to Justification Cannot Be Given Under General Issue.—Wolf v. Holton, 61 Mich. 550; State v. Beckner (Ind. 1891), 26 N. E. Rep. 553; Butterworth v. Soper, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 443; Drake v. Barrymore, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 166; Collins v. Perkins, 31 Vt. 624; Briggs v. Mason, 31 Vt. 433; Ferris v. Brown, 3 Barb. (N. Y.) 105; Hunter v. Harris, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 126; Strong v. Hobbs, 20 Vt. 185; Stow v. Scribner, 6 N. H. 24; Simpson v. Watrus, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 619; Demick v. Chapman, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 132.

Where, after an attachment of a boat, a bond was given for the discharge of the boat, and the court afterwards rendered judgment, ordering a sale of the boat, and she was accordingly sold on the execution, and the plaintiff received satisfaction under such execution, and the owner of the boat brought trespass against the plaintiff in the execution, who pleaded not guilty, it was held that the judgment ordering a sale was erroneous, but that the judgment and execution would have been a sufficient justification to the plaintiff in the execution, if properly pleaded to the trespass; that the action should have been assumpsit for money had and received, and not trespass; but that the justification could not be set up under the plea of not guilty, and that the owner of the boat was therefore entitled to judgment. St. Louis Perpetual Ins. Co. v. Ford, 11 Mo. 295.

Where the defendant, in an action of trespass to try title, pleads a general denial, and "not guilty," and also a special defense, he may prove any fact in rebuttal of plaintiff's testimony, but cannot introduce evidence in confession and avoidance, except as specially pleaded. Koenigheim v. Miles, 67 Tex. 113.

In an action of trespass brought by a tenant against his landlord for distress wrongfully made, the defendant cannot justify the taking under the plea of the general issue, unless the goods were taken and seized upon the demised premises. Oliver v. Phelps, 20 N. J. L. 180.

In an action of trespass for breaking and entering the house of the plaintiff, the defendant cannot, under the plea of not guilty, give in evidence matter of justification or excuse, such as that the breaking and entry complained of were by virtue of an execution issued out of the court for the trial of small causes, in New Jersey, against a third person; but such matter must be pleaded specially. Carson v. Wilson, 11 N. J. L. 43; 19 Am. Dec. 368.

In an action of trespass for taking oysters from the river where the plaintiff had planted them, the defendant cannot show, under the general issue, that the river was a public river, and that it was lawful for all citizens to take them; but that matter must be pleaded specially. Shreeves v. Liveson, 2 N. J. L. 247.

In ejectione firmæ, which is an action of trespass against the defendant for ejecting the plaintiff from his farm, under the general issue of not guilty, if the parties were tenants in common, the plaintiff, in order to recover, must prove an ouster by the defendant. Higbee v. Rice, 5 Mass. 344; 4 Am. Dec. 63; Chapman v. Gray, 15 Mass. 439.

an officer,¹ that he was authorized under some process to commit the act complained of,² that such process was regular and valid;³ or, if the alleged trespasser has committed the supposed trespass

1. Evidence as to Office.—In an action of trespass against a sheriff, in which he is declared against personally and not as sheriff, it is competent to prove that the defendant was sheriff, and that his deputy, as such, committed the trespass. Poinsett v. Taylor, 6 Cal. 78.

Where, in an action for tearing down and removing the plaintiff's house, the defendant justified as road supervisor, and that the house was an obstruction of the highway, it was held that the exclusion of evidence that the road was left in as bad a condition as before, etc., tending to show that the office was used as a cloak to injure the plaintiff, was error. Wilding v. Hough, 37 Iowa 446.

In trespass qu. cl., where defendant, a deputy sheriff, justifies under a warrant commanding him to "search the premises occupied by J. M.," evidence that J. M. was commonly reputed to be the occupant of the premises is admissible, though they were in fact owned and occupied by his wife, the plaintiff. Metcalf v. Weed (N. H. 1890), 19 Atl. Rep. 1091.

In an action of trespass for killing a slave, the defendant pleaded the general issue, and, at the trial, gave in evidence, by way of justification, that he was acting as a patrolman, under section 44, of the Georgia Act of 1770. It was held that the defendant was not sued for putting in execution any of the powers contained in that act, and that so much of that act as was repugnant to the judiciary act of 1799, which required the defendant plainly, fully, and distinctly to set forth his defense in writing, was repealed by the latter act. Brooks v. Ashburn, 9 Ga. 297.

2. Evidence as to Protection by Process.—In an action, by an officer who has seized goods on execution, against a third person, for taking them away, evidence of the seizure under execution is sufficient without producing the judgment. Blackley v. Sheldon, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 32.

An officer who arrests a person without a warrant, pursuant to the Massachusetts Act of 1855, ch. 215, § 13, and restrains him in a proper place and manner, cannot be proved to have acted maliciously. Kennedy v. Favor, 14 Gray (Mass.) 200.

A constable, who is sued in trespass for taking property which he attached as constable, may give in evidence, in justification, the mesne process on which he made the attachment, notwithstanding the direction of the writ is not in the form prescribed by the Revised Statutes, but is according to the former statute. Stewart v. Martin, 16 Vt. 397.

A deed signed and sealed by A and wife only, releasing to E their claim to certain slaves, with a reservation that they should be held by B and J as trustees for specified uses, is not sufficient evidence of property or possession, in the persons named as trustees, to enable them to maintain trespass for an injury done to such slaves. Kennedy v. Waller, 2 Hen. & M. (Va.) 415.

A constable sued for trespass has a right to show the circumstances under which he was on the premises, and for that purpose to introduce in evidence a distress warrant placed in his hands, even though the same was not levied. Forloun v. Bowlin, 29 Ill. App. 471.

Declarations of a defendant in an action of trespass for the removal of personal property, made during the removal, that he was acting under an execution against the owner, are no proof of that fact. To make such execution a justification, it must be set up in the pleadings and legally proved at the trial. Schultz v. Frank, 1 Wis. 352.

3. Regularity and Validity of Process.—In an action of trespass for carrying away personal property, if the defendant seeks to justify under a writ of replevin, he must show a valid writ, issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, attested in the usual form, particularly describing the property taken with sufficient certainty to identify it; or, in case the writ is lost or destroyed, its contents must be proved. 1874, Taylor v. Morrison, 73 Ill. 565.

Where the sheriff justifies under a fi. fa., it is not necessary in New York, that he show that it is returned; nor will the want of an indorsement, on the execution, of the time it was received by the sheriff, render it inadmissible in evidence; for the statute is merely directory to the sheriff on this point, and the time of receiving it may be shown by parol proof, or otherwise.

without the protection of process, he may have some other protection, such as a judgment.¹

c. AS TO MOTIVE.—Evidence as to motive is sometimes admissible for the purpose of showing the character of the trespass,² or enhancing the damages,³ or showing that it is probable that the Beals v. Guernsey, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 52; 5 Am. Dec. 348.

Where a sheriff is sued by a stranger for taking his goods in execution, the former must give in evidence both the record of the judgment and the fi. fa. High v. Wilson, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 46.

In an action of trespass, the plaintiff called one of the defendants, who testified to the taking and that it was done by virtue of a road warrant. It was held that this statement made no justification, for from it it did not appear that the warrant was in due and legal form, but the warrant itself should have been produced. Mericle v. Mulks, 1 Wis. 366.

1. Protection of Judgment.—In an action of trespass upon the real estate of the plaintiff, the pleadings, entries, and judgment in a former action of the plaintiff against one of the defendants, to recover possession of the real estate, where the judgment was for the defendant, but the entry of judgment contained a statement that the ground upon which the judgment was rendered was, that the defendant was the tenant of the plaintiff, and had received no notice to quit, were inadmissible as evidence for the plaintiff to show that he was the owner of the real estate. Sharkey v. Evans, 46 Ind. 472.

In an action for a trespass committed by defendant while erecting a fence on disputed ground, a judgment for defendant, in an action by plaintiff's father against defendant for tearing down a fence erected on the ground in question, is not admissible in evidence as showing the title of defendant to the ground and a right in him to erect the fence thereon. Fahey v. Crotty, 63 Mich. 383.

In an action of trespass for forcibly invading a plantation, carrying off some of the slaves, and frightening others away, after the defendant has offered in evidence in mitigation of damages, a judgment recovered in another state against the plaintiff as principal, and himself as surety, and a receipt for the payment of the judgment by himself, and that the plaintiff then resided with said slaves in that state, and promised not to remove his slaves therefrom until the judgment should be paid; the plaintiff in rebuttal may introduce evidence of two judgments held by himself against the defendant, and of the defendant's agreement to make an arrangement with the bank, holding the judgment against the plaintiff and defendant, to give time for the payment thereof, and to credit thereon the judgments against the defendant; and also the record of certain proceedings against the bank to prevent them from collecting debts, on which an injunction is issued. McAfee v. Crofford, 13 How. (U. S.) 447.

Declaration Under Oath.—A declaration, not upon oath, by a person not a party to the cause, that he committed the trespass for which the suit is brought, cannot be given in evidence to exculpate the defendant. Penner v. Cooper, 4 Munf. (Va.) 458.

2. Character of Trespass.—In trespass, the whole circumstances accompanying the act, and which were a part of the res gesta, may be proved, in order to show the temper and purposes with which the trespass was committed, and the extent of the injury. Ogden v. Gibbons, 5 N. J. L. 536.

In trespass, for the arrest of the plaintiff, on a charge of violating the Connecticut statute for the due observance of the Sabbath, it was held that the conduct of the plaintiff immediately preceding his arrest, was admissible to show with what intent the plaintiff was riding at the time of the arrest, the act being lawful or unlawful, according to the object or motive of the party. Ward v. Green, 11 Conn. 455.

Where, in an action to recover damages for an assault and battery committed on the person of the plaintiff, it appears from the evidence that the plaintiff cursed the defendant, and at the time he was stricken was in the act of rising from the chair in which he was sitting, with a stick in his hand, proof of the threats made by him against the defendant, within the preceding week or ten days, is admissible as tending to show the motive of the defendant's act. Watkins v. Gaston, 17 Ala. 664.

3. Evidence Enhancing Damages.—In act was committed by a certain person.¹ Irritating and abusive language may be shown in order to overcome a plea of justification.² When the action for trespass is a criminal action, evidence an action of trespass for entering on plaintiff's premises and carrying away her grain, where defendants justify under the authority of plaintiff's husband, the fact that one of defendants had been present at the trial of the husband for removing other grain, where plaintiff's right of ownership was fully discussed, is competent to prove defendants' knowledge and willfulness, and warrants an instruction on exemplary damages. Heartz v. Klinkhammer, 39 Minn. 488; Conlon v. McGraw, 66 Mich. 194; Fisher v. Dowling, 66 Mich. 370.

In an action of trespass against an overseer of the highway for cutting down a tree therein, evidence of improper motives, or that the act was done maliciously, is admissible. In order to show such mala fides, the state of feeling between the parties at the time is alone material, and not the cause or history of the quarrel. And in such an action a deed of the plaintiff's farm is admissible, in order to show its boundaries. Winter v. Peterson, 24 N. J. L. 524; 61 Am. Dec. 678.

In an action brought under the Illinois "act to prevent trespassing by cutting timber," it is necessary to show that the act has been willfully violated, by proof that the defendant, in his own person, cut the trees, or induced another person to do so, by his command or authority. It is not sufficient to show that the trees were cut by persons employed by him to cut timber on his own land, and appropriated by them. Cushing v. Dill, 3 Ill. 460.

Where plaintiff's wife, in attempting to stop defendant's trespass, was treated with derision, some of the testimony showing that she was roughly pushed about, and she testified that the fright and excitement caused by such treatment brought on a sickness continuing three months, evidence that she had a child only six or seven months old, which she was then nursing, is admissible to show that she was in a condition where fright might have affected her as she testified it did. Razzo v. Varni, 81 Cal. 289.

In an action of trespass, it is competent for the plaintiff to give evidence of the conduct of the defendant when committing the trespass, and of such acts and circumstances as may give character to the trespass. If the wife of the plaintiff was insulted or harmed, that may be shown, but the jury cannot give damages for any injury to her, for she may, joining with her husband, bring a separate suit for that. Cook v. De La Garza, 9 Tex. 358.

1. As Circumstantial Evidence.—

Where a privity is shown between several defendants in trespass, the words or acts of any one of them may be given in evidence of the trespass, against them jointly. Broughton v. Ward, 1 Tyler (Vt.) 137.

In an action of trespass for pulling down a house which had been rented by the defendant to the plaintiff, testimony of a threat, that if the plaintiff's daughter did not yield to the defendant's unchaste solicitations, he would pull down the house, is competent evidence to show the malicious feelings of the person committing the act; and a threat to kill the daughter, if she did not yield, is also evidence to prove the malice of the defendant. Chapman v. Kincaid, 8 Humph. (Tenn.) 150.

Threats made by defendant a few months prior to the time the plaintiff's house was burned, that he would tear the house down, that he would blow it up with powder, accompanied with expressions of hostility towards the plaintiff and his family, who occupied the house, is evidence competent for the consideration of the jury in an action of trespass brought by the plaintiff for the burning of the house. Morrow v. Moses, 28 N. H. 95.

2. To Overcome Plea of Justification.—

A plea of justification, on the ground of defense of possession, is overcome by evidence of irritating and abusive language, by the defendant, for the purpose of exciting an affray. Watrous v. Steel, 4 Vt. 629; 24 Am. Dec. 648.

In an action of trespass for injuring property, if the plaintiff introduces witnesses to prove that the defendants are his enemies, and had threatened to injure his property, the defendants may introduce repellant testimony, to show that the plaintiff had other enemies who had made similar threats. Logan v. Steele, 3 Bibb (Ky.) 230.

In an action of trespass for assault and battery, at the trial the court permitted the defendant to put in oral of the motive which actuated the defendant and induced his conduct may be given.¹

d. AS TO CUSTOM.—Custom, when specially pleaded, may be put in evidence; and sometimes when not specially pleaded.²

e. AS TO ACTS AFTER BEGINNING OF SUIT.—Evidence cannot usually be given as to acts committed subsequent to those on account of which suit was entered.³

evidence of the contents of a letter which he had sent to the plaintiff, informing him that he should carry weapons for his defense, it having been shown that the letter itself had been destroyed. The court instructed the jury that this evidence was only admitted to show that the defendant had forewarned the plaintiff that he should arm himself, etc. It was held that, thus qualified, the evidence was not improper. McMasters v. Cohen, 5 Ind. 174.

1. To Make Out a Crime or Misdemeanor.—In an action for trespass on plaintiff's land, where the affidavit in attachment alleges that the injuries complained of arose from the commission of some felony or misdemeanor, evidence that defendant, representing himself to be the agent of a third person, from whom he had no authority, sold timber on the land, and collected the proceeds, that the timber was cut and carried away under such sale, and that defendant indorsed the trespass, is admissible under Missouri Rev. St. (1879), § 1359, which makes it a misdemeanor for one to cut down or carry away any trees on land not his own. Chouteau v. Boughton, 100 Mo. 406.

In an action of trespass against a magistrate for false imprisonment, evidence of malice and want of probable cause is irrelevant and inadmissible, and he is not liable in such an action if he had jurisdiction. Bailey v. Wiggins, 1 Houst. (Del.) 299; Chambers v. Porter, 5 Coldw. (Tenn.) 273.

2. As to Custom—Evidence of Custom.—In an action of trespass for cutting and carrying away his grain, a lessee for years may give evidence that by the custom of the country he is entitled to the way-going crop, though he does not specially plead such custom, and though he held under a written lease making no reference to such right. Stultz v. Dickey, 5 Binn. (Pa.) 285.

In an action for breaking and entering a close, the title to which is disputed, a witness, who has testified that he was in the habit of going upon the premises, cannot be asked "what he used to go there for," for the purpose of showing that he and all the neighbors were in the habit of using the land as common property. Niles v. Patch, 13 Gray (Mass.) 254.

On the trial of an action for an assault and battery, committed in attempting to remove the plaintiff from a passage-way of which the defendant had the lawful custody, the plaintiff proved that at the time of the assault he was about entering a house to which was annexed a right of way through a passage, and gave evidence from which he contended that a license to him from the owner of the house might be inferred. It was held that to rebut such inference of a license, the defendant might prove that the plaintiff, in company with certain other persons, had been in the habit of frequenting said house, and that the owner of the house had fastened it up for the purpose of excluding them; but that evidence that some of those persons were of bad character, and had been in the state prison, was irrelevant and inadmissible. Brown v. Gordon, 1 Gray (Mass.) 182.

In an action of trespass qu. cl., where the plaintiff claimed to have taken possession of certain unappropriated land, by staking it out and erecting buildings thereon, upon which land the defendant entered, it was held that evidence was admissible to show that this was the usual mode of taking possession of such land in the town where it lay, and that it was acquiesced in by the town. Cook v. Rider, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 186.

3. Acts Subsequent to Filing Declaration.—In an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., evidence is admissible on the part of the plaintiff for the purpose of showing that he had acquired the land from the government, that he had filed his declaratory statement giving notice of his intention to preempt the premises, and the register and receiver had rendered a decision in favor of his right, accepted of him the government price

f. AS TO MITIGATION OF DAMAGES.—Circumstances in mitigation of damages may be shown, unless they amount to a justification, when they should be specially pleaded.¹

g. UNDER A REPLICATION TO A JUSTIFICATION DE INJURIA.—Under a replication to a plea of justification de injuria, the plaintiff may show that more force was used than necessary.²

for the same and given the ordinary receipt therefor, although the payment was made after the trespass. Courchaine v. Bullion, etc., Co., 4 Nev. 369.

In trespass qu. cl., evidence that the locus in quo was within the bounds of an old improvement of which the defendant was, at the time of the trespass, in actual possession, is irrelevant, the trespass being committed after a decision by the board of property on a caveat, in favor of the plaintiff, and after a subsequent ejectment brought by the defendant within six months, on which he became nonsuit. King v. Baker, 29 Pa. St. 200.

In a prosecution for trespass under Alabama Code (1886), § 3874, declaring the offense to be an entry on the premises of another without legal cause, or good excuse, after having been warned within six months next preceding, the state, having proved warning and an entry a month or two afterward, cannot show that the defendant entered a second time after the prosecution was commenced, and an instruction based on such evidence is erroneous. Chappell v. State, 86 Ala. 54.

1. Mitigation of Damages.—In an action by a reversioner for an injury done to the freehold, the duration of the term of the tenant in possession is evidence admissible on behalf of the defendant, as affecting the measure of damages. Uttendorffer v. Saegars, 50 Cal. 496.

Under the plea of not guilty, in an action of trespass for taking and carrying away personal property, the defendant cannot be allowed to prove, in mitigation of damages, or for any other purpose, that the act complained of was done under legal process. Womack v. Bird, 51 Ala. 504.

In an action of trespass de bonis asportatis, the facts that the property has been taken out of the possession of the trespasser, after the trespass, by virtue of valid legal process against the plaintiff, and that it has gone to his use, and the amount for which the process issued, may be shown in mitigation of damages. Wehle v. Haviland, 42 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 399.

What matters in mitigation of damages are admissible in trespass as showing the animus with which the defendant acted, are considered in Farwell v. Warren, 51 Ill. 467.

Upon a joint plea of "not guilty," in trespass vi et armis against two defendants for breaking the plaintiff's close and beating his slaves, they cannot give in evidence, in mitigation of damages, a license from the plaintiff, to one of them, to visit his negro quarters, and "chastise any of his slaves found acting improperly," the battery being committed by the other defendant, and no proof appearing that the slaves beaten had acted improperly. Brown v. May, 1 Munf. (Va.) 288.

2. In an action of trespass, where the defendant justifies under authority from the plaintiff or arising from the laws, the plaintiff cannot, under the general replication of de injuria, etc., give in evidence any excess of authority. Parish v. Rigdon, 12 Ohio 191.

In an action of trespass for assault and battery, where the defendant pleads son assault demesne, and the plaintiff replies de injuria suo propria, the plaintiff may prove that defendant used more force than was necessary, and that an excessive battery was committed. Bartlett v. Churchill, 24 Vt. 218; Curtis v. Carson, 2 N. H. 539.

In enforcing articles of agreement authorizing the forcible taking possession of premises, in case of the non-payment of the purchase-money, if more force is used than is necessary, the plaintiff should reply the excess, or give evidence of it under the general replication de injuria. Ambrose v. Root, 11 Ill. 497; 52 Am. Dec. 479.

If, to a declaration in trespass for an assault containing but one count, a justification is pleaded, and the plaintiff replies de injuria, he cannot introduce testimony relating to any other assault; such testimony being admissible when there is only one count, the plaintiff, instead of traversing the plea, should newly assign. Carpenter v. Crane, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 119.

Under a replication de injuria to a justification of a beating, as master of a ship, the plaintiff may show that the punishment was excessive. Hannen v. Edes, 15 Mass. 347.

Under a replication de injuria to a justification as an officer acting under a writ, the plaintiff cannot show that, by breaking an outer door, the defendant became a trespasser ab initio. Oystead v. Shed, 12 Mass. 506. See Sampson v. Henry, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 379.

1. Plaintiff introduced a deed to him describing 1.8 of an acre of land conveyed by T. to plaintiff by deed of given date, and introduced also a deed from T., conveying to him "all that certain 1.8 acres of land in lot No. 5, in the H. survey, situated about 1¾ miles north-westerly from the courthouse, and more fully described in a certain deed of trust made by T. to use of 'plaintiff,' as will appear of record," etc. The trust deed was not produced, nor was there any evidence identifying the land described in the deeds with that described in the petition as lot No. 5, of the H. survey, giving the metes and bounds. It was held that plaintiff failed to show title to the land described in the petition. Devine v. Keller, 73 Tex. 364.

In trespass qu. cl. fr., the testimony of the sheriff, that he did not levy on the land in dispute, will not be received to contradict the terms of his own deed and the entry of his levy. Sawyer v. Leard, 8 Rich. (S. Car.) 267.

In an action of trespass by a person claiming under a void reservation in a deed, the deed had no tendency to establish plaintiff's right, and was, with other deeds and leases showing the character of defendant's possession, properly excluded. Herbert v. Pue, 72 Md. 307.

Proof of a conveyance to any person, and facts of ownership thereunder, is inadmissible without evidence of privity of title between such person and some grantor or ancestor of the party seeking to establish the same. Doane v. Willcutt, 16 Gray (Mass.) 368.

If an heir sued in trespass justifies as being a tenant in common with the plaintiff of the locus in quo, and avers that there has never been any partition of the estate, the plaintiff may introduce in rebuttal the record of proceedings for a partition, although it be defective in failing to show that the report of the petition had been approved; and he may prove aliunde that possession had been taken by the several parties in interest of the parts assigned to each, and the same acquiesced in for many years. Grimes v. Butts, 65 Ill. 347.

Defendant agreed to waive the filing and notice by plaintiff of certified copies "as a predicate to show a common source of title." Texas Rev. St. art. 4802, provides that plaintiff in the action may prove a common source of title by certified copies of deeds, etc., without requiring proof of the inability to produce the originals. It was held that a certified copy of a recorded patent offered by plaintiff to show title in himself, there being no evidence of such common source, was not admissible, over defendant's objection, without accounting for the absence of the original, as provided by Rev. St., art. 2257. Rio Grande, etc., R. Co. v. Milmo Nat. Bank, 72 Tex. 467.

A written agreement by which all the heirs but two assign their interest in the ancestor's estate, without describing it, to another heir, is admissible on behalf of the latter in an action against persons not claiming under ancestor or the one heir, who is not a party to it, to show the extent of plaintiff's interest in the land; as plaintiff, being a tenant in common with the heir whose interest he had not acquired, could recover the possession of the land as against any one but said heir. Wright v. Dunn, 73 Tex. 293.

Though the consideration of a contract of sale of lands is defective, as where it is confederate money, yet the contract may be proved to show that the purchaser's entry under it was not an actionable trespass. Woods v. Toombs, 36 Tex. 85.

Tax deeds and leases, shown by the evidence to be void, may be treated as color of title; and if the defendant in an action of trespass for entering lands, etc., took possession under them, they are admissible in evidence, as tending to show what, and how much, land he claimed. Hoffman v. Harrington, 28 Mich. 90.

Plaintiff, to obviate the apparent bar of the Statute of Limitations, offered in evidence a marshal's deed to the United States under a void execution,

i. AS TO TITLE.—The plaintiff need not prove title where it is admitted by the defendant's pleading,¹ but otherwise it is usually necessary.² Title sufficient to maintain the action may be shown by deed, or sometimes by acts, as of possession.³

together with a judgment in favor of the United States against plaintiff's ancestor, on which the execution and sale were based, and a deed from the United States to plaintiff, in consideration of the payment of the judgment. It was held that its exclusion was not error, as it showed no title in the United States, nor any obstacle to a suit for the recovery of the land by plaintiff or his ancestor. Moody v. Moeller, 72 Tex. 635. See also Garner v. Larker, 71 Tex. 431; Parker v. Fort Worth, etc., R. Co., 71 Tex. 132; Harrison v. McMurray, 71 Tex. 122; Jenkins v. Adams, 71 Tex. 1; Am. Dig. 1888, p. 1313, §§ 26-29.

In an action by the heirs of a patentee of a head-right certificate and his wife, claiming the land as community property, against the grantees of the patentee alone, the defendants may, to show an outstanding superior title, introduce a deed from the patentee to a bona fide purchaser, executed before the patent was issued, without connecting themselves with such grantee. The effect, however, of such deed, would be to only defeat plaintiff's right to one-half of the tract as against those claiming under that title, but would not affect their rights to the whole, as against those not connecting themselves with it. Daniel v. Bridges, 73 Tex. 149.

In an action of trespass for seizing plaintiff's goods on an execution against another, mortgages of the property by the execution debtor to other parties are not admissible. Robinson v. Edwards, 70 Me. 158.

1. Title.—In an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., the defendant, by his pleading, admitted the plaintiff's possession, but claimed the title. It was held that the plaintiff need not, in order to recover, prove his title or actual possession of the locus in quo. Tison v. Broward, 17 Fla. 465.

2. In an action for cutting trees, the plaintiff must prove that he was the owner of the land on which the trespass was committed. Clay v. Boyer, 10 Ill. 506.

In an action for cutting timber, under the timber act of Illinois, brought by husband and wife, to support the allegation that the husband and wife were owners of the land trespassed upon, an estate in fee simple must be shown in the wife. Whiteside v. Divers, 5 Ill. 336.

In trespass qu. cl., the plaintiff may show an equitable title, where the holder of the legal title has disclaimed. Arnold v. Pfoutz, 117 Pa. St. 103.

A defendant, in trespass for a fishery, under a plea of liberum tenementum, showed a title in common with G; but the plaintiff proved an elder title. The testimony of G was then offered, to prove the defendant's right by prescription to fish. This was objected to on the ground of his interest, as tenant in common, but was held competent. Jackson v. Lewis, Cheves (S. Car.) 259.

In trespass qu. cl. fr., the plea of liberum tenementum, and issue thereon, in evidence of paramount title in either party, is admissible, as are also records, plots and papers, bearing upon the question of possession. Wilsons v. Bibb, 1 Dana (Ky.) 7; 25 Am. Dec. 118.

3. Title Shown By Possession.—In an action of trespass to realty, parol evidence that the property was occupied by the plaintiff and his tenants, is sufficient prima facie proof of title. Pacific Express Co. v. Dunn, 81 Tex. 85.

Evidence of frequently cutting wood and timber on a tract of woodland for more than twenty years, under a claim of title, will support an action of trespass against one who shows no title. Kilborn v. Rewee, 8 Gray (Mass.) 415.

In an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., a party has a right to show such evidence of title as he possesses, in order to obtain a decision upon the proper construction of the deed under which he claims a right by license from the grantees to enter upon the land and do the acts complained of. Louk v. Woods, 15 Ill. 256.

If the plaintiff in an action of tort in the nature of trespass qu. cl., has testified that he was in the occupation of the premises, without being inquired of or testifying as to any title thereto, proof of a recent deed to his wife, to her sole and separate use, is not sufficient of itself to authorize the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiff had not such a title as to enable him to maintain his action. Brown v. Benjamin, 8 Allen (Mass.) 197.

In an action for obstructing an alley way, through which plaintiff in his complaint alleges that he has had the right of passage for a time sufficient to give him an easement, evidence of his title thereto is inadmissible. Faulk v. Thornton, 108 N. Car. 314.

In an action of trespass for taking away goods under a plea of property in a third person, evidence of such ownership at the time of the taking, is admissible. Anthony v. Gilbert, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 348.

In an action of trespass for taking logs, etc., the defendant may prove that the logs were his, cut on his lands, and lying on his lands when he took them. Wilson v. Clark, 4 N. J. L. 379.

In an action of trespass for taking away muskrat traps, the defendant may show that he was the owner of the soil, and removed the traps to a place where the plaintiff could get them. Crane v. Mason, Wright (Ohio) 333.

1. Kennebec Purchase v. Call, 1 Mass. 483; Printz v. Cheeney, 11 Iowa 469.

In trespass to real estate, the deed to the plaintiff is competent evidence, as tending to prove title in plaintiff, and show what right he claims by his possession of the property; and if no effort is made by the defense to show title in any one else, proof of title other than of possession is not necessary. Chicago v. McGraw, 75 Ill. 566.

2. Possession and Title.—Plaintiff in trespass qu. cl. fr. need not show title as well as possession. Shoup v. Shields, 116 Ill. 488.

3. Possession Gives Right Against Intruder.—A trespasser has no standing to dispute the allegation, in a declaration in trespass by a husband and wife, that the wife is the sole owner of the property. Dexter v. Billings, 110 Pa. St. 135.

As against a mere wrongdoer, the plaintiff in possession of land need not show a perfect title. Field v. Apple River Log Driving Co., 67 Wis. 569.

4. In an action of trespass qu. cl. fr. by A against B, C's acts of possession in A's behalf are admissible to show

A's possession. Merrill v. Hilliard, 59 N. H. 481.

The defendant, in an action of trespass qu. cl., having made out no title, possession by the plaintiff will justify a verdict in his favor. Brandon v. Grimke, 1 Nott & M. (S. Car.) 356; Dewey v. Bordwell, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 65.

In an action for a wrongful trespass by a stranger, on the premises held by the plaintiff as a lessee, the plaintiff need not produce the lease. Evidence of possession of his part, under a claim of right by written instrument, is enough, against a wrongdoer. Walker v. Wilson, 8 Bosw. (N. Y.) 586. Todd v. Jackson, 26 N. J. L. 525; Lawson v. Campbell, 4 Greene (Iowa) 413; Mason v. Park, 4 Ill. 532. The admission by the defendant, in such case, that he has cut timber on the plaintiff's land, unless made for the purposes of the trial, is not admissible as evidence of title of the plaintiff. Robie v. Sedgwick, 4 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 73.

In an action of trespass by an executor, the petition alleged that the plaintiff's testator was the owner of the land at the time of the trespass. The evidence showed ownership, as alleged, and that no one else had actual possession at the time of the acts complained of. It was held that possession by testator was sufficiently pleaded and proved. Bell v. Clark, 30 Mo. App. 224.

In an action for the negligent burning of plaintiff's timber, it was held that proof that at the time of the injury, and for many years previous, plaintiff was in possession of the premises, was sufficient prima facie evidence of title. Burlington, etc., R. Co. v. Beebe, 14 Neb. 463. McCormick v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 47 Iowa 345; Parker v. Hotchkiss, 25 Conn. 321; Boyington v. Squires, 71 Wis. 276. In an action for mesne profits, the record of the judgment in ejectment is admissible to show that defendant was in possession at the time, and for the title, but not for the length of time defendant's possession continued. Bailey v. Fairplay, 6 Binn. (Pa.) 450; 6 Am. Dec. 486.

the jury.¹ Where the only question is as to the possession, evidence as to the extent of the occupancy of prior tenants is immaterial.² Possession will be presumed to continue unless the contrary appear.³ A right to possession may arise by operation of law.⁴

2. Declarations.—Declarations in disparagement of the title of the declarant are admissible as original evidence.⁵

1. Question for Jury.—The question as to the possession of land is a question of fact for the jury. Firth v. Veeder, 58 Hun (N. Y.) 605.

Under Alabama Code, § 3296, providing that the owner may recover damages for trees cut upon his premises without his consent, it is immaterial whether he is in possession or not; but where, in an action for such penalty by the trustees of a church upon whose land trees had been cut, the defendant pleads that the trustees were not in possession, and were not trustees at the time of the trespass, and these issues are accepted and evidence introduced thereon, the court must submit them to the jury, although immaterial. Allison v. Little (Ala. 1891), 9 So. Rep. 388.

2. The defendant occupied a store adjoining the plaintiff's land, and alleged that he owned three feet beyond the store. The plaintiff claimed to occupy up to the store. The defendant did not perfect his plea of title by giving the undertaking required by Code Civil Proc., § 2952. It was held that the question was simply one of possession, and that evidence as to the extent of the occupancy by prior occupants of defendant's store was immaterial. Smith v. Bingham (Supreme Ct.), 9 N. Y. Supp. 97.

In a suit for trespass on land, the plaintiffs showed their possession and actual occupancy; the defendants offered deeds to show themselves tenants in common with the plaintiffs. It was held that these were inadmissible, since no deraignment of title was made from them as a common source of title, nor was there any proof connecting the holding of the parties with them, or to show that possession was taken or claimed under them. Woodbeck v. Wilders, 18 Cal. 131.

3. The verdict in one action of trespass is evidence in another between the same parties, but is conclusive only of the fact and date of the trespass, and of the plaintiff's possession at that time; and his possession will be presumed to continue unless the contrary appears. Stean v. Anderson, 4 Harr. (Del.) 209.

4. H. made a deed of land naming no grantee, one-third thereof "for the use of a schoolhouse, if the neighboring inhabitants see cause to build a schoolhouse thereon." A schoolhouse was built thereon by a school district, and afterwards A., as agent of a school district de facto, that acted as successor of the former district, leased a part of said tract to B. for ten years. B. held over after the expiration of the ten years, and a school district which had been duly constituted after said lease was made, authorized K. to enter on said tract and take possession thereof for said district. K. entered accordingly, and B. brought an action of trespass against him. It was held that though no legal estate passed by the deed of H., yet that a trust was thereby created, which the court would be authorized and bound, as a court of equity, to protect, and would appoint a trustee to take the legal estate from H.'s heirs, who would be bound to convey it to him; and that the said lease to B. was admissible in evidence against him, and that he was estopped to deny that A. was duly appointed agent of the school district de facto, or that said district had a good title to the said tract. Bailey v. Kilburn, 10 Met. (Mass.) 176; 43 Am. Dec. 423.

5. Declarations.—Greenleaf on Evidence, vol. 1, § 109, and cases cited. A mere statement of a surveyor as to what land is included in a patent is not enough to show title to the land out of the plaintiff and in another, unless such patent was located by actual survey, made in accordance with law, upon legal proof of the starting-points of the survey. Parker v. Wallis, 60 Md. 15; 45 Am. Rep. 703.

Denials of a defendant in ejectment that he was in possession, do not conclude him in an action of trespass; but declarations made in bad faith to the prejudice of an adversary, have their effect on a motion for restitution. Crockett v. Lashbrook, 5 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 530; 17 Am. Dec. 98.

A husband owned land in his right, and his wife owned land adjoining in her own right. The parties to the suit were their children; and after the death of the parents the plaintiff became the owner of the land of the husband, and the defendant became the owner of that of the wife. In an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., it was held, that the declarations of the wife, before and after the death of her husband, showing where the boundary was between the lands, were admissible in evidence against the defendant. Pike v. Hayes, 14 N. H. 19; 40 Am. Dec. 171.

The declaration of one under whom a party claims as bailee, are inadmissible to prove the bailment, unless they constituted the bailment, or were a part of the res gestæ. Jones v. M'Neil, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 466.

In an action of trespass to real property, the defendant, under a general plea of title, without allegations that title is claimed by adverse possession, may give in evidence the declarations of a former occupant under whom defendant claims, to characterize his possession as adverse to any title of the plaintiff. Morss v. Salisbury, 48 N. Y. 636.

A having contracted to purchase lands of B, paid a part of the purchase-money, but titles were never made. A gave the land to his son, C, who went into possession. It was held that this possession was adverse both as to A and B, and that declarations by A, subsequent to the gift to C, that he did not hold adversely to B, were inadmissible in an action of trespass by B against C. Hunter v. Parsons, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 59.

1. Admissions. — The defendant claimed under a sale on foreclosure of a vendor's lien. The original vendee testified that after an appeal had been taken in the proceedings to foreclose the lien, he paid the judgment to an attorney, who had since died; that the attorney's partners were absent; that he had lost his receipt; and that of the other persons present two were dead. The payment was alleged to have been made about twenty-five years ago; and the third person alleged to have been present, a man seventy-seven years old, testified that he had no recollection of any such occurrence. It was held that testimony of the attorney's partner relative to the attorney's mode of doing business, showing that the payment was improbable, and also that after the reversal of the case, the attorney had filed an amended petition, and had been engaged in this suit, but had never mentioned the payment, was admissible, as also evidence of an admission made by the vendee to a subsequent owner of the premises, that the lien was still in force. Dwyer v. Rippetoe, 72 Tex. 520.

In an action of trespass by a father against a sheriff, for seizing and selling his mare as the property of his son, it is competent for the plaintiff, after his own declarations that the mare was the property of his son, have been given in evidence by the defendants, to prove in rebuttal, that before the execution against the son, the father had turned out to the sheriff, in the presence of the son, the same mare, in order to answer an execution against himself. Roberts v. Young, 42 Pa. St. 439.

In an action of trespass de bonis asportatis, in a justice's court, it was proved that the defendant admitted that he had levied on property, at the same time exhibiting the execution, and stating whom it was against, and when asked whether he would disclaim the levy, he refused to do so; but it was not proved that he was an officer and had lawful authority to take the property. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to charge him as a trespasser, and that no justification under the process was shown by the admission. Copley v. Rose, 2 N. Y. 115.

In an action of tort for breaking and entering a close, under an answer setting up the defendant's possession for more than twenty years previously, and also soil and freehold in the defendant, the defendant may give in evidence admissions of his title by the plaintiff and those under whom the plaintiff claims. Gilbert v. Felton, 5 Gray (Mass.) 406.

In a suit for trespass, evidence of a previous conversation between plaintiff and a third person, about splitting rails to fence the land, was held admissible, as tending to show acts of ownership. Gordon v. Cook, 47 Mich. 248.

4. Presumptions.—Presumptions, disputable and indisputable, may arise from circumstances of the case.¹

5. Relevancy of Testimony.—The general rule as to the relevancy of testimony applies in the action of trespass.²

An acknowledgment in writing of the demandant's title, made by the tenant in a writ of entry, is sufficient evidence of the demandant's title to be submitted to the jury in a subsequent action of trespass brought by him against the tenant for an entry on the land described in the writ of entry. Kellenberger v. Sturtevant, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 465.

1. Presumptions.—In an action for trespass, a witness testified that the defendant said that he tore down the plaintiff's fence. The plaintiff testified that the fence looked as if the defendant had hitched his team to it, and torn it down. The defendant testified that he told the plaintiff that the fence would have to be removed, and that he tore it down to repair a highway. It was held that it would be presumed after verdict that the defendant properly removed the fence to repair the highway. Rightmire v. Shepard (Supreme Ct.), 12 N. Y. Supp. 800.

The fact that a person, or his ancestor, had cattle wandering over a grant of land fifty leagues in extent, affords no presumption that he owned or claimed the land. Lerma v. Stevenson, 40 Fed. Rep. 356.

In trespass qu. cl. brought by the heirs of A, the defendant demurred to the plaintiff's evidence. By the demurrer it appeared, that A died seised, that there was no positive proof that the plaintiff's heirs ever entered after his death, but there was proof that the defendant's possession did not commence till a year after A's death. It was held that on this evidence in a demurrer to evidence, it might be fairly inferred, that A's heirs entered into possession immediately upon their ancestor's death, and that, therefore, they were entitled to recover. Mars-teller v. Coryell, 4 Leigh. (Va.) 325.

In trespass qu. cl. fr., the possession is presumed to be in the owner of the legal title, in the absence of any showing to the contrary. Griffin v. Creppin, 60 Me. 270.

The plea of property in a third person, in an action of replevin, does not involve the question of such person's title; and therefore, in an action of trespass upon the same property, brought by such third person against the parties who were plaintiffs in the replevin in which the verdict was for the defendant, the record of the replevin is not conclusive evidence of the plaintiff's right of property. Warfield v. Walter, 11 Gill & J. (Md.) 80.

Where one is charged with the commission of trespass in such a manner as requires a denial or refutation, which he refuses to make, but requires proof of the fact, it is presumptive evidence of the truth of the charge. Wheat v. Croom, 7 Ala. 349.

A defendant in trespass, claimed as tenant of S., and adduced evidence of his tenancy and of the title of S.; but he was proved to have entered as the plaintiff's tenant, and was therefore evicted. It was held that this did not conclude him, after having regained possession, from holding under the title of S. Jones v. Muldrow, Cheves (S. Car.) 254.

2. Relevancy—Illustrations.—Where the defendant in an action of trespass offered to prove the right of property in a third person, but was not permitted to, and the bill of exceptions did not set out the evidence of a plain or possessory right in the plaintiff, it was held that the evidence offered was irrelevant, and that a new trial would not be granted. Crawford v. Bynum, 7 Yerg. (Tenn.) 381.

In an action of trespass on the case for wrongfully and injuriously building an embankment on defendant's own land, so as to cause an obstruction and reflow of water on plaintiff's land, it is not error to refuse introduction of testimony on the part of the defendant, that the drain constructed by the defendant, to carry the water from the land of the plaintiff, was such a drain as is usual and customary to be constructed at such embankments on railroads generally, and have been found sufficient for the purposes of carrying off the water at like places. Beaty v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 6 W. Va. 388.

Where the plaintiff claimed damages for the cutting and carrying away from his land of pine logs marked A, it was not error to admit evidence of the cutting of other logs, when such evidence tended to show how many of the kind claimed were taken, and when an instruction was given that damages could only be recovered for that kind. Lee v. Lord, 76 Wis. 582.

In an action of trespass to recover the value of timber cut and carried away, the court properly refused to allow the plaintiff to testify as to how much of the land was damaged by the cutting off of the timber. Coody v. Gress Lumber Co., 82 Ga. 793.

In an action for trespass by cutting trees on a church lot, the records of the church imputing the cutting to defendant, and appointing a committee to compromise with him, are irrelevant. Allison v. Little, 85 Ala. 512.

Where the plaintiffs, in an action of trespass qu. cl. fr. against B, claiming title to a larger tract of land, which included the locus in quo, offered in evidence the record of a judgment in their favor, against C, in an action of ejectment for such larger tract, for the purpose of showing an act of ownership by the plaintiffs, in relation to the locus in quo, it was held, that such judgment being between different parties, and in relation to a different subject-matter, was inadmissible. Southington, etc., Soc. v. Gridley, 20 Conn. 200.

In an action of trespass against a railroad company on account of the negligence of an engineer, it was held that it was error to admit testimony to prove habitual negligence of employes upon other trains of the company. Mississippi Cent. R. Co. v. Miller, 40 Miss. 45; Southern R. Co. v. Kendrick, 40 Miss. 374; 90 Am. Dec. 332.

Where the defense to an action of trespass de bonis asportatis, was a mortgage of the property to a third person, by whose directions the defendant took the same, and the note secured by the mortgage was not produced on the trial with the mortgage, nor called for by the plaintiff, but the mortgagee, on cross-examination by the plaintiff, stated that he still held the note, and the jury, under the instructions of the court, found that the note was unpaid, and the mortgage uncanceled, it was held that, under these circumstances, it was no objection to the introduction of the mortgage, that the note was not produced. Fuller v. Rounceville, 31 N. H. 512.

Where the plaintiff, in an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., claimed title to the locus in quo by adverse possession, and, in support of his claim, introduced evidence of his acts of dominion over the locus in quo, which was part of a highway, and especially of his cutting wood thereon for his fires; and the defendant, for the purpose of showing the character of the possession claimed by the plaintiff and that the acts done by him did not constitute an adverse possession, offered a witness to prove that, at the time when the plaintiff so cut wood on the locus in quo, it was, and long had been, customary for any person who chose, although not owning the fee of the highway, or of the adjacent land, to cut wood for his fires from said highway; but no evidence was offered of claim made, that any such acts were done on the locus in quo, it was held, that such evidence offered by the defendant, was not relevant to the issue, and was therefore inadmissible. Evans v. Bidwell, 20 Conn. 209.

In an action of trespass for an injury to land, evidence of threats and intimidation on the part of the defendant towards the plaintiff's witnesses, if they should testify, is inadmissible. Larkin v. Taylor, 5 Kan. 433.

In an action of trespass for goods attached by defendants, it is proper for the plaintiffs to show that the defendants approved of the seizure, and received the proceeds. Gillett v. Phelps, 5 Wis. 429.

Under the former system or practice, the fact that a slaughter-house was a nuisance, and had injured the value of the defendant's property, could not be admitted in evidence, in an action of trespass for diverting water from the plaintiff's slaughter-house. Chenoweth v. Hicks, 5 Ind. 224.

Evidence that after breaking the plaintiff's close, the defendant constructed valuable buildings on the land so entered upon, is admissible in an action of trespass, in answer to the action. Haynes v. Thomas, 7 Ind. 38.

The plaintiff, in an action of trespass for breaking into her house and taking personal property, cannot introduce evidence of the taking of property of which she had neither possession nor the right of possession. Gracie v. Morris, 22 Ark. 415.

What Is Hearsay.—In an action of trespass for carrying away plaintiff's grain, where defendants justify under authority from plaintiff's husband, receipts given by a third person to said husband for such grain, whose proceeds he volunteered to use in part to pay debts connected with the expenses of the farm, are incompetent and immaterial,

6. Prima Facie Evidence of Title.—There are some kinds of evidence that make out a prima facie case of title in trespass.¹

7. Weight and Sufficiency.—Questions as to weight and sufficiency of evidence, are determined upon the face of the individual case. In some cases certain facts, if proven, have such weight as the jury may give them;² in others, they make out a prima since his offer would be no defense to the action, and the receipts as to plaintiff are mere hearsay. Heartz v. Klinkhammer, 39 Minn. 488.

1. Prima Facie Evidence of Title.—Proof, by plaintiff, of thirty years' possession under a claim of title under a deed, establishes his title prima facie. Baier v. Ziegelbauer, 66 Wis. 524.

A duplicate receipt or certificate from the land office, is, by the statute of Iowa, prima facie evidence of title, in trespass, etc. Burlerson v. Teeple, 2 Greene (Iowa) 542.

In an action of trespass to lands, where the plaintiff is not in actual possession, but bases his right upon his holding the legal title, and on the constructive possession claimed to be drawn therefrom, evidence of tax titles held by third persons, is admissible; for such titles, being prima facie paramount, show, unless overcome, that plaintiff had no title, thus defeating his right of action. Tolles v. Duncombe, 34 Mich. 101.

In an action of trespass against the defendants for attaching wrongfully certain property of the plaintiff, he offered evidence to prove the making of the attachment, whereupon the defendants offered in evidence the original papers, notes, and accounts, in the suit in which the attachment was made. It was held that the papers were prima facie evidence of the claim sued on, and properly admissible in evidence notwithstanding that judgment, in the attachment suit, was rendered against defendant on default. Edinger v. Henchler, 8 Iowa 513.

Where the plaintiff proves a prima facie trespass, in the taking of his property by the defendant's order, the defendant, to justify, must show that the taking was lawfully authorized. Woodbridge v. Conner, 49 Me. 353.

In a suit by the trustees of the Wabash and Erie Canal, for a trespass upon certain lands alleged to belong to them, the only evidence of title introduced was a list of lands, selected by the state for the completion of the canal, embracing the lands trespassed upon. It was held that this evidence was prima facie sufficient to establish title in the trustees. Evans v. Wabash, etc., Canal, 15 Ind. 319.

Where defendant in an action of trespass justifies his acts by a tax deed prima facie valid, plaintiff may, in rebuttal, introduce testimony aliunde the deed to show that, though apparently good, it is in fact invalid, by reason of some fatal defect in the prior tax proceedings. Douglass v. Dickson, 31 Kan. 310.

Where the plaintiff in trespass claims title under a tax deed, the defendant is not estopped to deny that such deed conveyed any title, though he himself claims title under a subsequent tax deed. Wadleigh v. Marathon Co. Bank, 58 Wis. 546.

The equity of redemption in a slave was sold under fi. fa. and the sheriff delivered the slave to the purchaser, but the agent of the mortgagees seized, removed, and retained the slave. In an action against the agent by the purchaser for the alleged trespass, it was held that, in the absence of proof of a right of possession, by agreement, in the mortgagor, the defendant might justify under the authority derived from the mortgagees. Swigert v. Thomas, 7 Dana (Ky.) 220.

Possession of, and title to the land from which the personal property (rails and logs) was asported, is prima facie evidence of title to the personalty. Dorcey v. Patterson, 7 Iowa 420.

2. Illustration of Evidence Proper to Go to Jury, to Be Weighed by Them.—In an action of trespass qu. cl., where both parties rely merely on a possessory title, without any proof of a legal claim to the land, a contract by one of the parties to purchase the land of the owner, is admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing the character of the possession. Moore v. Moore, 21 Me. 350.

A deed conveying part of a tract of land cannot be given in evidence in an action of trespass qu. cl., where defense is taken on the plats returned in the case, unless such deed is located on the plats. Pottinger v. Hall, 4 Har. & M. (Md.) 349.

Where one rents land for the purpose of making a crop, upon the condition that he is to give up possession in case the owner sells to a third person before the crop is made, it is not competent for the tenant, in case a sale is made, to object that the contract of sale is not evidenced by a deed conveying a perfect title. Dean v. Fail, 8 Port. (Ala.) 491.

In an action of trespass to land lying adjacent to a railroad, for acts alleged to have been committed by the contractor while building the road, the contract between the railroad corporation and the defendant for building the same is admissible in evidence for the plaintiff. Bigelow v. Dawson, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 97.

Plaintiff in trespass gave in evidence a survey and location of lands in B county, held by A at his death, which included the locus in quo, and offered in evidence A's will, containing a power of sale of all his lands in B county. It was held that an objection to the will on the ground that it "was not located upon the plats," should not be sustained. Blaen Avon Coal Co. v. McCulloh, 59 Md. 403; 43 Am. Rep. 560.

In Maryland, in an action of trespass qu. cl., it is unnecessary to produce the plats in evidence where the defendant has notice of the execution of the warrant of resurvey; the plaintiff may prove the trespass noted upon the plats by witnesses. Trammell v. Hook, 1 Har. & M. (Md.) 259.

Though an instrument not under seal cannot survey the legal title to land, yet in an action of trespass, it may be competent evidence to show a license or authority from the owner of the land to the defendant to enter thereon. Floyd v. Ricks, 14 Ark. 286; 58 Am. Dec. 374.

Where appraisers, chosen by the parties, certified the damages in trespass, it was held that such certificate might be given in evidence in an action for such trespass, the appraisers themselves having been both first examined. Crane v. Sayre, 6 N. J. L. 110.

In an action of trespass qu. cl., it is not sufficient to show that, by the removal of a fence by the defendant, stock damaged the plaintiff's crop, without proof as to when, where, and by whom it was erected, or any agreement respecting it, nor any evidence that any cattle of defendant ever trespassed on the plaintiff's close. Richardson v. Milburn, 11 Md. 340.

An execution creditor having levied on the real estate of a debtor, with a house and shop standing thereon, caused the same to be appraised. Afterward, being dissatisfied with the appraisal of the shop, he ordered the officer to proceed no farther with his levy upon the real estate, but to levy upon the personal property, which he accordingly did, and sold it to the amount of the price of the shop. The creditor then resorted again to the real estate, procured from the appraisers a certificate of the sum at which they had appraised the house and land, and then caused the whole of the land, with the house and shop situated thereon, to be set off to him, without any mention being made of the shop. It was held that parol evidence of these proceedings might be admitted in an action of trespass brought by the debtor against the creditor, for taking the personal property. Leavenworth v. Baldwin, 2 Day (Conn.) 317.

In an action for trespass on vacant lands, where the trial court has found that there was no possession on the part of the plaintiff, whose only acts in relation thereto were to look over them occasionally and request neighboring residents to look after trespassers, the reviewing court cannot say there was no evidence to support the finding and it must stand. Hecock v. Van Dusen, 80 Mich. 358.

In an action of trespass qu. cl., a plat returned in a former action, in which the defendant was the same, and which plat was located on the plats returned in this action, was admitted as evidence to show the admissions of the defendants in the former action. Reeves v. Middleton, 2 Har. & M. (Md.) 414.

When the defendant in an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., justifies under an alleged right of way across the plaintiff's close, acquired by more than twenty years' use, evidence that the plaintiff's grantor conveyed the close to him, after the way was used, without excepting any way, and with covenants of warranty, and against incumbrances, has some tendency, though slight, to show that the defendant's use of the way was permissive, and not adverse. Hewins v. Smith, 11 Met. (Mass.) 241.

Where, on the trial of an action for assault and battery, the plaintiff called facie case, and if the jury fail to mould their verdict accordingly, the verdict will be set aside.¹

two witnesses, one of whom testified to the assault without stating any matter to justify it, and the other also proved the same assault, but stated circumstances of justification, it was held that the court could not be required to order a nonsuit. Labar v. Koplin, 4 N. Y. 546.

In an action of trespass for shooting the plaintiff's horse on parade, evidence of the defendant's disorderly conduct at the time, is admissible. Tomlinson v. Booth, 2 Root (Conn.) 32.

In an action of tort against a city for breaking and entering the plaintiff's close, the defendant, under an answer alleging that the city council voted to lay out and did lay out a sewer, according to law, through the close in question, on the petition of the owners of the close, with notice to the abutters, and before the plaintiff was owner of the close, may introduce as a justification the proceedings of the city council laying a sewer. Hildreth v. Lowell, 11 Gray (Mass.) 345.

Plaintiff claimed damages for logs, marked A, cut and carried away from his lands, in sections 13 and 14, by defendants; and his witness testified that 99,643 feet, in all, were cut thereon. A defendant testified that all the logging in that vicinity was done by himself; also that he cut about 25,000 feet of logs marked X on sections 24 and 14. Plaintiff testified that 10,800 feet so marked were not so cut on his lands. It was held proper to charge that there was evidence tending to show that 74,600 feet marked A were taken from plaintiff's lands. Lee v. Lord, 76 Wis. 582.

The plaintiff proved by a witness, that he was present when the land on which the trespass was alleged to have been committed was originally located or taken up, and that it was then located as it now is on the plats. It was held that the evidence was admissible to prove the original beginning and location of the tract. Hogmire v. McCoy, 2 Har. & J. (Md.) 351.

Where logs had been levied upon and left in the possession of the defendant in execution, evidence that a purchaser at a private sale had notice of the levy before his purchase, and was therefore not deceived by the continuance of the logs in their usual range, may well be considered by the jury, in an action of trespass by him against a subsequent purchaser at the execution sale. Tucker v. Bond, 23 Ark. 268.

The plea to an action of trespass quod alleged title, in the defendant, to a certain parcel of land particularly described, a part of which was a part only of the land described in the plaintiff's declaration, and averred that the land thus described in the plea was the same land upon which the trespasses complained of were committed. The plaintiff traversed the allegation of the plea; and on the trial of this issue, without a new assignment, offered evidence of acts of trespass committed by the defendant on other parts of the land described in the declaration. It was held that such evidence was admissible, both to disprove the allegations in the defendant's plea, and to show the damages sustained by the plaintiff. Lamb v. Beebe, 10 Conn. 322.

1. While the Weight of the Testimony Is Usually a Question for the Jury, the Facts May Show Such a Case as Make a Certain Finding Necessary—Illustrations.—In an action for damages for willfully driving away plaintiff's bull from its usual range, it is necessary to prove that the driving away was willful, and the burden thereof is on plaintiff. When the plaintiff fails to prove such facts, and the only evidence bearing on the point comes from the defendant, from which it appears it is doubtful whether the animal actually left his range, and that defendant made strenuous efforts to cut him out of the herd and leave him where he was found, but he persistently returned, a verdict for plaintiff will be set aside. Newell v. Giggey, 13 Colo. 16. See also State v. Stenner, 50 N. J. L. 59; Am. Dig. (1887), p. 1245, § 20.

In an action of trespass for cutting timber on plaintiff's land, one witness testified that he had pointed out to plaintiff the place where he cut the timber, and another testified that he had pointed out to plaintiff the place whence he drew the timber. Plaintiff himself testified that the places so pointed out were on his land. The first witness also testified that in cutting the timber he did not cross the line separating defendant's land from plaintiff's, and the defendant testified that after it was cut down, the timber was drawn to the plaintiff's land for more convenient removal. It was held that a verdict for the plaintiff was contrary to the evidence. Wedge v. Spencer (Supreme Ct.), 7 N. Y. Supp. 173.

In an action of trespass against commissioners of highways for entering on plaintiff's land and cutting down timber, where they allege that they did so supposing that it was a regularly laid out highway, but there is no evidence that they endeavored to ascertain the fact, and it is shown that they were warned by plaintiff not to do so, a judgment for defendants will be reversed. Yowell v. Braden, 29 Ill. App. 29.

In an action of trespass qu. cl., the identity of the close and the possession may be established by any person who knows the lines and corners, or who can prove the plaintiff's possession; and the evidence necessary to proof of title is not requisite. Ledbetter v. Fitzgerald, 1 Ark. 448.

It appearing from the evidence that defendant entered on plaintiff's premises with his consent, a demurrer to the evidence was properly sustained. Bennett v. McIntire, 121 Ind. 231.

In an action for assault and battery, no evidence implicating one of the defendants was given by the plaintiff, but the defendants, in their cross-examination of a witness, proved that all the defendants had been indicted and convicted for the same offense. It was held that this was sufficient evidence to authorize a verdict against all the defendants. Wolff v. Cohen, 8 Rich. (S. Car.) 144.

In a suit to recover damages for cutting timber, the plaintiff put in evidence a deed to himself, and proved his possession of the land at a date subsequent to that of the deed, and until shortly before the alleged trespass, and his title appeared to be a matter of common notoriety, and the discontinuance of his possession was explained so as not to affect his title. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to enable the plaintiff to maintain the action. Kolb v. Bankhead, 18 Tex. 228.

In an action of trespass to recover the value of timber cut and carried away from plaintiff's premises, the only evidence to connect one of defendants with the trespass was that he was the owner of a mill in which the timber was found. It was held that a verdict was properly directed in his favor. Holliday v. Jackson, 30 Mo. App. 263.

In an action of trespass for damages caused by defendant's cattle breaking into plaintiff's inclosure, the plaintiff need only show that his fence was a lawful fence at the place of breach. Crane v. Ellis, 31 Iowa 510.

In an action of trespass for throwing down a fence and leaving down bars on a private way which defendant had across plaintiff's premises, a verdict for defendant will not be disturbed where the evidenceshows the defendant's conduct was justified by plaintiff's interference with defendant's use of the way. Keating v. Hayden, 30 Ill. App. 433; appeal dismissed, 132 Ill. 308.

In an action of trespass qu. cl., the defendant took defense for and located on the plats, a tract of land called A, including the tract called B, on which the trespass was alleged to have been committed, and which last tract the plaintiff located on the plats. He also located lot No. 3351, but did not counter-locate the location made by the defendant. The defendant read in evidence the grant A, "beginning at the end of the second line of lot No. 3351." It was held that it was not necessary for him to produce the grant of lot No. 3351, to prove its location, and the beginning of A. Tomlinson v. Rizer, 2 Har. & J. (Md.) 444.

1. On the Plaintiff.—In an action of trespass qu. cl., the plaintiff must make out affirmatively, the burden of proof being upon him, where a monument named in his title-deed stands, and that it includes the place which defendant entered upon. Robinson v. White, 42 Me. 209.

In an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., it is necessary to prove the abutments of the close, as stated in the declaration; but the abutments are not to be construed strictly. Wheeler v. Rowell, 6 N. H. 215; Hogmire v. McCoy, 2 Har. & J. (Md.) 351; Hooker v. Hicock, 2 Aik. (Vt.) 172.

In an action to recover for the cutting and taking away of certain timber, from a certain lot, the boundary line of which is in dispute, the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to estab-

It may be stated that it rests on him who persists in remaining on land, or in possession wrongfully; ¹ where each is claiming the property by the pleadings, the burden is on the plaintiff, ² unless lish the location of such line. Downer v. Tarbell, 61 Vt. 530.

In an action against execution creditors for trespass in seizing plaintiff's goods under an execution against a third person, the burden of proving the ownership, seizure, conversion and value of the goods is on the plaintiff, as is also that of proving any circumstances of oppression or malice attending the levy, as a basis for exemplary damages. Willis v. Hudson, 72 Tex. 598.

In an action of trespass qu. cl., if the plaintiff cannot prove the trespass in the locus in quo, he must at least show it to have been committed on some inclosed or cultivated ground belonging to himself. Smith v. Wilson, 1 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 40.

A defendant in trespass, having planted a crop while in possession of the land, and having once left it, and afterwards entered upon it while in possession of the plaintiff, and carried away the produce, it was held that the plaintiff must show that he entered under a rightful authority, in order to support his action. Myers v. Myers, 1 Bailey (S. Car.) 306.

In an action of trespass to try title, where the question depended upon whether a registration of a judgment or the execution of a deed was prior in point of time, it was held that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show that the judgment was prior to the deed, and that there was no presumption to that effect. Hillmann v. Meyer, 35 Tex. 538.

1. On Him Wrongfully Maintaining Possession.—In an action of trespass for removing the plaintiff's house from his close, it appeared that the house was removed and found on the land of the defendant, and occupied by him. It was held that, under the plea of "not guilty," the presumption was, that the defendant removed the house, and that the burden was on him to show the contrary. Finch v. Alston, 2 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 83.

One who takes timber from the land of another, and justifies under a contract with a tenant, has the burden of proving the latter's authority. Ladd v. Shattock, 90 Ala. 134.

Where defendant in an action of trespass, admits his act of spoliation, it devolves on him to show that it was not committed on plaintiff's property, and his failure to do so justifies the direction of a verdict for plaintiff. Campbell v. King, 32 Mo. App. 38. See also Downer v. Tarbell, 61 Vt. 530; Am. Dig. (1889), p. 3697, § 34.

Where the defendant claims title to a lot, as a part of a preemption claim to land located by him, he must prove an inclosure of, and marked and visible boundaries embracing the lot in dispute. Larue v. Gaskins, 5 Cal. 164.

In an action of trespass, the plaintiff declared on a grant from the state of land described by metes and bounds with the exception of 250 acres previously granted. It was held that it was incumbent on the defendant to show that the trespass was committed on the part previously granted. McCormick v. Monroe, 1 Jones (N. Car.) 13.

In an action of trespass for cutting timber, the defendant gave in evidence the following letter from the plaintiff: "I will consent to your taking my timber upon the terms proposed in your letter, but restricting you to that which has been injured by fire, in the first place, and preferring that you should begin between B.'s lot and the creek," etc. It was held that this was a mere license, and revocable, and not an agreement; that, therefore, cutting timber after revocation would be trespass; and that, if the license was founded on any proposition of the defendant, so as to make it a contract, then it was incumbent on the defendant to show it. Tillotson v. Preston, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 285.

2. Each Claiming Property by Pleadings.—In an action of trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's close, where each of the parties by his pleadings asserts that the land in question is his, the burden of proving title is on the plaintiff. Tabor v. Judd, 62 N. H. 288.

Where damage is done by a party in the exercise of his lawful rights, the plaintiff must prove that the loss he has sustained occurred without fault on his part, and in consequence of the neglect of the defendant. Waldron v. Portland, etc., R. Co., 35 Me. 422.

In an action for trespass to realty, the plaintiff cannot recover without making proper proof of the damages the plaintiff is in possession of the property, in which case the burden falls on the defendant.¹

9. Allegata and Probata.—While the plaintiff need not prove each and every allegation in the declaration, he must prove enough to give him a right of recovery.² The facts proven must enable him to recover in the form of action chosen.³ The plaintiff cannot select one of several causes of action set out in his declasustained. Pacific Express Co. v. Lasker Real Estate Assoc., 81 Tex. 81.

In an action for trespass in digging a ditch, etc., the burden of proof is on the plaintiff, relying on surveys of land as evidence of possession, to show that they were recorded within the time prescribed by the Nevada Stat. 1861, 267, and 1864, 344. Rivers v. Burbank, 13 Nev. 398.

1. On Defendant if Not in Possession.

—Where the plaintiff brings his action for an injury to land of which he is in possession, and on the trial each party sets up title to the land, the burden of proof is on the defendant to make out that the title is in himself. If each party shows an independent title of equal strength, the defendant fails. Heath v. Williams, 25 Me. 209; 43 Am. Dec. 265; Townsend v. Kerna, 2 Watts (Pa.) 180. See Caskey v. Lewis, 15 B. Mon. (Ky.) 27.

If a party justifies a trespass by claiming title to the premises under a patent which is good in part and bad in part, the burden of proof is on him to show himself within the efficient call of the instrument under which he justifies. Rondell v. Fay, 32 Cal. 354.

In an action of trespass, by the purchaser of a chattel, under an execution, for the destruction of such chattel by the defendant, the chattel never having been in the possession of the plaintiff, he is bound to prove his property, not only by showing a purchase by himself, but also an authority in the officer to sell. Carter v. Simpson, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 535.

In an action to recover a statutory penalty for the cutting of trees, the burden of showing mistake or reasonable care is upon defendant. Keirn v. Warfield, 60 Miss. 799.

2. Plaintiff Must Make Out Case.—In an action for trespass in entering and injuring plaintiff's building, when defendant attempts to justify his acts as having been necessary to protect plaintiff's premises from injury by excavations which defendant was making on his own land, evidence of the effect on plaintiff's premises, of the digging on defendant's own land, is admissible in connection with the evidence of trespass on the plaintiff's premises. Cozzens v. Higgins, 1 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 451.

In a suit for damages to personal property, evidence is not admissible to prove damages done to property not designated in the petition. Whitmore v. Bowman, 4 Greene (Iowa) 148.

In trespass for entering plaintiff's close and carrying away goods, the plaintiff may give the value of the goods in evidence, though he has brought replevin for the same goods, if the defendant has pleaded property in that action, and it is still pending. Krider v. Lafferty, 1 Whart. (Pa.) 303.

In an action of trespass on land, the defendant cannot, after having set up in his answer a right to enter by license of a third person, the owner, change his ground on the trial, and show title in himself. Coan v. Osgood, 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 583.

In an action for an assault and battery, the plaintiff is not to be restricted in evidence to the mere act complained of, but is entitled to prove all the immediate consequences and natural results of which the act was the direct cause. Hodges v. Nance, 1 Swan (Tenn.) 57.

An allegation in trespass for double damages for injury done by dogs, that the defendants were "owners and keepers" of the dogs, is a matter of description, and must be proved as alleged. Buddington v. Shearer, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 477; McFarlane v. Ray, 14 Mich. 465; Phillips v. Phillips, 21 N. J. L. 42; Ropps v. Barker, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 239; Eames v. Prentice, 8 Cush. (Mass.) 337; Anderson v. Thunder Bay River Boom Co., 61 Mich. 489.

3. Must Recover on Form of Action Chosen.—In an action of trespass against the owner of hogs for injuries done by them to the plaintiff's crops, he cannot be allowed to prove what amount of crops he would have made without the injury; but the damages ration, as one of several lots on each of which the alleged trespass has been committed, for proof, but must prove trespass on all, if he seeks to recover on all.¹ He is not confined to proof that the

would be, perhaps, the value of the crops at the time of their destruction, so far as they were destroyed. Gresham v. Taylor, 51 Ala. 505.

In an action of trespass qu. cl., the defendant offered the prayer "that from the pleadings and evidence in the cause the plaintiff was not entitled to recover." It was held that it could not, under this prayer, be argued in this court, that there was no evidence that the land was situated in the county where the suit was brought, because the record did not show that this point was raised and decided below. Tyson v. Shuey, 5 Md. 540.

In an action of trespass qu. cl., a plea of soil and freehold is not supported by evidence that the defendant was a tenant in common with the plaintiff. Roberts v. Dame, 11 N. H. 226.

An allegation that defendant carried away and destroyed 150 bushels of plaintiff's potatoes, may be sustained by proof that defendant dug up, carried away, and destroyed that amount of potatoes, which, though fully matured, were still in the ground; since growing crops planted by a tenant constitute personal property. Salimone Min., etc., Co. v. Wagner, 2 Ind. App. 81.

A declaration for an injury to cattle is not supported by evidence of injury to mules. Brown v. Bailey, 4 Ala. 413.

Where the only cause of action stated in the petition was the breaking into the plaintiff's close and threshing and carrying away certain grain, evidence that the plaintiff's wife was injured and incapacitated from labor in forcibly resisting the trespass, was held to be inadmissible. Fisher v. Conway, 21 Kan. 18; 30 Am. Rep. 419; Veeder v. Cooley, 4 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 245.

1. MUST PROVE EVERY CAUSE OF ACTION ON WHICH RECOVERY IS SOUGHT.—On the trial of issues on general replication of lib. ten., pleaded to two counts, the plaintiff cannot recover, unless he proves two closes, and a trespass on each, if the defendant is entitled to land in the county where the trespass is charged to have been committed. Tribble v. Frame, 7 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 529.

In trespass qu. cl., the plaintiff will not be restricted in his proof to any less number of lots than is set forth in his declaration. Gardner v. Gooch, 48 Me. 487.

In trespass qu. cl. fr., the defendant pleaded that the locus in quo was a public highway, and produced a town vote appropriating a part of certain common lands for highways. It was held that the plea was not supported without proof that the locus in quo was included in such part. Emerson v. Wiley, 7 Pick. (Mass.) 68.

Where a declaration in trespass qu. cl. fr., alleges the trespass in entering the close and the dwelling house of the plaintiff, and the defendant pleads lib. ten., he must confine his proof to the dwelling house of the plaintiff, and may not show title in another tenement at the time of the alleged trespass. Hope v. Cason, 3 B. Mon. (Ky.) 544.

Where the owner of several closes in the same town brings an action of trespass qu. cl., and declares generally that the defendant broke and entered his close in that town, and thereon committed certain acts, he may prove such acts of trespass to have been committed on any one close of his in that town. But if he introduces and relies upon testimony to prove a trespass upon one close, he must be confined to the close thus selected, and cannot support his action by the introduction afterwards of testimony to prove acts of trespass upon a different close, whether such testimony is objected to or not. Elliot v. Shepherd, 25 Me. 371.

Under an averment of breaking and entering the plaintiff's close and of alia enormia, upon a plea of not guilty, the plaintiff may prove the pulling down of his house in the same town alleged, without a distinct averment thereof. Snider v. Myers, 3 W. Va. 195.

Under a plea of lib. ten. in trespass qu. cl., the plaintiff who claimed title under a decree of sale, as purchaser thereunder, was allowed to prove the decree and sale which were prior to the trespass for which the action was brought, although ratification of the sale and the deed to the plaintiff, were subsequent to such trespass. Hunter v. Hatton, 4 Gill (Md.) 115; 45 Am. Dec. 117.

trespass was committed on a particular day alleged,¹ and where the trespass is laid with a continuando, he may waive the alleged time and prove a trespass committed before the action was brought.² Generally stated, boundaries need not be exactly proven;³ but particular places, accurately described as the place or thing of the trespass, must be.⁴ Under the allegation of a single trespass,

1. Not Confined to Particular Day.—The time of commission of a trespass need not be proved as laid; it is sufficient if it is within the Statute of Limitations. Allen v. Archer, 49 Me. 346.

In an action of trespass for acts alleged to be done between certain days, if the plaintiff proves an act done between those days, he cannot afterwards be permitted even to give in evidence an act before the first day. Peirce v. Pickins, 16 Mass. 470.

In trespass by the mortgagor against the mortgagee of personal property, for taking possession of the property after the law-day of the mortgage, the defendant justifying under a power in the mortgage, and the plaintiff contending that the mortgage was satisfied, the plaintiff may prove payments on the mortgage debt made by him after the law-day, before the alleged trespass. Thornton v. Cochran, 51 Ala. 415.

The rule that proofs of acts done on a day other than that alleged cannot be admitted when the complaint contains no continuando, nor any allegation of the trespass "on divers other days," is not consistent with the liberal rule required under the Utah practice act. Burnham v. Call, 2 Utah 433.

2. Trespass Laid with a Continuando.—Where, in trespass qu. cl., with a continuando, the plaintiff failed to prove an entry within the period specified in the writ, he is at liberty to waive the time alleged in the declaration, and, having proved any single act of trespass at any time before action brought, may recover damages therefor. Little v. Downing, 37 N. H. 355; Brown v. Manter, 22 N. H. 468; Fontleroy v. Aylmer, 1 Ld. Raym. 239; Hume v. Oldacre, 1 Starkie 351. In an action of trespass for an encroachment by the defendant's wharf on the plaintiff's water lot, it was held that the plaintiff might go into evidence under a continuando, this being no disseisin. Arden v. Kermit, Anth. (N. Y.) 83.

In trespass qu. cl., time is not material, and if the trespass is alleged to have been committed before the title of the plaintiff accrued, it may be proved to have been afterward. Cooper v. Taylor, 15 N. J. L. 455.

3. Boundaries Need Not Be Exactly Proven.—In trespass qu. cl., where the plaintiff declares, setting out the close with abutments, it is only necessary that he should show title to that part of the close in which the trespass was committed. King v. Dunn, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 253; Wheeler v. Rowell, 7 N. H. 515; Barden v. Smith, 7 Wis. 439; Colby v. Collins, 41 N. H. 301.

Where the declaration in trespass described the plaintiff's close, as bounded north on the land of an adjoining owner, it is sufficient if the evidence shows that owner's land to be in any degree north. Rollins v. Varney, 22 N. H. 99.

A defendant who pleads lib. ten. to a declaration in trespass qu. cl., setting out the close by abutments, sustains his defense, if he shows title to that portion of the close where the trespass is alleged by the plaintiff to have been committed. Rich v. Rich, 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 663; Peaslee v. Wadleigh, 5 N. H. 317; Austin v. Morse, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 476; Burton v. Lazell, 16 Vt. 158.

In an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., the plaintiff is not required to prove title to the whole of the close described, if he proves it to that part in which the trespass was committed. Knowles v. Dow, 20 N. H. 135.

An action for entering upon the plaintiff's close is sustained by proof of a trespass upon any part of the close described. Porter v. Sullivan, 7 Gray (Mass.) 441.

If there are partial discrepancies between the description of land in the petition for its recovery, and that in the deed or levy under which it is claimed, they do not raise the question of variance, but of identity. They are not material, if it is evident that the description in the petition and the written evidence of title point to the same land. Smith v. Chatham, 14 Tex. 322.

4. Where the plaintiff alleges a tres-evidence as to distinct acts of trespass may be shown,¹ but proof cannot be given of a distinct substantive right of action.² Where pass on a certain part of a tract of land, his proof is limited to that part. Jennings v. Meldrum, 15 Oregon 629.

In trespass qu. cl. fr., the defendant pleaded a general right to enter the plaintiff's land to cleanse a water course, which was the trespass complained of. It was held that this plea was not supported by evidence of the particular right to use the water course, and cleanse it, so as to drain the defendant's meadows. Darlington v. Painter, 7 Pa. St. 473.

In an action of trespass for breaking a close and destroying a milldam, evidence of trespass committed on a part of the dam without the close was held to be inadmissible. White v. Moseley, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 230.

In an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., where a particular place is assigned in the declaration, the trespass must be proved as laid; otherwise, the defendant might be surprised. Manning v. McDonell, 3 Brev. (S. Car.) 15.

The town of M., in a deed conveying a beach to B., reserved the right to enter thereon, and take away gravel and sand, for the purpose of making and repairing highways in the town. A., under authority of the town, entered on the beach and carried away, for the purpose of repairing highways in the town, stones of a considerable size, imbedded in and mixed with the beach gravel. It was held in an action of trespass brought by B. against A., that A. could not give evidence that, in the town of M., the material which he took from the beach was, at the time of the making of the deed, and since is, universally known and called gravel, and that it was not there generally known as and called by any other name; but he might give evidence that said material was the same that the town of M. had always used for making and repairing highways. Brown v. Brown, 8 Met. (Mass.) 573.

1. Distinct Acts Under Single Allegation.—In an action for trespass qu. cl., and with teams and men treading down the plaintiff's grass upon a certain day, evidence may be properly admitted of several distinct acts or entries, each of which might alone technically constitute a breaking, when these several acts of trespass or entries are upon the same close, upon the same day, and in pursuance of the same general purpose. Cheswell v. Chapman, 42 N. H. 47.

The plaintiff, after introducing evidence tending to prove the five distinct acts of trespass counted upon in the declaration, proceeded, against objection, to prove other acts and words not alleged, some of which were so connected with the acts declared upon as to form a part of the transaction, and most of which were independent of these acts and occurred on other occasions, during the period and about the time during which the defendant was said to have committed the several trespasses with which he was charged. It was held that these other acts and words were legitimate subjects of consideration, either in settling the amount of damages or determining the right of the plaintiff to recover. Devine v. Rand, 38 Vt. 621.

In an action of trespass, the plaintiff, by alleging trespasses to have been committed on a certain day, and on divers other days between that day and another day, makes time a descriptive part of the trespass, and opens the door for proof as to any trespass committed within that time and closes it as to all others. Payne v. Green, 10 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 507.

2. Proof Confined to Allegations.—If the plaintiff, in an action of tort for breaking and entering his close, counts on a trespass committed on divers days between two dates, and gives evidence of a single act of trespass committed at another time, he cannot be permitted also to prove a trespass within the times alleged. Powell v. Bagg, 15 Gray (Mass.) 507; Joralimon v. Pierpont, Anth. (N. Y.) 42.

Under a declaration alleging that the defendant placed large quantities of wood, coal, bricks, and rubbish on the plaintiff's close, and kept and continued them there until the commencement of the suit, but not alleging that the trespass was committed on divers days, evidence of two independent trespasses is not admissible. Kendall v. Bay State Brick Co., 125 Mass. 532.

Under a complaint alleging that, on a day named, and on divers other days and times between that day and the commencement of the suit, the defendant's cattle broke into and upon the farm and land of the plaintiff and destroyed the growing crops thereon, it was held that it was competent for the plaintiff to prove any number of trespasses committed by the defendant's cattle, between the day alleged and the bringing of the suit. Richardson v. Northrup, 66 Barb. (N. Y.) 85.

In an action of trespass to lands, the declaration alleged that the defendant broke and entered into the plaintiff's lands, and trod down and destroyed the herbage, and cut down the trees, and dug up the ground, to the plaintiff's damage; and the plaintiff introduced evidence to prove that the defendant not only cut down the trees, but removed the wood; the court charged the jury that in estimating damages they might take into consideration the cutting and removal of the wood, if the trespass was one continued act. It was held that the evidence was inadmissible, and the charge erroneous. Johnson v. Gorham, 38 Conn. 513. Compare Barnes v. Burt, 38 Conn. 541.

1. In an action of trespass on land, if the defendant claims title under the person through whom the plaintiff claims, the plaintiff need not prove title in such person. The defendant, by relying on him, admits he has title. McBurney v. Cutler, 18 Barb. (N. Y.) 203.

In an action of trespass, where the defendant has not set up title, it is error to permit him to offer evidence of title. Fidler v. Smith, 10 Iowa 587.

In an action for breaking and entering the plaintiff's close, under an answer denying that the close belonged to the plaintiff, or that the defendant entered it, the defendant may show that the plaintiff had only an easement in it. Smith v. Slocumb, 11 Gray (Mass.) 280.

Where the defendant, in an action of trespass on land, does not claim title, he may not set up technical objections to the plaintiff's right to sue. Mallett v. White, 52 Conn. 50.

In trespass, where the answer does not traverse the plaintiff's possession or title, he is not put to prove his title, although the land is wild and vacant. O'Reilly v. Davies, 4 Sandf. (N. Y.) 722.

2. Joint Trespassers.—When several defendants are declared against jointly for a trespass, if a joint trespass is proved, the plaintiff cannot waive that and give evidence of another trespass against one only; but a trespass may be proved, and the plaintiff recover against one only. McCarron v. O'Connell, 7 Cal. 152.

In an action of trespass against several defendants, if the plaintiff proves a joint trespass against part of them only, he cannot afterwards give evidence of another trespass by all, even against such part alone. Snodgrass v. Hunt, 15 Ind. 274.

In an action of trespass to chattels, it appeared that the plaintiff was sole owner of a part of the property injured, and part owner of the remainder, the acts of trespass being the same to both parts. It was held that there was no error in refusing to exclude evidence of the trespass to the property of which the plaintiff was only part owner, the defendant not having raised the question of ownership by his answer. Lefebvre v. Utter, 22 Wis. 189.

3. Variance.—In a declaration for erecting a building on a triangular piece of land, "which ought forever to remain open," the plaintiff proved such an easement in a piece of land in the shape of a parallelogram, which appeared to have been substituted by the parties for a right to pass over the triangular piece for the purpose of making repairs. It was held a variance, there being no allegation that the right to pass over had been obstructed. Hill v. Haskins, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 83.

In an action of trespass for taking goods, the defendant justified, as collector of a school tax, by virtue of a rate bill and warrant, and, in his plea, averred that he was appointed such collector on February 3d, 1838, "as by the record his appointment would appear." It was held that, although it might not have been necessary to refer to the record, yet, having done so, the variance was fatal. McDaniels v. Bucklin, 13 Vt. 279.

In an action of trespass against assessors, they justified, in a brief statement, as assessors of A.; but the evidence was of a parish of another corporate name. It was held a material variance. Bangs v. Snow, 1 Mass. 181.

In trespass to lands, under the code, the plaintiff may prove acts both within

X. DAMAGES—1. What Evidence Admissible.—In proving damages it is not necessary to show special damages to sustain the suit.¹ Evidence may be introduced showing the circumstances attending the perpetration of the alleged trespass.² The cases and before the time alleged, if the court sees that the defendant has not been misled and is not prejudiced in his defense by the variance. Relyea v. Beaver, 34 Barb. (N. Y.) 547; Debois v. Beaver, 25 N. Y. 123; 82 Am. Dec. 326; Terpenning v. Gallup, 8 Iowa 74.

Where a declaration in trespass avers the locus in quo to belong to the plaintiff, but the proof shows it to belong to the defendant, it is fatal. Shafer v. Smith, 7 Har. & J. (Md.) 67; Jewett v. Foster, 14 Gray (Mass.) 495; Longfellow v. Quimby, 29 Me. 196; 48 Am. Dec. 525; Benton v. Beattie, 63 Vt. 186; Murray v. Webster, 5 N. H. 391; Pike v. Elliott, 36 Ala. 69; Marsh v. Berry, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 344.

Illustrations as to Allegata and Probata.—Where a declaration alleged a wrongful entry of a close, with other personal injuries by way of aggravation only, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover damages for the personal injuries, if he failed to establish the wrongful entry alleged, they being merely incident thereto. Reed v. Peoria, etc., R. Co., 18 Ill. 403.

In trespass, where the unlawful breaking into the plaintiff's close is proved, it is not material to his right to recover, whether the matter of aggravation alleged is proved or not. Halsey v. Matthews, 3 Ind. 404.

The Alabama Code preserves the distinction between an action on the case and an action of trespass. Accordingly, under a count in trespass, evidence of an injury resulting from the negligence of the defendant will not authorize a recovery. Pruitt v. Ellington, 59 Ala. 454.

In trespass for taking the plaintiff's goods, it is no defense, under the general issue, that the sale by which the plaintiff obtained title to the goods was fraudulent. Harrison v. Davis, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 350.

Where a declaration in trespass alleges that the defendant took 176 bushels of corn, and the defendant, by his pleas, admits that "he took the corn in the declaration mentioned," it is unnecessary to prove the quantity. Wells v. Wilson, 3 Bibb (Ky.) 264.

Where the defendant forcibly took possession of the plaintiff's wheat field, driving the latter away, and harvested and sold the grain, it was held, in an action for such taking and conversion, that the defendant could not introduce evidence to prove the value of his own labor in harvesting and threshing the crop, for the purpose of reducing the damages. Ellis v. Wire, 33 Ind. 127; 5 Am. Rep. 189.

In an action of trespass to recover the value of certain liquors, where the defendant offered to prove that they were kept for sale by the plaintiff in violation of the law, it was held that as their status was a matter essential to determining their value, it was open to the defendant to show these facts. Lord v. Chadbourne, 42 Me. 429; 66 Am. Dec. 290.

Under a plea of not guilty, evidence is admissible to prove that the property claimed under an execution sale was not subject to execution, because covered by the allowances and exemptions to which a surviving wife was entitled, from the community property. Leatherwood v. Arnold, 66 Tex. 414.

Where the defendant pleads justification in trespass qu. cl. fr., the proof must be co-extensive with the plea; and if he fails in proof of his justification to any part of the trespass, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict without newly assigning the excess. Berry v. Vreeland, 21 N. J. L. 183.

In trespass qu. cl., proof of a lease will not support a justification under a license. Johnson v. Carter, 16 Mass. 443.

In trespass for breaking the plaintiff's close and cutting down his trees, if the plaintiff fails to prove the cutting of his trees, he may still recover for the breach of his close. Mundell v. Perry, 2 Gill & J. (Md.) 193.

1. Damages Need Not Be Shown.—In an action for a wrongful entry upon lands of the plaintiff, no actual damage need be proved. Smethurst v. Journey, 1 Houst. (Del.) 196.

Where one constructed a dam, so as to flow back water on the land of another, the law presumes that the act is a damage, and no special damage need be shown in order to sustain a suit. Woodman v. Tufts, 9 N. H. 88.

2. Attending Circumstances.—In an action of trespass for the illegal taking showing what, under varying circumstances, may be received in evidence are numerous and illustrative.¹

of goods by way of distress, after the trespass is proved, evidence may be admitted of the attendant circumstances, in order to guide the court in the assessment of damages. Roamine v. Norris, 8 N. J. L. 80.

A's sheep, while trespassing on B's land, commingled with B's sheep, and communicated to them a dangerous disease, of which many of them died, and no sufficient justification was shown for the trespass, it was held in an action of trespass qu. cl., that evidence of such communication of disease, was admissible to affect the damages, and that B was entitled, in such action, to recover damages for the loss of his sheep, as well as for the breach of his close. In order to recover such damages, it was not necessary for B to prove that A had knowledge of the diseased state of his sheep, at the time the disease was imparted, but it was competent for him to prove such knowledge, to enhance the damages, without any allegation to that effect in the declaration. Barnum v. Vandusen, 16 Conn. 200.

1. Insulting Words.—In an action of trespass for taking a slave out of the immediate possession of the plaintiff, evidence of abusive language to the plaintiff at the time of the trespass, is admissible to show quo animo the act was done, and to enhance the damages. Ratliff v. Huntley, 5 Ired. (N. Car.) 545.

In trespass qu. cl., insulting words used by the defendant to the plaintiff's wife, at the time of the trespass complained of, are admissible in evidence to show the character of the transaction. Golding v. Williams, Dudley (S. Car.) 92.

In an action for breaking and entering the dwelling house of the plaintiff, and doing other enormities to him, he cannot give evidence of an assault upon himself. Sampson v. Coy, 15 Mass. 493.

Other Cases.—Defendants in trespass having marked their cause "not for the jury," the court ordered judgment for the plaintiffs, and that the damages should be assessed by a jury. It was held, first, that the judgment did not preclude the defendants from introducing any evidence relevant to the subject of damages; second, that a release of a co-trespasser was admissible as evidence of some payment by the party to whom it was given; and that, if it purported to acknowledge full satisfaction, it would, unless rebutted, reduce the damages to a nominal sum. If rebutted so far as to show that there was no full satisfaction, the damages would be reduced to the extent that it was payment. Chamberlin v. Murphy, 41 Vt. 110.

It is not admissible, in an action of trespass for taking corn, for the plaintiff to prove, for the purpose of enhancing the damages, that, in consequence of the trespass, he was compelled to work as a day laborer to procure other corn. Sims v. Glazener, 14 Ala. 695; 48 Am. Dec. 120.

In trespass for taking away property, and depriving the plaintiff of the use of it, the plaintiff may prove the value of the use during the time he was deprived of the possession. Warfield v. Walter, 11 Gill & J. (Md.) 80.

In an action of trespass for seizing and detaining the plaintiff's goods, loss of credit cannot be proved, unless it appears to be intimately connected with the act complained of, and unless the act appears to have been done with an aggravating and malicious intention to injure the party complaining. Thomas v. Isett, 1 Greene (Iowa) 470.

In an action of trespass against a sheriff, for seizing and selling the plaintiff's goods under a judgment against another person, the amount paid out of the proceeds of sale, for rent of the premises, cannot be received in evidence to abate the damages. Dallan v. Fittler, 6 W. & S. (Pa.) 323.

In an action of trespass for taking and detaining a ship, it was held, that the plaintiff was entitled to give in evidence a process in replevin by C, a third person, a replevin bond by D and E, as sureties, and a judgment thereon in favor of the defendant, and to prove that he, the plaintiff, had indemnified those sureties, for the purpose of showing that he became liable to the defendant for the amount of his claim against C, and that this sum ought to be the rule of damages. Bird v. Clark, 3 Day (Conn.) 272; 3 Am. Dec. 269.

In trespass by A against B, for taking out of his possession goods sold to him by C, B cannot give in evidence a

2. Mitigation of Damages.—Any facts or circumstances which were the inducement to a transaction which is the occasion of the action, are admissible in mitigation of damages.¹ Under this head judgment against D (with the execution thereon), entered by confession under the New Jersey Rev. Laws, 634, § 18, in an action instituted before a justice of the peace, and without such an affidavit as is required by the act. Sheppard v. Sheppard, 10 N. J. L. 250.

Such judgment, though valid between the parties, has no operation against third persons, not even in mitigation of damages. But even for that purpose it is not admissible to show that property, illegally taken, was subsequently applied, without the assent of the owner, in satisfaction of a valid execution against him. Higgins v. Whitney, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 379.

In trespass for taking and selling goods on execution, the cost price of such goods may be given in evidence. McElrath v. Kintzing, 5 Pa. St. 336.

In an action of trespass for taking and carrying away property of the plaintiff, evidence of any circumstances which impart to the property a particular value to the owner, is admissible to enable the jury to determine the injury sustained by its loss, immediately resulting from the wrongful acts of the defendants. Burr v. Woodrow, 1 Bush (Ky.) 602.

In an action of trespass, the plaintiff may prove special damages, if they are strictly in consequence of the trespass committed, or if the act done by the defendant, causing such special damages, constitutes a part of an entire transaction, of which the principal trespass was the commencement. Damron v. Roach, 4 Humph. (Tenn.) 134.

In trespass for breaking the plaintiff's house, and beating his wife, the court would not admit evidence of the beating of his wife. Lawrence v. Phelps, 2 Root (Conn.) 334.

In trespass qu. cl. fr., against the defendant, for passing over the plaintiff's grounds, and affixing a handbill to his door, the contents of the handbill are a proper subject for the consideration of the jury in the estimation of damages, and they may be therefore set out in the declaration and proved. Ogden v. Gibbons, 5 N. J. L. 518.

In trespass for unlawfully entering the plaintiff's house under pretense of searching for money stolen, the plaintiff may give evidence of an injury to character thereby, and it is immaterial whether such injury is alleged or not. Anonymous, Minor (Ala.) 52; 12 Am. Dec. 31.

In an action for assault and battery, in estimating the damages, the jury are not confined to the proof of actual pecuniary loss, but may take into consideration every circumstance of the act which injuriously affected the plaintiff, not only in his property, but his person, his peace of mind, and his individual happiness. Taber v. Hutson, 5 Ind. 322; 61 Am. Dec. 96.

Where the immediate injury to the plaintiff is the breaking of a leg, for which he brings an action for damages, it is proper to show the then and probable future conditions of the limb, but not the consequences of a hypothetical second fracture. Lincoln v. Saratoga, etc., R. Co., 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 425.

1. Mitigation of Damages.—Facts and circumstances are admissible in evidence, in an action of trespass qu. cl., by way of mitigation, which were the inducements to a transaction, even though they may happen to involve character. Rhodes v. Bunch, 3 McCord (S. Car.) 66.

In an action of trespass for pulling down a building, evidence that the building was peaceably taken down, and its materials preserved, in conformity with the directions of the commissioners of the township, during a period of great public excitement and disorder, with a view of saving the neighborhood from threatened violence, is admissible in mitigation of damages. Reed v. Bias, 8 W. & S. (Pa.) 189.

A constable who has taken property out of his precinct, by virtue of mesne process, and who is sued in trespass for such taking, may show, in mitigation of damages, that, having taken the property to a place within his precinct, he attached it there on the same process, as the property of the same debtor, subsequent to the commencement of the action of trespass against him. And it makes no difference that the plaintiff, in the action of trespass, is one who claims by virtue of a sale from such debtor, which sale was fraudulent evidence as to the motive of the party charged with the commission of the trespass in question is competent.¹

3. What Damages Recoverable—a. ACTUAL DAMAGES.—Usually, in actions of trespass, the measure of the damages is the actual value of the property destroyed; such damages are given as a compensation to the damaged party for the injury done.² If as to creditors. Stewart v. Martin, 16 Vt. 397.

Cases in Point.—Ballard v. Leavell, 5 Call (Va.) 531; Sherry v. Schuyler, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 204; Hawthorne v. Siegall, 88 Cal. 15; Boling v. Wright, 16 Ala. 664; Perry v. Chandler, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 237; Huftalin v. Misner, 70 Ill. 55; Sawyer v. Jarvis, 13 Ired. (N. Car.) 179; Loewenberg v. Rosenthal, 18 Oregon 178; Hanmer v. Wilsey, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 91; *Willis v. Dec. 203; Collins v. Todd, 17 Mo. 537.

1. As to Motive.—The spirit which actuates the party committing the trespass, enters largely into the question of damages, and it is competent to show that he acted without malice or recklessness. If the party against whom this evidence is received desires to have it limited to this legitimate purpose, he should ask an instruction accordingly. Roth v. Smith, 41 Ill. 315.

An admission by plaintiff's counsel, on the trial of an action of trespass, that the defendant acted without malice, precludes the plaintiff from recovering vindictive damages, and therefore evidence on the part of the defendant, in the nature of a justification of the act, is admissible in the way, by way of mitigation of damages. Hoyt v. Gelston, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 141, reversed in 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 561; Machin v. Geortner, 14 Wend. (N. Y.) 239; Powers v. Florance, 7 La. Ann. 524; Simpson v. McCaffrey, 13 Ohio 508; Caston v. Perry, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 104.

2. Actual Damages Recoverable.—In trespass for taking and carrying away sheep, the measure of damages is the market value of the sheep, and not their value to the plaintiff. Gardner v. Field, 1 Gray (Mass.) 151.

The damages for the destruction of a house on the premises is the cost of replacing it, and its value while that is being done. Marks v. Culmer (Utah, 1890), 24 Pac. Rep. 528.

A trespasser who knowingly takes stone from the land of another, is liable for the value of the stone after it has been quarried. Cheaney v. Nebraska, etc., Stone Co., 41 Fed Rep. 740.

In trespass for removing soil and grass from plaintiff's land, the measure of damages is the value of the material removed, and it is error to instruct the jury merely that they shall assess plaintiff's damages at whatever sum they believe him entitled to from the evidence. Flynt v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 38 Mo. App. 94.

Where, after sale on execution against the purchaser of goods sold on condition, part of the property is returned to the seller, his measure of damages is the value of the use of such property during the time it is kept, and compensation for any injury between the time of taking and the restoration. Fields v. Williams (Ala. 1891), 8 So. Rep. 808.

In such case, though the land consists of a tract of six or seven acres, and the excavations cover only about three-fourths of an acre thereof, the owner has the right to recover for the depreciation in the market value of the entire tract. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Willets, 45 Kan. 110.

Where one agreed to supply a railroad company with timber for the construction of its road, and subcontractors under him entered on the plaintiff's land without authority, and cut down trees, and converted them into cross ties, which were afterwards delivered to the railroad company by the contractor, it was held that the plaintiff could recover from the railroad company the value of the ties. Parker v. Waycross, etc., R. Co., 81 Ga. 387.

The measure of damages for the wrongful taking of stone from a quarry, is the value of the stone after being cut and removed to its destination. Baker v. Hart, 52 Hun (N. Y.) 363; St. Louis there are no circumstances of aggravation to lay the ground for exemplary damages, only compensatory damages are allowed.¹ Where there are joint defendants, the damages may be assessed jointly or severally.² Counsel fees and expenses of litigation are not included in the damages,³ neither is interest,⁴ nor trouble

1. In actions of trespass, the measure of damages is the value of the property destroyed, unless the trespass is wanton and malicious, which is a question entirely for the jury, who may give vindictive damages. Wylie v. Smitherman, 8 Ired. (N. Car.) 236.

In trespass de bonis asportatis, where there are no circumstances of aggravation giving ground for vindictive or exemplary damages, the measure of damages is compensation to the plaintiff for his loss. Hopple v. Higbee, 23 N. J. L. 342.

Where the court, in an action of trespass for the destruction of a building, instructed the jury that if the defendants acted bona fide, under a claim of right, doing no unnecessary or wanton injury, the value of the property destroyed was the proper and legal rule of damages; but if the transaction was of a different character, and the defendants acted wantonly and maliciously, the value of the property merely was not, of course, the rule of damages, but the jury might, in the exercise of sound discretion, allow something more. It was held that this instruction was correct. Curtiss v. Hoyt, 19 Conn. 154; Walker v. Borland, 21 Mo. 289; Ziebarth v. Mye, 42 Minn. 541; Moore v. Baylis (Supreme Ct.), 10 N. Y. Supp. 62; Advance Elevator, etc., Co. v. Eddy, 23 Ill. App. 352; Marks v. Culmer (Utah, 1890), 24 Pac. Rep. 528.

2. United Society, etc. v. Underwood, 11 Bush (Ky.) 265; 21 Am. Rep. 214; Berry v. Fletcher, 1 Dill. (U. S.) 67.

3. Young v. Tustin, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 277; Falk v. Waterman, 49 Cal. 225.

4. Interest Not Included.—Under Wisconsin Rev. St., § 4269, providing for the recovery, in an action for wrongfully cutting timber on plaintiff's land, of "the highest market value of such logs, timber or lumber, in whatsoever place, shape or condition the same shall have been, at any time before the trial, while in possession" of defendants, it is error, in estimating damages, to allow interest to the time of the rendition of the verdict on such "highest market value." Smith v. Morgan, 73 Wis. 375.

Interest on the damages assessed by the jury is not allowable, and a judgment based on a verdict thus erroneously rendered, will be corrected by the appellate court as a clerical error. Jean v. Sandiford, 39 Ala. 317.

The law does not recognize interest as the exact measure of damages for the detention of property taken in trespass, in addition to its value. Longfellow v. Quimby, 29 Me. 196; 48 Am. Dec. 525.

Per Contra.—Where the seller purchases part of the property at the execution sale for a less price than its value, his measure of damages for such property is the price paid by him, incurred from the time of injury to the time of judgment.¹ The measure of damages for timber cut down or destroyed, in the absence of malice, is usually the actual value of the timber at the time cut.²

with interest. Fields v. Williams (Ala. 1891), 8 So. Rep. 808.

In trespass, for taking the goods of the plaintiff, as well as in trover, the jury, in their discretion, may allow, besides the value of the goods at the time of the trespass, interest on the amount from that time to the judgment, by way of damages. Beals v. Guernsey, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 446; 5 Am. Dec. 348.

1. The trouble incurred by the plaintiff in looking after the trespassers is not a ground upon which the damages can be increased in an action of trespass qu. cl. Longfellow v. Quimby, 29 Me. 196; 48 Am. Dec. 525; McWilliams v. Morgan, 75 Ill. 473; Berry v. San Francisco, etc., R. Co., 50 Cal. 435; Holmes v. Seely, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 507; Stean v. Anderson, 4 Harr. (Del.) 209; Donnell v. Sandford, 11 La. Ann. 645; Collier v. Arrington, Phil. (N. Car.) 356; Beach v. Hancock, 27 N. H. 223; 59 Am. Dec. 373; Edwards v. Ricks, 30 La. Ann. 926.

2. Timber.—One cutting and removing timber from land in ignorance that it was another's, is liable for the actual value of the timber used or destroyed. The case is different where one willfully commits a trespass on private property. Shepherd v. Young, 2 La. Ann. 238.

In an action of trespass, for cutting down timber trees, the rule of damages is the value of the timber when it is first cut down, and becomes a chattel. Bennett v. Thompson, 13 Ired. (N. Car.) 146; Yarborough v. Nettles, 7 La. Ann. 116.

Where a handsome shade tree standing in front of a lot temporarily used for mixing tar and gravel, but available and valuable as a site for a high class of residence buildings, is unlawfully, but not maliciously, so cut as to destroy it as an ornamental or shade tree, but not so as to kill it, or materially injure its value for timber or firewood, the measure of damages is the amount which the presence of the tree added to the value of the lot for any purpose in connection with which an ornamental shade tree is desirable. Hoyt v. Southern New England Tel. Co., 60 Conn. 385.

Where, in an action for cutting down a shade tree, the court finds that, "As an ornamental shade tree (for which purpose it had been planted by the ancestor of the plaintiffs, and was by them cared for and valued) it was worth $150, and added at least that amount to the value of the lot," a judgment for $150 is proper, as being the actual damage, without reference to the sentimental value placed on the tree by the plaintiffs, because planted by their ancestor, and visible from their residences. Hoyt v. Southern New England Tel. Co., 60 Conn. 385.

In an action of trespass for cutting timber on vacant land, when it is proved that the defendant, in good faith, believed it was his own land, the verdict, if for the plaintiff, ought to be for the actual damages only. Yahoola, etc., Min. Co. v. Irby, 40 Ga. 479; McKeen v. Gammon, 33 Me. 187; Thompson v. Burdsall, 4 N. J. L. 170; Foot v. Merrill, 54 N. H. 490.

In an action of trespass by a proprietor of land for cutting and carrying away growing trees, the plaintiff should recover for the value of the trees, and for the injury occasioned by cutting them prematurely, and for the injury done to the land, with damages at the rate of six per cent. per annum. Longfellow v. Quimby, 33 Me. 457; Webber v. Quaw, 46 Wis. 118; St. Croix Land, etc., Co. v. Ritchie, 78 Wis. 492; Mhoon v. Greenfield, 52 Miss. 434; Coxe v. England, 65 Pa. St. 212.

In an action of trespass for cutting timber on land claimed by plaintiff, defendant's evidence tended to show that some of the timber which he cut did no more than pay the expense of cutting and marketing, but it appeared that as to some of it a small profit was realized. It was held that the court erred in instructing the jury that "If you find that the value of the timber standing was less than the cost of cutting it and getting it to market, then, upon that element of damages, there is not any margin; if you find it was less or equal, then there would be no damages upon that element. If you find that the land was not decreased in value by the taking of timber off of it, then there is no damage arising from the diminishing of the value of the estate. So that, if you should find that the value of the estate was not diminished by taking off the timber, and that the timber, after it was taken off, did not exceed in value the cost of taking it off and getting it where it would be available in the market, then your verdict would be for the defendant." Miller v. Wellman, 75 Mich. 353; Nixon v. Stillwell, 52 Hun (N. Y.) 353; Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Hutchins, 32 Ohio St. 571.

b. CONSEQUENTIAL DAMAGES.—The wrongdoer is responsible for the consequences which flow immediately from his wrongful or negligent acts; and the responsibility is not relieved by the fact that the consequences of the injurious act could have been prevented by the care or skill of the injured party.¹

c. NOMINAL DAMAGES.—Sometimes only nominal damages are recovered where no substantial injury is shown, but a right of action exists in the plaintiff.²

But Not Where Too Remote.—Where W. is wrongfully in possession of a building, and is doing business therein, and M., who is rightfully entitled to the possession of the building, irregularly ousts W. therefrom, W. is not entitled to recover damages for the loss of the prospective profits which he might have made, had he been permitted to carry on his business in said building. Mitchell v. Woods, 17 Kan. 26.

In an action to recover damages for unlawfully breaking and entering the dwelling house of the plaintiff, and removing the roof therefrom, whereby the property and family of the plaintiff were exposed to the inclemency of the weather, and the plaintiff became sick, it was held that if the plaintiff fails to prove the trespass, no recovery can be had on account of any of the alleged consequential damages. Brown v. Lake, 29 Ohio St. 64.

In an action of trespass against a railway company for invading plaintiff's garden and laying its tracks within thirty feet of the house, its charter prohibiting it from taking any dwelling house, garden, etc., without the owner's consent, no recovery can be had for hazard to the house by the proximity of the tracks and the danger from fire. Fore v. Western N. Car. R. Co., 101 N. Car. 526.

Damages for injury to one's farming operations, by seizing and carrying away his stock used in farming, are too remote and speculative to be recovered in trespass. Nelms v. Hill, 85 Ala. 583.

Cases in Point.—In an action of trespass against an officer for taking goods from the plaintiff's possession, on execution against a third person, an authority to do so from the owner of the goods does not constitute justification to the officer. The plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages for the injury to his possession. Rogers v. Fales, 5 Pa. St. 154.

Where a defendant in trespass fails to support by proof a special plea in bar, a trespass or cause of action of the general nature set forth in the declaration is admitted, though not precisely as laid in all their particulars and variety. In such case, the plaintiff is entitled to recover nominal damages, unless he shows by proof, that more has been sustained. Rich v. Rich, 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 663.

In an action of trespass de bonis asportatis, a default is simply an admission on the part of the defendant that he is unable to make a complete defense, and entitles the plaintiff to nominal damages only, unless he proves a just claim for a larger sum. Rose v. Gallup, 33 Conn. 338.

The plea of liberum tenendum, admitting the possession and the trespass charged in the plaintiff's pleadings, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict, though only for nominal damages. Caruth v. Allen, 2 McCord (S. Car.) 226.

In trespass qu. cl., if a trespass is proved, the plaintiff is entitled to some

d. DOUBLE AND TREBLE DAMAGES.—Double and treble damages are, in special cases, frequently allowed by statute.¹ Such statutes are construed strictly,² and the facts must be so pleaded as to bring them within the statute.³

e. EXEMPLARY OR PUNITIVE DAMAGES.—Exemplary or punitive damages may be allowed by statute; in trespass these are usually for a wanton and malicious trespass, or for some oppressive act or wanton recklessness, and,⁴ sometimes, for an act done with-damages, though nominal; and unless they are given, a new trial will be granted. Norvell v. Thompson, 2 Hill (S. Car.) 470.

Where in a suit for wrongfully destroying papers belonging to plaintiff, defendant alleges that the papers belong to him, and the jury find for the defendant, it is conclusive of the fact that plaintiff is not entitled even to nominal damages. Lunsford v. Deitrick, 85 Ala. 496.

In an action for the possession of land, where plaintiff's title is denied, and title and possession are shown to be in the plaintiff, he may recover nominal damages for simple trespass, though no issue involving the question of simple trespass is submitted, and the charge made by the complaint is forcible trespass accompanied by slander of title. Harris v. Sneed, 104 N. Car. 369.

1. Double Damages.—The Missouri act of 1825, "for preventing certain trespasses," provides that the offender "shall pay to the party injured, the sum of five dollars, and also double damages, together with costs." A verdict of "guilty," under the statute finding damages, authorizes the entry of judgment for five dollars, and double the damages found. Withington v. Young, 4 Mo. 564; Tankersly v. Wedgworth, 22 Ala. 677; Bell v. Clark, 30 Mo. App. 224.

Treble Damages. — Loewenberg v. Rosenthal, 18 Oregon 178; Pierce v. Spring, 15 Mass. 489; Campbell v. Conover, 26 Ill. 64; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Watkins, 43 Kan. 50; Barnes v. Jones, 51 Cal. 303; Russell v. Myers, 32 Mich. 522; Wilson v. Gunning, 80 Iowa 331; Newcomb v. Butterfield, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 342; Lowe v. Harrison, 8 Mo. 350; Welsh v. Anthony, 16 Pa. St. 254.

2. Strictly Construed.—Shiffer v. Broadhead, 134 Pa. St. 539; Lindell v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 25 Mo. 550; La-beaume v. Woolfolk, 18 Mo. 514; Ew- ing v. Leaton, 17 Mo. 465; Barnes v. Jones, 51 Cal. 303; McCloskey v. Powell, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 22; Russell v. Myers, 32 Mich. 522; McCloskey v. Ryder (Pa. 1891), 21 Atl. Rep. 150.

4. For Malice or Oppression.—Pruett v. Cheltenham Quarry Co., 33 Mo. App. 18. In an action of trespass the measure of damages is the value of the property destroyed, unless the trespass is wanton and malicious, which is a question entirely for the jury, who may give vindictive damages. Wylie v. Smitherman, 8 Ired. (N. Car.) 236.

In a civil action of assault and battery, the plaintiff may recover exemplary damages, notwithstanding the defendant has been convicted and fined in a criminal prosecution for the same offense. Corwin v. Walton, 18 Mo. 71; 59 Am. Dec. 285.

For a review of the American and English authorities for vindictive damages in trespass for injuries to the person, see Towle v. Blake, 48 N. H. 92.

Malicious Abuse of Process.—In an action of trespass for a malicious abuse of process and sale of the plaintiff's property, the plaintiff may recover exemplary damages, though the process was not intended for him. McBride v. McLaughlin, 5 Watts (Pa.) 375; Mitchell v. Billingsley, 17 Ala. 391; Tyson v. Ewing, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 185; Duncan v. Stalcup, 1 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 440; Reynolds v. Braithwaite, 131 Pa. St. 416; 25 W. N. C. (Pa.) 269.

In an action of trespass for damages upon the execution of a distress warrant, the plaintiff may recover exemplary damages, and special damages, if stated in the declaration; and under such special damages evidence of the loss from the interruption of the business is proper; and if books of peculiar value, and files of papers indispensable out malice, where the act constitutes a trespass under the statute or otherwise.¹

f. AGGRAVATION OF DAMAGES.—Evidence to show aggravation of damages is in the nature of that going to show exemplary or punitive damages.²

XI. INSTRUCTIONS.—Instructions to the jury in cases of trespass must conform to the rules of law governing the charge of the court in other forms of action.³

XII. VERDICT AND JUDGMENT—1. Generally.—A judgment for the plaintiff concerning property is not conclusive of the title of to such business, but of little value in the market, are unnecessarily or maliciously taken, it may be shown in aggravation of damages. Sherman v. Dutch, 16 Ill. 283.

Where a fence belonging to a plaintiff was wrongfully included in land set off by the sheriff in executing a writ of possession, and the fence was torn down and carried away by defendant, the person in whose favor the decree was rendered, the fact that defendant was placed in possession under a lawful writ would shield him from liability for exemplary damages. Jackel v. Reiman, 78 Tex. 588.

Wounding Feelings.—In an action for damages for forcibly entering plaintiff's house, and removing therefrom certain property without his consent, it is proper to instruct that if the jury are satisfied that defendants removed the property as alleged, and their manner on making such removal was insulting and overbearing, so as to naturally wound plaintiff's feelings, they shall find for plaintiff for such an amount as they may deem proper; "such damages being called vindictive damages, or smart money." Loftus v. Maxey, 73 Tex. 242.

For Violation of Statute Without Malice.—For the landlord to go upon the rented premises before the lease has expired, break open a locked outhouse, and take therefrom the tenant's cotton, against his protest and remonstrance, is a trespass for which punitive damages may be awarded, though the cotton be bound for supplies which the landlord has furnished, and though such forcible seizure be made for the purpose of selling it, and though it be fairly sold, and the proceeds applied to the debt for supplies. Shores v. Brooks, 81 Ga. 468.

1. Perkins v. Hackleman, 26 Miss. 41; 59 Am. Dec. 243, holds that a party intending to commit trespass on public lands, and by mistake committing trespass upon lands of private individuals, is liable for such trespass in penal damages.

A party supposing himself to be cutting timber on his land, but by mistake cutting on another's land, is liable for the casual damage done. Perkins v. Hackleman, 26 Miss. 41; 59 Am. Dec. 243.

2. U. S. v. Magoon, 3 McLean (U. S.) 171; Druse v. Wheeler, 22 Mich. 439; Higby v. Williams, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 215; Pendleton v. Davis, 1 Jones (N. Car.) 98; Curtiss v. Hoyt, 19 Conn. 154; Tift v. Culver, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 180.

3. The question as to whether certain instructions are error or not, largely depends upon the particular facts of the case. In the following cases the question was whether the instructions were proper or not: Spades v. Murray, 2 Ind. App. 401; Fischer v. Coons, 26 Neb. 400; South Baltimore Co. v. Muhlbach, 69 Md. 395; Willis v. Hudson, 72 Tex. 598; Garey v. Woodward, 127 Pa. St. 251; 24 W. N. C. (Pa.) 314; Goldsmith v. State, 86 Ala. 55; Parker v. Chancellor, 73 Tex. 475; Pickering v. Shearer, 11 Gray (Mass.) 153; Woodman v. Francis, 14 Allen (Mass.) 198; Phillips v. Kent, 23 N. J. L. 155; Turner v. Beatty, 24 N. J. L. 644; Lawton v. Cardell, 22 Vt. 524; Goodwin v. Jack, 62 Me. 414; Greening v. Keel, 72 Tex. 207; Roche v. Lovell, 74 Tex. 191; Brooke v. O'Boyle, 27 Ill. App. 384; See also Am. Dig. (1889), p. 3698, § 43; Olsen v. Upsahl, 69 Ill. 273; Ogden v. Jennings, 62 N. Y. 526; Roach v. Trottie, 50 Ga. 251; Jones v. Welch, 15 Ala. 306; New Haven Steam Boat, etc., Co. v. Vanderbilt, 16 Conn. 420; Wilderman v. Sandusky, 15 Ill. 59; Harding v. Fahey, 1 Greene (Iowa) 377; Lovier v. Gilpin, 6 Dana (Ky.) 321; Emanuel v. Cocke, 6 Dana (Ky.) 212.

the plaintiff to the property.¹ In trespass to realty the verdict is conclusive as to the possession.² A judgment as to personalty transfers the property in the chattel to the trespasser, if the damages paid include their value.³ The verdict must be certain and definite, so that judgment may be entered correctly.⁴ A

1. Judgment Not Conclusive.—In an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., the defendant pleaded the general issue, and filed a notice that he claimed and should give evidence of title to the locus in quo. The jury found the defendant guilty, assessed damages, and also found that the defendant had no title to the land described in the plaintiff's declaration; and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff. It was held that the judgment was not conclusive proof of the plaintiff's right of property in said land, nor of his title to maintain a writ of entry to recover the land from the defendant in that action. Wade v. Lindsey, 6 Met. (Mass.) 407.

If the record of a judgment in trespass qu. cl., does not show the contrary, it will be presumed that the question of title was not raised. Maxam v. Wood, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 297.

In a previous action of trespass for entering a large tract of land, described by metes and bounds, and cutting timber, the defendant pleaded that the place in which the timber was cut belonged to him, and there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. In a subsequent action of ejectment, it was held that the record of the previous action of trespass was not evidence that the title to the entire tract was adjudged to be in the plaintiff; but it was evidence that the title to the place only where the trespass was committed was adjudged to be in the plaintiff, and what part that was must be proved aliunde. Dunckel v. Wiles, 11 N.Y. 420.

Judgment for plaintiff by agreement of the parties, for damages in trespass, wherein the defendant denied the trespass and set up a right of way, is evidence of a trespass upon some part of the land only, and not that he had not such a right of way. Howard v. Albrow, 100 Mass. 236.

2. Verdict Showing Possession.—Owings v. Gibson, 2 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 515; Hale v. Monroe, 28 Md. 98.

Upon disclaimer by a defendant in trespass to try title who was not in possession at the commencement of the action, judgment should be for plaintiff for the land, and for such defendant for costs. Johnson v. Schumacher, 72 Tex. 334.

A judgment for the defendant in an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., does not necessarily settle anything beyond the particular facts of the trespass sued for; the title to another part of the close or a subsequent right of possession may have been left undetermined. Morse v. Marshall, 97 Mass. 519.

3. For verdict as to chattels vesting title, see Loomis v. Green, 7 Me. 386.

If a trespasser takes a chattel into his own possession, and the owner sues, and recovers damages for the specific chattel so taken and detained, the recovery and execution will change the property by operation of law, so as to transfer it to the trespasser. Curtis v. Groat, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 168.

Where the plaintiff, in trespass qu. cl., for cutting down wood of the plaintiff, which the defendant burned into charcoal on the plaintiff's land, recovers judgment, this does not entitle the defendant to the coal, the recovery being for the trespass merely, and not for the specific article. Curtis v. Groat, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 168; 5 Am. Dec. 204.

Where one commits a trespass by seizing personal property, and then sells it to another, and the owner recovers judgment against the trespasser for the value of the property and for the tortious taking, such judgment changes the property, and the former owner cannot seize or claim it. Fox v. Northern Liberties, 3 W. & S. (Pa.) 103.

The defendant's title under satisfaction of a judgment in trespass for a conversion of chattels takes effect by relation from the time of the conversion. Smith v. Smith, 51 N. H. 571.

It is the satisfaction of a judgment in trespass only, that vests in the trespasser the title to goods seized under a void process, not the judgment per se. Goldsmith v. Stetson, 39 Ala. 183; Schindel v. Schindel, 12 Md. 108; Jones v. McNeil, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 466.

4. Verdict Must Be Clear and Definite.—Jones v. Owens, 5 Strobb. (S. Car.) 134; Hanly v. Levin, 5 Ohio 227.

verdict is sometimes directed by the court.¹ The verdict may cure a deficiency in evidence.²

In an action of trespass, where it is admitted that defendants occupied the premises for a year, and the defense is a contract for a lease for that period, by which defendants agreed to pay $400 rent, there is no error in giving judgment for plaintiff, though the verdict is in form for $400 "for rent" and $50 damages; the lease not, in fact, being a binding contract. Johnson v. Park (Ky. 1891), 17 S. W. Rep. 273.

A verdict was found in favor of the plaintiff "for two undivided thirds of the land in the declaration mentioned." It was held that the damages found were for the detention of the two-thirds, and not of the whole. Hines v. Greenlee, 3 Ala. 73.

In trespass qu. cl., the defendants pleaded, first, leave and license for a special purpose; second, leave and license generally; and the verdict was found for the plaintiff on the issue raised by the first plea, and for the defendant on that raised by the second plea. Judgment was rendered for the defendant. It was held that the judgment was right. Redman v. Taylor, 3 Ind. 144.

A verdict in the alternative, in an action of trespass, is no ground for an arrest of judgment. Johnson v. Packer, 1 Nott & M. (S. Car.) 1.

1. If, in an action of trespass, the facts attempted to be proved do not, in law, amount to a trespass, the court should, on defendant's motion, so inform the jury. Crookshank v. Kellogg, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 256.

In trespass to try title to lands held under a deed alleged to be a mortgage, prosecuted by an administrator for the benefit of his intestate's estate, it is proper for the court, upon adjudging the deed to be a mortgage, to award plaintiff a writ of restitution, and order the amount due defendants to be charged as a lien upon the land until paid in the ordinary course of administration of the estate. Jackson v. Jones, 74 Tex. 104. See also Dodge v. Richardson, 70 Tex. 209; Jones v. Andrews, 72 Tex. 5; Stout v. Taul, 71 Tex. 438; Am. Dig. (1888), p. 1314, §§ 36-39.

2. Verdict Curing Evidence.—In an action for damages for maliciously killing plaintiff's dog, a general verdict for the plaintiff is not inconsistent with a special finding that the dog was in the habit of leaving plaintiff's premises, barking at travelers on the highway, and frightening horses. Jacquay v. Hartzell, 1 Ind. App. 500.

When a petition states a cause of action in damages to real estate, and also asks for an injunction to restrain the defendant from trespassing thereon, and the jury find that the defendant had trespassed on plaintiff's land as alleged in the petition, but that he had abandoned his trespasses before suit was begun, there was no error in rendering judgment for the plaintiff for nominal damages and costs, though refusing to perpetuate the injunction which had been allowed at the commencement of the action. Curtis v. Paggett (Kan. 1891), 27 Pac. Rep. 109.

So, where the evidence, in such case, tended to prove that the house, in which the trespass was alleged to have been committed, belonged to one C., and had been occupied by one P. until a short time before the alleged trespass, and that then P. had removed to another town, taking most of his household goods, but leaving a few, which were of less frequent use, and at the time P. left, the plaintiff moved his goods into the house and made the garden, but did not in fact commence residing in the house until some months after, and the jury were instructed, that they must be satisfied, that the plaintiff, at the time of the alleged trespass, had the exclusive possession of the house, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, it was held that the verdict could not be disturbed. Lawton v. Cardell, 22 Vt. 524.

A collector of a school district, who makes a levy previous to a demand of the tax, is a trespasser; but a judgment in his favor will not be reversed, merely because it does not appear from the justice's return that it was proved that such demand was made previous to the levy. Oakley v. Van Horn, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 305.

Cases Concerning Verdict.—Where, in an action for trespass to real estate, defendants justify under a chattel mortgage, by virtue of which they entered to seize property without process, and the jury find specially that defendants entered peaceably, but did some damage, and that they did not believe their entry was lawful, but do not find

2. As to Joint Trespassers.—In making a verdict, the jury cannot discriminate in assessing damages against joint trespassers according to the relative enormity of the actual acts of each.¹ A general verdict for the plaintiff applies to all defendants.² All the persons engaged in trespass need not be joined;³ and of those joined, part may be found innocent, and part guilty;⁴ and of whether the entry was authorized or not, and where the record does not contain the evidence, a verdict for plaintiff will not be set aside. If the property was in the peaceable possession of plaintiff, who denied defendants' right of seizure, it was the duty of the latter to desist, or, if their entry was lawful, but their subsequent conduct wrongful, plaintiff could recover. Concanan v. Boynton, 76 Iowa 543.

A court of equity will not compel an innocent plaintiff, whose right in a passage way has been encroached upon by the building of a wall therein to his substantial injury, to sell the right at a valuation; but will compel the wrongdoer to restore the premises, as nearly as may be, to their original condition, and to pay the damages sustained by the plaintiff pending the suit. Tucker v. Howard, 128 Mass. 361.

The issue on the vi et armis in trespass is only a matter of form, and in practice nothing is ever found on that issue. Buntin v. Duchane, 1 Blackf. (Ind.) 56.

In trespass for killing a slave, if the general issue is proved, and the trespass is proved, the jury should find a verdict for the plaintiff for nominal damages at least. Bradley v. Flewitt, 6 Rich. (S. Car.) 69.

In trespass for cutting timber trees, final judgment by default cannot be rendered for the amount of the penalty fixed by statute in Alabama; it not being allowable at common law, and not specially authorized by the statute. Byrne v. Haines, Minor (Ala.) 286.

A verdict of "guilty" and damages assessed, in an action of trespass, to which "not guilty" and pleas of justification are pleaded, is sufficient as to all the issues offered. Goyne v. Howell, Minor (Ala.) 62.

1. Jury Cannot Discriminate Against Joint Trespasser.—Carney v. Reed, 11 Ind. 417; Layman v. Hendrix, 1 Ala. 212; Shultz v. Hunter, 2 Browne (Pa.) 233; Duane v. Mierkin, 2 Browne (Pa.) 238. But see Byrne v. Riddell, 3 La. Ann. 670; May v. Bliss, 22 Vt. 477; Crawford v. Morris, 5 Gratt. (Va.) 90.

Where several defendants in trespass plead one plea, and a joint verdict and damages are found against all, judgment must be rendered jointly against all; and if the verdict is set aside as to part, no judgment can be rendered against the others. Cunningham v. Dyer, 2 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 50.

A plea of justification, for several defendants, in an action of trespass, must be sustained as to the whole or none; a part cannot be convicted and a part acquitted under it. Gleason v. Edmunds, 3 Ill. 448.

In trespass against joint defendants, it is error to render separate judgments against two defendants found guilty. Fields v. Williams (Ala. 1891), 3 So. Rep. 808.

In trespass against two, the evidence authorized exemplary damages against one; the other, if he is shown to have acted in concert with him, is liable to the same extent. Hair v. Little, 28 Ala. 236.

Where there are separate verdicts, in joint trespass, against several defendants for one entire act, the plaintiff can have but one judgment against all, and must elect de melioribus damnis. Sodousky v. McGee, 4 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 267; Livingstone v. Bishop, 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 290; 3 Am. Dec. 330.

In trespass against several jointly, it is error for the judge, after the issue is made up and a jury sworn, to order the jury, at the instance of the plaintiff, to find a verdict of acquittal as to one of the defendants. Gearheart v. Smallwood, 5 Mo. 452.

2. Cane v. Watson, Morr. (Iowa) 52; Sutliff v. Gilbert, 8 Ohio 405.

In trespass on judgment against several defendants, if one is arrested on a ca. sa., and discharged by the plaintiff, or by his consent, the court will discharge the other defendants from custody, and order satisfaction to be entered of record, upon their stipulation to bring no action on account of their arrest and imprisonment. Allen v. Craig, 14 N. J. L. 102.

3. Mandlebaum v. Russell, 4 Nev. 551.

4. Part May Be Acquitted.—Gillerson

those guilty, it is allowable by statute sometimes to assess the damages due by them respectively.¹ If separate verdicts are found, judgments against one cannot be entered against another.² There can be but one satisfaction.³ The judgment must be supported by the verdict.⁴ One co-trespasser may be a competent witness for the other.⁵

v. Small, 15 Me. 17; Drake v. Barrymore, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 166; Blackburn v. Baker, 7 Port. (Ala.) 284; Sheldon v. Kibbe, 3 Conn. 214; 8 Am. Dec. 176; Lansing v. Montgomery, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 382; Owens v. Derby, 3 Ill. 26.

If in trespass against A, B, and C, there is a verdict for the defendants, which is right as to C, but which as to the other is unsupported by the evidence, a new trial should be granted to the plaintiff on condition that he enters a noll pros. as to C. Truell v. Wrink, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 249.

1. Henry v. Sennett, 3 B. Mon. (Ky.) 311; Beyersdorf v. Sump, 39 Minn. 495; Simpson v. Perry, 9 Ga. 508.

In trespass against several defendants, where one of them was not served with process, and on trial before a justice of the peace, judgment was rendered against those who had been summoned, and upon an appeal taken by them to the circuit court, judgment was rendered, not only against them, but also against the defendant not summoned, it was held that, as to him, the judgment was a nullity. Prichard v. Campbell, 5 Ind. 494.

2. Where several defendants sever in their pleadings, and separate verdicts are found against them, if the plaintiff remits damages as to some of the defendants, judgment cannot be entered up against them for damages found against a co-defendant. Goldring v. Hall, 9 Port. (Ala.) 169.

In an action of trespass against several defendants, the law of New Jersey does not require the judge to allow them separate trials, or to direct the jury to assess the damages severally against each defendant. Allen v. Craig, 13 N. J. L. 294.

3. But One Satisfaction.—When two persons jointly commit a trespass, the injured party may sue them severally; yet he can have but one satisfaction, and when separate judgments are recovered he must elect on which recovery he will seek it. Blann v. Crocheron, 20 Ala. 320.

When the injured party has severally sued two or more joint trespassers, and recovered separate judgments against them, his right to elect de melioribus damnis is not determined until he sues out execution, or accepts satisfaction of one of the judgments. Snider v. Croy, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 227; Fields v. Law, 2 Root (Conn.) 320.

4. Judgment Supported by Verdict.—In an action of trespass to try title, the defendants not only pleaded not guilty, but asserted title in themselves and prayed relief against the plaintiffs. The court below instructed the jury as to the form of a general verdict for either side, and moreover charged them, in case the plaintiffs had failed to make out their title and defendants had established theirs, to return as their verdict a finding "for the defendants on their plea in reconvention." The verdict was a mere general finding "for the defendants;" but the court not only rendered a general judgment that the plaintiffs take nothing, but decreed title to the defendants, and canceled the plaintiffs' claim as a cloud, etc. It was held that the judgment was not supported by the verdict. Johnson v. Newman, 35 Tex. 166.

5. Co-Trespasser as Witness.—A co-trespasser is a competent witness for a defendant in trespass. West v. Bolton, 4 Vt. 558.

In a joint action of trespass against several who sever in their defense, they cannot demand separate trials, for the purpose of using a co-defendant as a witness. Dougherty v. Dorsey, 4 Bibb (Ky.) 207.

Whether the case of a joint defendant in trespass shall be put severally to the jury, in order to enable him, if acquitted, to become a witness, is a question solely in the discretion of the judge presiding at the trial. Dorrell v. Johnson, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 263; Sawyer v. Merrill, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 16.

A verdict in favor of the defendant, in an action against one of two joint trespassers, which would be conclusive evidence in a subsequent action against him by the same plaintiff, will not be conclusive in an action by such plaintiff against the co-trespasser. Sprague v. Waite, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 455.

XIII. TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE—1. Nature of the Action.—Trespass quare clausum fregit was not at common law an action to try titles, but it may be so used when the ownership of the premises is in dispute. In some states, by statute, this action is expressly allowed for the purpose of trying title.¹

2. Grounds of the Action.—To sustain the action, it is necessary to prove some injury or trespass, however small, damage being the gist of the action.²

1. Waterman on Trespass, vol. 2, § 1140 et seq. In Texas, trespass to try title is intended to serve the purposes of ejectment elsewhere. It lies against a railroad company asserting a claim to a right of way; and this, although there is a statutory summary mode of condemning lands for railroad purposes. Hays v. Texas, etc., R. Co., 62 Tex. 397. It is the proper action in which to adjudicate conflicting claims to land. Thomson v. Locke, 66 Tex. 383.

2. Injury Must Be Shown; When the Action Lies.—Cornneil v. Bickley, 1 McCord (S. Car.) 466; Underwood v. Sims, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 81. An action of trespass to try title may be sustained by showing that the defendant was a trespasser within the last ten years before suit brought. Binda v. Benbow, 9 Rich. (S. Car.) 15.

The gist of the action of trespass to try title and recover damages is the injury to the plaintiff's possession. The value of the use and occupation is to be set off against the value of the improvements made in good faith. The petition must allege that they were so made; the rightful owner is entitled to those made without his consent. Bonner v. Wiggins, 52 Tex. 125.

To sustain an action of trespass to try title to land, some injury, however small, must be proved. A bare threat to prevent the enjoyment of rights in land is a sufficient injury. Massey v. Trantham, 2 Bay (S. Car.) 421.

But in Texas it is not necessary to prove an actual trespass by the defendant except in cases where there is no contest as to the title but only as to the boundaries, and where plaintiff, having the superior title, charges defendant with trespassing on his land. Viesca v. Wyche, 3 Woods (U. S.) 336.

Commissioners of streets, appointed under an act of the legislature, cannot maintain trespass to try title for lands alleged to have been dedicated to the use of the inhabitants as streets, and which have been inclosed by persons claiming under the supposed donor. The proper remedy for obstructing a highway is by indictment; and if a private way is claimed, the action should have been case. Georgetown v. Taylor, 1 Brev. (S. Car.) 129.

Under the federal act providing that the form and modes of proceeding in suits of common law in the courts of the United States, shall be the same as those used, at the time of the passage of the act, in the highest courts of those states respectively, an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., with notice that it was brought "as well to try titles as to recover damages," may be maintained in the circuit court of the United States, in Alabama, to recover possession of lands, the Alabama statute having substituted that form of action for ejectment. Sears v. Eastburn, 10 How. (U. S.) 187.

The validity of a will under which the defendants claim cannot be contested in an action of trespass to try title to lands devised; a direct proceeding to set aside the will is necessary. Acklin v. Paschal, 48 Tex. 147.

Where persons in possession of land as tenants disown the relation, and claim adversely, trespass to try title will lie against them. Hall v. Haywood, 77 Tex. 4.

Trespass to try title will lie for the owner of the soil of a road, over which the defendant has a right of way; but the sheriff can only give possession subject to the easement or servitude. Jerman v. Mathews, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 271.

Trespass does not lie to contest, not the defendant's right to the possession of land, but his right to cultivate it in the particular manner he has adopted. Burnham v. Van Gilder, 34 Mich. 246.

The possession of a purchaser, under a bond for title, or of his assignee with notice, is not adverse to the vendor,

3. Title to Maintain.—One in possession may bring trespass to try title for every entry on his land by another.¹ The action, therefore, may be brought by one who does not have the legal title.² To entitle the plaintiff to recover, even against a naked possessor, he must show that he is the absolute owner of the land in controversy, not only as against the defendant, but as against all other persons.³ The plaintiff must recover on the strength of who, in default of payment of the price, may recover the land by action of trespass to try title. Keys v. Mason, 44 Tex. 140.

1. Waterman on Trespass, vol. 2, § 1141; Watson v. Hill, 1 Strobbh. (S. Car.) 78. Trespass to try title may be maintained without regard to who has actual possession of the land in dispute. Thomson v. Locke, 66 Tex. 383.

A record of probate proceedings showed a valid administration, an order to sell land at public or private sale, a return of sale—not, however, showing whether public or private—and an order of confirmation. It was held that the title prima facie vested in the purchaser, and was sufficient to enable him to maintain trespass to try title. Erhart v. Bass, 54 Tex. 97.

Prior occupancy will enable a party to maintain an action of trespass to try title against a wrongdoer without title. Alexander v. Gilliam, 39 Tex. 227.

Bare possession is sufficient to maintain an action of trespass to try title against a mere trespasser. Caplen v. Drew, 54 Tex. 493.

A remainder-man cannot, before the death of the life tenant, maintain trespass to try title, since he has not a possessory title. Cooke v. Caswell, 81 Tex. 678.

Under Paschal's Texas Dig., art. 5303, one who, as pre-emptor, has procured and filed a survey of vacant land on which he has settled, may maintain an action of trespass to try title. Buford v. Gray, 51 Tex. 331.

2. By One Having Equitable Title.—Duty v. Graham, 12 Tex. 427; 62 Am. Dec. 534. Not by mortgagee against mortgagor. Martin v. Parker, 26 Tex. 253. Not by an assignee by assignment not under seal. Ansley v. Nolan, 6 Port. (Ala.) 379; Easterling v. Blythe, 7 Tex. 210; 56 Am. Dec. 45; Miller v. Alexander, 8 Tex. 36; Martin v. Parker, 26 Tex. 253.

Evidence that an administrator was appointed for the estate of a former owner of the land; that he was ordered to sell the land; that he reported having done so; that his report was confirmed; and that he received from the purchaser payment of the purchase-money, is sufficient to show an equitable title in the purchaser to enable him to sustain the action, though no administrator's deed is produced. Butler v. Brown, 77 Tex. 342.

A sale under a power of attorney to sell the county claims of the principal, "or any land that may be secured thereby," vests such equitable rights in the purchaser as, under Paschal's Texas Dig., art. 5303, will enable him to maintain trespass to try title against a trespasser. Hermann v. Reynolds, 52 Tex. 391.

The doctrine that one whose land has been conveyed by the unauthorized act of an agent will be presumed, from his silence, to have ratified the sale, applies only to cases in which the owner asserts an equitable right, and has no application, when, in trespass to try title, he relies on his legal title. Moss v. Berry, 53 Tex. 632.

In trespass to try title, the defendant cannot show in defense an outstanding equity, unless a connection thereof with himself be established. Fitch v. Boyer, 51 Tex. 336.

8. Hooper v. Hall, 35 Tex. 82; Tally v. Thorn, 35 Tex. 727.

The assignee of a bond to convey land can recover against a mere trespasser, though the purchase-money recited in the bond as its consideration has not been paid, where it appears that the note given therefor has been transferred by the vendor, and cannot be found. Wright v. Dunn, 73 Tex. 293. See also Goode v. Jasper, 71 Tex. 48; Clay Co. Land, etc., Co. v. Wood, 71 Tex. 460.

It devolves on the plaintiff to show title in himself, and, until he makes a prima facie case, the defendant is not required to offer any evidence at all. Brown v. Roberts, 75 Tex. 103.

Defendant is not estopped to show better title than common origin, from which both trace title, but it is not sufficient merely to raise a doubt as to his own title, and not on the weakness of that of his adversary.¹ A prima facie paper title is sufficient, if the defendant fails to prove title.² If the plaintiff relies on an adverse title, he must show that the full statutory time has run.³ Where the defendant shows title, then the plaintiff must, besides a prima facie case, prove every fact necessary to show an absolute title.⁴ The premises in dispute should be exactly described.⁵ The plaintiff need not go back of the source from which he and the defendant claim.⁶

4. Defenses.—Peaceable possession at the time the suit was brought is a sufficient defense unless the plaintiff shows a title.⁷ The defendant cannot show paramount title in another to defeat the purchaser of his own title at a sheriff's sale,⁸ nor may he which is the paramount title. Martin v. Ranlett, 5 Rich. (S. Car.) 541; 57 Am. Dec. 770; Riddle v. Bickerstaff, 50 Tex. 155.

1. Plaintiff Recovers on Strength of His Own Title.—Simpson v. McLemore, 8 Tex. 448; Dalby v. Booth, 16 Tex. 563; Kinney v. Vinson, 32 Tex. 126; Harlock v. Jackson, 1 Treadw. Const. (S. Car.) 135; Toomer v. Purkey, Mill (S. Car.) 323; 12 Am. Dec. 634; Gambling v. Prince, 2 Nott & M. (S. Car.) 138; Hughes v. Lane, 6 Tex. 289; Young v. Watson, 1 McMull. (S. Car.) 449; Sims v. Randal, 1 Brev. (S. Car.) 85.

Where plaintiff shows a regular chain of title running back to the common source of both titles, and defendant fails to connect himself with the common source, judgment should be for plaintiff. Tapp v. Corey, 64 Tex. 594.

2. Prima Facie Paper Title Sufficient.—Montgomery v. Carlton, 56 Tex. 361. In an action of trespass to try title, it is not indispensable that the plaintiff should show a perfect indefeasible estate in fee simple, to authorize a recovery against one who can establish no legal right either of property or possession. Lewis v. Goguette, 3 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 184.

In an action of trespass to try title by a purchaser of land sold on execution, evidence having been given of possession of the land accompanied by acts of ownership by the defendant in execution, prior to the possession of the defendant in trespass, it was held, on error, not to have been an assumption of a fact, for the court to charge the jury that the possession and improvements of the defendant in execution vested in him such a legal title as to enable him to maintain trespass against one ousting him. Badger v. Lyon, 7 Ala. 564.

In an action of trespass to try title, the plaintiff showing title to an undivided interest in the land, may recover as against a defendant who is a mere trespasser, although an intervenor shows title to the remaining interest. Roosevelt v. Davis, 49 Tex. 463. Compare Guilford v. Love, 49 Tex. 715.

In an action of trespass to try title, the petition need only state a prima facie case in favor of the plaintiff. So held, where claimants, as heirs of W. and wife, omitted to state whether W. died testate, or what estate they claimed in the land, or whether W. was ever married. Ufford v. Wells, 52 Tex. 612.

The fact that plaintiffs received a certificate for the land in controversy is sufficient to authorize a decree in their favor, in the absence of any showing that they had parted with the title, or that defendants had a better title. Lemberg v. Cabaniss, 75 Tex. 228.

In trespass to recover possession, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, although the defendant is in possession of less than is declared for. White v. Guirons, Minor (Ala.) 331.

show an equitable title as against a legal title;¹ he may set up any claim, the effect of which is to defeat the title set up by plaintiffs.²

5. Parties.—The action should be brought in the name of the real parties, and against the party in possession.³ If brought against the tenant, the real owner may come in and defend.⁴ Those having similar interests in same property may bring the action,⁵ but one tenant in common cannot against a co-tenant,⁶ neither can those having separate and distinct rights of action to distinct lands join in one action.⁷ Anyone having an interest in the land with the defendant, can be made a party.⁸ A state

2. Defenses.—The defendant may show that the plaintiff claims under a deed obtained by fraud. Price v. M'Geed, 1 Brev. (S. Car.) 373; McKamey v. Thorp, 61 Tex. 648. He may show a superior title in a third party. Hewitt v. Patrick, 26 Tex. 326; Adams v. House, 61 Tex. 639. He may show that he has a title although the purchase-money has not been paid, Hewitt v. Patrick, 26 Tex. 326; Pope v. Clarke, 2 Strobb. (S. Car.) 361; also that he holds title by notorious, unmo- lested, or adverse possession. Mazyck v. Birt, 2 Brev. (S. Car.) 155; Smoke v. Smoke, 10 Rich. (S. Car.) 433.

3. Bonner v. Greenlee, 6 Ala. 411. Trespass may lie against a landlord for the entry of a tenant. Binda v. Benbow, 11 Rich. (S. Car.) 24.

4. Crosby v. Floyd, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 116.

In South Carolina, in an action of trespass to try title, the landlord may, by leave of the court, be made a co-defendant with his tenant to defend his title; but the court has no authority to dismiss the original wrongdoer, and substitute a stranger in his stead, without the consent of the party injured. Evans v. Hinds, 2 Hill (S. Car.) 527.

5. Who May Bring the Action.—The widow of an intestate may maintain an action of trespass to try title to lands of her intestate, without joining her co-heirs; and no advantage can be taken of her suing alone, except by plea in abatement. McFadden v. Haley, 1 Brev. (S. Car.) 96.

A purchaser from one of several co-heirs may maintain trespass to try title, without joining the other co-heirs; at least, the question as to the necessity of joining them cannot be raised by plea in abatement. Perry v. Walker, 1 Brev. (S. Car.) 103.

In trespass to try title by the sole heir of an intestate, the administrator is a proper party plaintiff. Cassidy v. Kluge, 73 Tex. 155; Northcraft v. Oliver, 74 Tex. 162.

An heir, in possession of land, may, without administration, maintain trespass for injury to crops growing thereon. Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Knapp, 51 Tex. 569.

Under the Texas probate laws of 1876, an administrator, suing alone as such may maintain an action of trespass to try title without making the heirs parties. Bogges v. Brownson, 59 Tex. 417; Burdett v. Haley, 51 Tex. 540; Shannon v. Taylor, 16 Tex. 413.

6. A tenant in common cannot maintain trespass to try titles, against a co-tenant, without showing an actual ouster. Jones v. Perkins, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 512; Foster v. Foster, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 356.

7. Harris v. Preston, 10 Ark. 201.

8. In an action of trespass to try title, instituted against a mortgagor in possession, the mortgagee, if entitled to the right of entry, may be admitted as a party defendant. Noble v. Coleman, 16 Ala. 77.

cannot maintain the action, for it is a rule of law that a state cannot be disseised.¹

6. Pleading—a. THE DECLARATION.—The declaration must describe the land with particularity.² It should set it out by abutments,³ but reference to surveys may be sufficient.⁴ Objections to the declaration should be taken advantage of before plea,⁵ unless the uncertainty be carried into the verdict.⁶ It will be presumed that plaintiff had possession at the time of the commencement of the suit, though that should be averred.⁷ The declaration is in

Although, in an action of trespass to try title, the plaintiff is not required to make any other party defendant than the one claiming and holding the land sued for; if, by amendment, he seeks to enforce a mortgage, he must make all the purchasers from the mortgagor after the mortgage parties defendant, so as to adjust the equities between them, and in the several tracts claimed by each. Miller v. Rogers, 49 Tex. 398.

Where, in trespass to try title, defendant asks that his vendor be made a party, the latter should be served with a copy of the defendant's answer and cross-bill. Crain v. Wright, 60 Tex. 515.

In trespass to try title, where the pretended real owner of the land is let in, under the rule of court, to defend the title of the defendant, as his tenant, and where the tenant himself could not, under the proof, dispute or resist the plaintiff's title, it is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to a verdict, if he shows that the pretended landlord is not now the true owner of the land. Goudelock v. Massey, 2 Strobb. (S. Car.) 187.

1. State v. Arledge, 1 Bailey (S. Car.) 551. See also State v. Stark, 3 Brev. (S. Car.) 101.

2. Declaration.—Sturdevant v. Murrell, 8 Port. (Ala.) 317. A declaration in trespass to try title, describing the land as "the south half of the east half of the southwest quarter section," etc., is sufficiently certain as to boundary and quantity. Sawyer v. Fitts, 4 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 365.

A declaration for trespass qu. cl., containing no averment of title or assertion that the action is to recover possession or try titles, may be allowed. Trash v. Johnson, 6 Port. (Ala.) 458.

In trespass to try title, the indorsement, "that the action is brought as well to try titles as to recover damages," is sufficient. James v. Tait, 8 Port. (Ala.) 476.

In an action of trespass to try title to land, the following is a sufficient description of the premises sued for, viz.: "The south half of section 11, township 15, range 9, with the exception of 80 acres at the west end, and a lot donated for a schoolhouse in Coosa land district." Heifner v. Porter, 12 Ala. 470.

3. Broughton v. Broughton, 4 Rich. (S. Car.) 491.

4. Croft v. Rains, 10 Tex. 520. Where the petition in trespass to try title first describes the land by metes and bounds, and alleges it to be a part of M. survey, a subsequent allegation that the controversy is whether the parcel of land above described is in the G. survey or the M. survey, may be treated as surplusage. Boydston v. Sumpter, 78 Tex. 402; Goldman v. Douglass, 81 Tex. 648.

5. In an action of trespass to try title to land, a demurrer to an allegation in the complaint claiming title by a nuncupative will was properly sustained. Furrh v. Winston, 66 Tex. 521.

Averments that plaintiff is the owner in fee simple of certain land, and that defendant is setting up a pretended claim thereto, authorize, on general demurrer, the intendment that plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the premises. Rains v. Wheeler, 76 Tex. 390.

6. Ware v. Bradford, 2 Ala. 676; 36 Am. Dec. 427. Where the wrong number of the lot was cured by verdict, see Hanmer v. Eddins, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 192.

7. Whiteside v. Branch Bank, 10 Ala. 249. In trespass to try title, an allegation that the plaintiff was in possession on the first of January, and that the defendant entered with force and arms on the second, was held to be a sufficient allegation of possession at the time of the ouster. Parker v. Hag-

form of trespass *qu. cl. fr.*¹ It must state one cause of action,² and should show how the title was obtained.³ The allegata and probata must correspond.⁴

b. THE PLEA OR ANSWER.—The defendant may make a full defense under the plea of the general issue;⁵ but if he claims some defense not involved in a denial of the plaintiff's title, he must plead it.⁶ The defendant may deny the trespass, and so admit the gerty, 1 Ala. 632; Rains v. Wheeler, 76 Tex. 390.

1. Carwile v. House, 6 Ala. 710; Wade v. Converse, 18 Tex. 233.

2. In a suit to recover possession of lands, the plaintiff alleged that he was the owner in fee on April 1st, 1851, when he was ejected by the defendant, who still continued in possession. He then charged that the defendant, on or about the same day, and on divers other days, broke and entered the premises, dug up the soil, cut and carried away timber, and converted the same to his own use; wherefor he demanded judgment that the defendant be removed from and the plaintiff restored to the possession of the premises, and that he recover damages for the use and for the injuries so done thereto. A general answer was put in. On the trial, the plaintiff, on the motion of the defendant, was required to elect, on which of the claims he would proceed. It was held that no injustice was done by this decision, because there were two distinct causes of action and the proof necessary to sustain them would be inconsistent and incongruous. Budd v. Bingham, 18 Barb. (N. Y.) 494.

3. In an action of trespass to try title, a petition which states that the land was purchased by plaintiff from the state, and alleges that he had complied with the law in every respect, is not subject to the general demurrer, although it is defective, in that it fails to state specifically how plaintiff obtained his title, and to show with sufficient particularity that the requirements of law had been complied with, since such defects can only be reached by special exception. Leigh v. DeGanahl (Tex. 1891), 16 S. W. Rep. 1037.

4. Turner v. Ferguson, 39 Tex. 505; Byler v. Johnson, 45 Tex. 509.

5. Ayres v. Duprey, 27 Tex. 593. In trespass to try title, a general denial puts in issue the plaintiff's right to recover. Harlan v. Haynie, 9 Tex. 459.

In an action of trespass to try title, a plea of the Statute of Limitations does not deprive the defendant of any defense available under the plea of not guilty. Refugio v. Byrne, 25 Tex. 193.

In trespass to try title, under a plea of "not guilty," the defendant is permitted to give in evidence, special matter of defense. Punderson v. Love, 3 Tex. 60.

6. Affirmative Relief.—Affirmative relief in an action of trespass to try title cannot be granted a defendant upon the plea of not guilty. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Prather, 75 Tex. 53.

In trespass to try title by the grantee of a purchaser from the county of school lands against one who was a settler thereon at the time of the sale by the county, to recover possession of the land, the settler cannot depend on a plea of not guilty. He must plead specially that he was an actual settler when the lands were sold, that he desired to purchase, and must offer to purchase on the terms of the sale by the county. Perego v. White, 77 Tex. 196.

Where a defendant, in an action of trespass to try title, claimed in right of his wife as heir, and also as tenant, by prescription under the Statute of Limitations, it was held that the two pleas were not inconsistent. Smith v. De La Garza, 15 Tex. 150; 65 Am. Dec. 147.

In an action of trespass to try title, the plaintiff claiming as sole heir of S., the grantee of the land under the Mexican government, the defendant answered, claiming, as administratrix, a half interest in the land by donation of S., made in good faith and for a valuable consideration to T., her intestate, in 1882, and pleaded that S. cohabited with D., the plaintiff's mother, in 1818, and then separated, after which the plaintiff was born, and S. never again cohabited with D.; but that D. afterwards cohabited with V. and N. and others, and was generally profligate; that S. acquired the land after his separation from D., wherefor the land was subject to his donation in 1832. It was held that the answer was insufficient; that the matters pleaded had no plaintiff's title,¹ or he may deny the title, or he may admit the trespass, disclaiming title and tendering damages.² If he desires to claim the value of improvements made, this must be set up in the pleadings.³

legal significance and could not in any way affect the rights of the parties in the suit. Teal v. Sevier, 26 Tex. 516.

In actions of trespass to try titles, the defendant is not required to put in any other plea than that of not guilty, but if he wishes to assert an independent, equitable right, not involved in the issue as to title directly in controversy, he must present the facts by proper averments, and bring the necessary parties before the court to enable it to grant the relief to which he may be entitled; this cannot be done merely by the answer "not guilty." Ayres v. Duprey, 27 Tex. 593; 86 Am. Dec. 657.

1. McCarron v. O'Connell, 7 Cal. 152.

2. Harlan v. Haynie, 9 Tex. 459. On defendant's answer by disclaimer, a judgment of recovery for plaintiff, but with costs to defendant, is correct. Tate v. Wyatt, 77 Tex. 492.

The establishment of a boundary line of the plaintiff's land is necessary in every action of trespass to try title, where he establishes his claim to only part of the land sued for, and is an issuable fact in such case without any special pleading for that purpose; but where by pleading to the action for the entire tract, and a failure to disclaim as to any part, the defendants set up in law a claim to the whole, this fact is not in issue under the pleadings. Kœnigheim v. Miles, 67 Tex. 113.

3. Rogers v. Bracken, 15 Tex. 564; Stephens v. Westwood, 25 Ala. 716.

Improvements.—Allowance is properly made for improvements by defendant where plaintiffs have for more than forty years failed to assert their title, and it does not appear that defendant knew that the possession of the one from whom he purchased was not adverse. Boothe v. Best, 75 Tex. 568.

The grantee of the husband under an invalid power of attorney from the wife, is entitled to compensation for improvements, where the husband, as executor of the wife, with power to sell and invest in other land, retains the land given in exchange during the minority of plaintiff. Cardwell v. Rogers, 76 Tex. 37.

To justify a charge on lands for improvements made in good faith, it is not necessary that the purchaser show a complete chain of title. Thompson v. Jones (Tex. 1889), 12 S. W. Rep. 77.

In trespass to try title, a verdict giving to each defendant the same amount for improvements made is unwarranted, where a certain witness testifies that the improvements of the respective defendants were of different values, and the court finds that defendants proved the values as stated by such witness. Johnson v. Schumacher, 72 Tex. 334.

Upon the issue of improvements made in good faith, it was not error to permit defendants to show that they were ignorant of plaintiff's existence, and of her claim to the land. Polk v. Chaison, 72 Tex. 500.

A defendant in trespass to try title, or his assignee, making improvements after suit brought, does so at the risk of losing them if the suit is decided against him. This is so, though the premises have been sequestered by plaintiff, and subsequently replevied by defendant. Henderson v. Ownby, 56 Tex. 647; 42 Am. Rep. 691.

The operations of a statute fixing the rights, with reference to improvements, of the parties to an action of trespass to try title, are not to be extended beyond their letter. An unauthorized attempt to award damages to the defendant is void. Van Valkenburg v. Ruby, 68 Tex. 139.

In trespass to try title by the widow and daughter of a deceased owner, the jury found for the daughter and against the widow. They also found the value of the permanent improvements made in good faith to be $1,800, and of defendants' use and occupation $1,500. The court charged the daughter with the full value of the improvements, and gave her credit for the whole use and occupation, and rendered judgment against her for $300. It was held that though error, the error was in defendant's favor. She should have been charged with only two-thirds of the improvements, $1,200, and credited with two-thirds of the use and occupation, $1,000; and the judgment against her should have been but $200. Nichols v. Nichols, 79 Tex. 332.

7. Evidence—a. ADMISSIBILITY.—The admissibility of evidence in trespass to try title is governed by the usual rules of evidence. For a variety of cases illustrating what may be, and what may not be, admitted in evidence, see note 1.

1. Evidence Held Admissible.—Evidence has been held admissible in the following cases:—proceedings in bankruptcy as to the property owned by a bankrupt at the time of bankruptcy, Hernndon v. Davenport, 75 Tex. 462; Carothers v. Alexander, 74 Tex. 309; notice served by the defendant claiming title and rent, Herbert v. Hanrick, 16 Ala. 581; testimony of executor as to the purchase of land at a sheriff's sale in an action between the devisees and executor, Bennett v. Kiber, 76 Tex. 385; transcript of the probate court proceedings where the plaintiffs claim through an administrator's sale, Snow v. Starr, 75 Tex. 411; books of a surveyor showing that application to purchase has been made to him, Taylor v. Burke, 66 Tex. 643; a deed conveying land in controversy for the grantees therein named, Lindsay v. Hoke, 21 Ala. 542; an unconditional certificate issued by a county board of land commissioners in an action between those holding under such certificates and those holding under a conditional certificate, Capp v. Terry, 75 Tex. 391; a contract showing who owned land held by a patent, Roberson v. Du Bose, 76 Tex. 1; releases executed after the suit has been brought for the purpose of curing defects in the deeds, Ballard v. Carmichael (Tex. 1891), 17 S. W. Rep. 393; an authenticated copy of the judgment under which judgment was made, Stevell v. Lowry, 2 Brev. (S. Car.) 135; a plat made from a survey without notice to the adverse party upon the question of location and boundary if fortified by the oath of the surveyor, Keenan v. Keenan, 7 Rich. (S. Car.) 345; a deed to the defendant executed a few days before trial for the purpose of curing a defect in the title, Walker v. Emerson, 20 Tex. 706; 73 Am. Dec. 207; evidence showing that the conveyance was a mere sham to defraud creditors, Darst v. Trammell, 27 Tex. 129; an affidavit made before the commencement of the suit that he did not rely upon his landlord's title, Powell v. Haley, 28 Tex. 52; a patent as to the genuineness of the certificate on which it is issued: so also field notes to proving a survey made under the certificate, Kimbrow v. Hamilton, 28 Tex. 560; a deed of a foreign guardian of minor heirs made under order of the court, though inoperative to pass title, to show the claim of title by those holding under it, Burns v. Goff, 79 Tex. 236; the record of probate proceedings, where land was sold in an action involving title to the land, McCamant v. Roberts, 80 Tex. 310; evidence showing the calling of a certain tract before the papers showing a tract were put in, Boydston v. Sumpter, 78 Tex. 402; a deed of partition between an executor and one of the plaintiffs when the defendants claim under a different source of title, Snow v. Starr, 75 Tex. 411; a deed executed by an attorney in fact, though the authority of the attorney is not shown, where it is the common source of title, Glover v. Thomas, 75 Tex. 506; the duplicate of an original certificate, Ansaldue v. Schwing, 81 Tex. 198; Jobe v. Ollre, 80 Tex. 185.

Where a decree of partition between heirs of one under whom the defendant claims, is in evidence, it is competent to prove a previous parol partition corresponding to the decree of partition. Warren v. Fredericks, 76 Tex. 647.

Evidence as to the actions or declarations of a tenant well in possession are incompetent to show want of title in another. Warren v. Fredericks, 76 Tex. 647.

Under the general issue, the defendant may give in evidence a lease from one, under whom the plaintiff claimed, executed prior to the conveyance to the plaintiff. Anderson v. Harris, 1 Bailey (S. Car.) 315.

Evidence Held Not Admissible.—Evidence of statements in regard to land by one in possession, while negotiating for its purchase, where the person making them did not sustain any relation to the plaintiff which would make the declarations binding on him. Warren v. Fredericks, 76 Tex. 647; Bullock v. Wilson, 3 Port. (Ala.) 338.

The sheriff's return to the execution cannot be received to contradict his deed by showing that there has been no sale; so evidence that the purchase-money has not been paid is inadmissible. Hairston v. Hairston, 1 Brev. (S. Car.) 305.

A bare assertion of ownership, unaccompanied by long possession. Hern-

b. BURDEN OF PROOF.—If the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case, the burden of showing title is then on the defendant.¹

c. WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY OF TESTIMONY.—In trespass to try title, the question may arise as to the value of conflicting surveys, don v. Davenport, 75 Tex. 462; Bennett v. Kiber, 76 Tex. 385.

An unacknowledged instrument executed by an administrator after the close of administration to show intention. Utzfield v. Bodman, 76 Tex. 359.

Evidence that land included in the plaintiff's patent under which he claimed, was never served under the patentee's certificate, but that the surveyor's field notes were made under another certificate and transferred to the patentee, unaccompanied by proof that the defendant's location was anterior to the patentee's and that the field notes were not made upon and served under a certificate, is inadmissible. Styles v. Gray, 10 Tex. 503; Barth v. Green (Tex. 1890), 15 S. W. Rep. 112; Murrell v. Wright (Tex. 1890), 15 S. W. Rep. 156; Richardson v. Dallas (Tex. 1891), 16 S. W. Rep. 622; Capp v. Terry, 75 Tex. 391; Smith v. Gillum, 80 Tex. 120.

1. Where the plaintiff supports his title by a grant prima facie valid, the burden of proof is on the defendant to show that the instrument is valid. Smith v. Gillum, 80 Tex. 120.

In trespass to try title, a recital in a deed to the plaintiff, and introduced by him in evidence, that the title conveyed had passed through certain mesne conveyances, is prima facie evidence against a defendant claiming title from a common source; and where the defendant introduces no evidence on the question whether either of the recited conveyances was ever made, the plaintiff is entitled to recover. Burk v. Turner, 79 Tex. 276.

In an action of trespass to try title, a survey under a valid certificate will prevail against a patent granted on a subsequent survey, in the absence of any proof by the patentee of a prior location under his survey. Hollingsworth v. Holshausen, 25 Tex. 628.

The evidence of an unconditional land certificate issued by a county board of land commissioners to the assignee of a conditional certificate, and a report as to the person to whom the certificate was issued, cannot be overcome by the entry in the register required to be kept by the commissioner of claims of all certificates presented to him by the commissioner of the general land office, which entry showed its issue to the assignor. Capp v. Terry, 75 Tex. 391.

In trespass to try title, where the plaintiff claims under a patent from the United States government to himself as the legal vendee of an Indian reservee under the treaty of March 24th, 1832, and the defendant claims under an older patent from the government, the plaintiff must prove the location of the Indian reservee, as well as that he succeeded to the rights of such reservee. Stephens v. Westwood, 20 Ala. 275.

In an action to try titles to land, it appeared that the plaintiff had possession a length of time sufficient to raise the presumption of a grant, prior to the peaceable possession of the defendant for a shorter period, under a peaceable entry. It was held that, in the absence of any paper title held by either party, the plaintiff must prevail. Hallett v. Eslava, 3 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 105.

A patent issued by the United States for land originally entered by the patentee, and not void on its face, cannot be collaterally impeached, in an action of trespass to try title, by the production of the certificate showing an assignment thereof to another before the issuing of the patent. Masters v. Eastis, 3 Port. (Ala.) 368.

Admissions.—Admissions by the defendant, the party in possession, that rent is owing are such admissions of the plaintiff's title as puts the burden on the defendant. Samuels v. Findley, 7 Ala. 635; Gourdin v. Davis, 2 Rich. (S. Car.) 481; 45 Am. Dec. 745.

Variance.—Where a probated will devised a tract of land described only by giving the name of the testator's grantor and the place where his deed was recorded, the identity of the land devised may be proved by a certified copy of the will, a recorded deed from the grantor named, and the testimony of a witness that he had examined the records at the place named, and found no other deed than the one given in evidence. Ikard v. Thompson, 81 Tex. 285; Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Blagge, 73 Tex. 24.

which is usually a question for the jury.¹ The weight and sufficiency of the evidence in the particular case will depend on the facts of that case.²

8. Measure of Damages.—The damage, in trespass to try title, is not measured by the profits acquired by the defendant, although the plaintiff may be entitled to such profits, as well as to the rents and improvements, but by the actual damage done.³

9. The Judgment and Its Effect.—The judgment carries title, but has no greater effect as a bar to a subsequent action than a judgment in ejectment.⁴ A disclaimer by one of several defendants, or an abandonment of the suit by one of two plaintiffs, does not affect the other co-defendants or co-plaintiffs.⁵

10. Instructions.—The instructions given by the court must conform to the ordinary rules of law.⁶

1. Conflicting Surveys.—A league of land granted to B. was located in a survey which conflicted with a prior one. The plaintiff, the heir of B., in 1839, conveyed to S. Texas Special Laws (1849-50), ch. 125, authorized S. to raise the survey, so far as it conflicted with the prior grant, and directed that a land certificate issue to him to the extent of the conflict. Texas Special Laws (1856), ch. 126, authorized the heirs of B. to raise the survey and directed that the certificate issue to them. In 1857, the plaintiffs acknowledged the deed made by her in 1839. S. then held the certificate issued under the act of 1856, and it was located on the land in controversy, and a patent issued to his grantee in 1860. The plaintiff asserted no claim until, in 1887, she brought this suit to recover the land. The court rejected the deed of 1839, for a supposed defect in the description, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff. It was held that the charge was erroneous, in that it did not submit to the jury the question whether the plaintiff had not sold the certificate to S. Gresham v. Chambers, 80 Tex. 544; Keyser v. Meusbach, 77 Tex. 64.

2. Cases illustrating weight and sufficiency of the testimony are: Rodriguez v. Haynes, 76 Tex. 225; Howard v. Masterson, 77 Tex. 41; Sebastian v. Martin Brown Co., 75 Tex. 291; Crain v. Huntington, 81 Tex. 614; Keller v. Hollingsworth (Tex. 1890), 15 S. W. Rep. 110; James v. Tait, 8 Port. (Ala.) 476.

3. Measure of Damages.—In trespass to try title, the profits acquired by the defendant, by occupation of the premises, are not the measure of damages, Bullock v. Wilson, 3 Port. (Ala.) 338.

In Alabama, damages are recoverable for the detention down to the time of trial. Masters v. Eastis, 3 Port. (Ala.) 368.

Damages to the value of the mesne profits are recoverable. Avent v. Read, 2 Port. (Ala.) 480; 27 Am. Dec. 663.

Where the plaintiff prevails, he is entitled to the rents and profits, and the improvements placed on the land by defendant. Evetts v. Tendick, 44 Tex. 570.

If a plaintiff, in trespass to try title, establishes his claim to the land, he is entitled to recover rent for the time the defendant has been in possession of it. A new trial will be granted if the jury find only nominal damages. Duff v. Hutson, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 215; Johns v. Hardin, 81 Tex. 37; Shumake v. Nelms, 25 Ala. 126.

4. Camp v. Forrest, 13 Ala. 114.

In an action of trespass to try title, a verdict finding that "the land belongs to the plaintiff," will be held sufficient, on error, under the liberal rules of intendment, to support a judgment in favor of plaintiff for damages and costs, and the award of a writ of hab. fa. poss. Stephens v. Westwood, 25 Ala. 716; Scott v. Rhea, 5 Tex. 258.

5. Warnell v. Moore, 10 Tex. 235.

A discontinuance or abandonment of a suit by one of two plaintiffs, will not preclude a recovery by the other plaintiff. Beincourt v. Parker, 27 Tex. 558.

6. Instructions: Cases Illustrating.—Van Sickle v. Catlett, 75 Tex. 404; Hickey v. Behrens, 75 Tex. 488; Kirby v. Estill, 75 Tex. 484; Barron v. Henry (Tex. 1890), 15 S. W. Rep. 221; Parker v. Chancellor (Tex. 1890), 15 S. W. Rep. 157; Ivey v. Williams (Tex. 1890), 15 S. W. Rep. 168.

I. DEFINITION.—The term, "Trespass on the Case," is generally used as synonymous and convertible with "Action on the Case," but strictly it is one species, and presumably the earliest, of that form of action, and is distinct from, though analogous to, the action on the case in the nature of a writ of deceit, employed in cases of fraud, and the action on the case on promises, distinctively known as assumpsit.¹

The action on the case (also called simply "case") is a common-law form of action, originally including causes ex contractu as well as ex delicto, but now confined to the latter, which is employed where the right to sue results from the peculiar circumstances of the case, for which the older forms of action give no remedy.²

1. A wrong inflicted by deceit or fraud can "not logically be classed as a trespass, save in the sense in which that term includes every wrong for which men owe reparation or forgiveness. Near as the action of trespass on the case came to contract in some . . . instances, the lines did not meet, and the source of action on the case on promises, or assumpsit, must therefore presumably be sought in another offshoot from the Statute of Westminster II., which, though prompted by the desire to afford a remedy against an assignee for maintaining a nuisance, was yet broad enough to include numerous injuries that could not be adequately redressed by the methods in common use. Case might consequently be employed, not only to supplement trespass, but the common-law writs of covenant and deceit; or, in other words, as a remedy for injuries growing out of a fraud committed in the making or performance of an agreement, or resulting consequentially from its non-fulfillment, as well as those occasioned by an abuse of the authority which it conferred." Hare on Contracts 132.

2. " . . . Personal actions arising ex delicto, simply from tort or wrong, where no breach of any contract is suggested, and no forcible violence imputed to the defendant. This negative description is the only one that can easily be given of what are denominated actions of trespass on the case. It would, I believe, be impossible to recount all the occasions of bringing these anomalous suits. Every civil right affecting our persons or our property, may be attacked by injustice, and that injustice may again be multifariously diversified in acts of open malice or secret fraud." 3 Wooddeson's Lectures 167.

"The action of trespass upon the case lies where a party sues for damages for any wrong or cause of complaint to which covenant or trespass will not apply." Stephen on Pleading (9th Am. ed.) *17.

"This action of trespass, or transgression, on the case, is a universal remedy, given for all personal wrongs and injuries without force; so called because the plaintiff's whole case or cause of complaint is set forth at length in the original writ. For though in general there are methods prescribed, and forms of actions previously settled, for redressing those wrongs which most usually occur, and in which the very act itself is immediately prejudicial or injurious to the plaintiff's person or property, as battery, non-payment of debts, detaining one's goods, or the like; yet where any special consequential damage arises

II. RISE OF THE ACTION.—Under the early common law, a plaintiff whose cause of action resembled one for which a form of original writ was provided in the Register of Writs,¹ but to whose case no writ was precisely applicable, was allowed to bring a special action on his own case, and a writ, called magistratum breve,² was framed accordingly;³ but the framing of such writs in consimili casu was first enjoined upon the clerks in chancery as a duty by the Statute of Westminster II.,⁴ which was apparently intended merely to prevent the use of the forms of action, applicable to the various kinds of wrong then recognized by the law, from being restricted to certain classes of persons only, as had formerly been done.⁵ In the reigns of Edward II. and Edward III., this statute began to be relied upon as authorizing, either directly or by analogy, the framing of writs for actions based upon various private wrongs not contemplated by the forms of action then in which could not be foreseen and provided for in the ordinary course of justice, the party injured is allowed, both by common law and the Statute of Westm. II., ch. 24, to bring a special action on his own case, by a writ formed according to the peculiar circumstances of his own particular grievance. For wherever the common law gives right or prohibits an injury, it also gives a remedy by action; and, therefore, wherever a new injury is done, a new method of remedy must be pursued." 3 Bl. Com. 122.

To say that the name of this form of action is due to the fact that the whole case is set forth in the writ, seems slightly inaccurate. The action was said to be "on the case" because of the peculiar circumstances of each case, and not in the "methods prescribed" or the "forms previously settled," were what entitled the plaintiff to bring an action of this character. This being so, the whole case was necessarily "set forth at length in the original writ," in order to show why the action must be brought in this form rather than in one of those "previously settled," but it is the character of this form of action which gave it its name, rather than the mere fact that the whole case appeared on the writ.

1. See WRITS.

2. A magisterial writ, i. e., a writ framed by the masters or principal clerks of the chancery. Bract. 413 b; Crabb's Hist. Eng. Law (Am. ed.) 547-8.

3. 1 Chitty's Pleading (16th Am. ed.) 107; 2 Reeves' Hist. Eng. Law (Finl. ed.) 114.

4. 13 Edw. I., st. I. The twenty-fourth chapter of this statute provided for the extension of several writs to cases where the circumstances were similar to those for which the writs were framed, but not precisely the same; and then followed this general clause: "And as often as it shall happen in the chancery that in one case a writ is found, and in a like case (in consimili casu), falling under the same right and needing a like remedy, it is not found; then the clerks of the chancery shall agree in making a writ, or adjourn the complainant to the next Parliament, and write the case in which they could not agree, and refer it to the Parliament, when a writ shall be made with the advice of persons learned in the law; lest it might happen that the king's court should for a long time fail in administering justice to suitors." See 2 Reeves' Hist. Eng. Law (Finl. ed.) 114.

5. While the object of the general clause of the statute was undoubtedly to prevent a failure of justice through a narrow application of the old precedents, its passage was probably not intended to so enlarge the scope of the writ of trespass or any other writ, practically to create a new form of action applicable to all cases of private wrong where a remedy could not be had under the forms previously in use. This is shown by the fact that the very next chapter of the statute extended the writ of novel disseisin to estovers of woods, toll, tronage, passage, pontage, etc., to be taken in places certain, the custody of parks, woods, forests, etc., common of turbary, piscary, whether appendant to freeholds or not; and also that it should issue against the feoffee of a tenant for years or in ward. Had these cases been considered to be in use, which were framed for certain well-defined classes of action only.¹ The actions for which writs of trespass were framed, "according to the case," were at first regarded as a species of actions of trespass,² but came in the course of time to be recognized as distinct from them, and were therefore known, by Henry IV.'s consimili casu, there would have been no need of providing for them specially. What was meant by a writ in consimili casu was, for instance, a writ of entry to a reversioner when a tenant by the curtesy had aliened in fee, the statute of Gloucester granting such a writ only in cases of alienation by a tenant in dower.

1. For some time this general clause of the Statute of Westm. II., seems to have been strictly construed, but the practical necessity of obtaining remedies for wrongs, which were none the less actual because Parliament had not concerned itself with them, led at length to the adoption of the writ of trespass, under the alleged authority of this general clause to every man's own case, and not merely to cases of undoubted trespass which chanced to be under circumstances not precisely provided for by existing forms of writs. This extension of the operation of the statute was a matter of practical necessity, and was warranted by the fundamental maxim, Ubi jus ibi remedium. See Brown's Legal Maxims (7th Am. ed.) 191.

An early instance of this new development of the law occurred in the twenty-second year of Edward III. (22 Ass. 41). An action was brought against a man who had undertaken to ferry the plaintiff's horse safely and well across the Humber, but had so overloaded his boat with other horses, that the plaintiff's horse perished, à tort et à damages, etc. It was objected that the defendant had committed no tort, and that if the plaintiff had any remedy at all, it was in covenant, that being the only form of action then in use, for breach of contract; but the court said that the defendant had committed a trespass in overloading the boat, and that the action would lie for the loss of the horse by reason of this trespass. From this time on, the application of a writ of trespass to any case of negligence, or other breach of duty, became more and more frequent. Thus, in Y. B. 42 Edw. III. 13, trespass was brought against an inn-keeper and his servant for failure to take care of a guest's property, so that it was stolen from his room during his absence, whereupon the plaintiff was granted a writ upon the whole matter "according to his case."

Again, in Y. B. 46 Edw. III. 19, trespass was brought against a smith for driving a nail into the foot of a horse, and it was urged that the writ should state that he had done this vi et armis, or maliciously, and against the peace, there being no allegation that he had been employed to shoe the horse; but it was held that no such allegation was necessary, the writ being "according to his case." The peculiarity of this decision, as observed by a modern writer, is that, "The pleader did not aver malice, negligence, or contract, and relied on the single ground that, as the defendant's conduct was injurious and a cause of loss, he was liable in damages, unless he had a defense or justification; and this view was sustained by the court," although "The failure to set forth how the defendant obtained possession of the horse, and that he acted with the plaintiff's consent, gave color to the argument that for all that appeared the injury was forcible, and the action should have been trespass vi et armis." Hare on Contracts 125.

A somewhat similar action (Y. B. 48 Edw. III. 15) was brought against a surgeon who had undertaken to cure the plaintiff's hand, but had made it worse instead of better; and because the writ did not allege that the wrong was inflicted vi et armis, or against the peace, it was held not to be strictly an action of trespass, though of the same general nature.

2. The earliest cases (see last note) were founded either on a malfeasance or on such a neglect as might be considered equivalent to a malfeasance, and hence the requisite writ was regarded as a special writ of trespass, rather than as a new species of writ. There was at first considerable uncertainty as to when a general writ of trespass was the proper remedy, and when a special writ on the case, and also when such special writ should be reign, as actions of trespass upon the case,¹ or simply, actions on the case, which term was also used to include actions where the writ was more in the nature of a writ of deceit.²

The action upon the case was by degrees adapted to almost all private wrongs, where the common law provided no remedy, or none that was practically adequate,³ including the breach of contracts not under seal (to which, therefore, the writ of covenant did not apply),⁴ and at length even to cases where the breach of contract consisted in non-performance only,⁵ as well as to cases laid vi et armis, and when not. Thus, it was held that where a miller, who ought to have made no charge, took toll for grinding corn, the writ should be general, and not a special writ on the case, although it was argued that if the plaintiff had sustained an injury, he was entitled to a remedy applicable to his case. Y. B. 41 Edw. III. 24. It is observed by Reeves that the great motive for inserting vi et armis was that the plaintiff could have a capias, whereas otherwise he could only have a distingas, and the defendant might wage his law. Hence in many early cases special writs were laid vi et armis. Later on, however, the process was made the same as in an action of debt. See 2 Reeves' Hist. Eng. Law (Finl. ed.) 397, 508; 3 Id. 182.

1. The distinction was that trespass always involved violence, being stated in the writ to be vi et armis, whereas no such allegation properly appeared in a writ of trespass on the case, at least as regards the immediate cause of action. The ultimate cause of action, or causa causans, might indeed indicate force, and be properly laid vi et armis. Thus in Y. B. 12 Hen. IV. 3, an action on the case was brought for the flooding of land by the stopping of a sewer. Here the damage which made itself felt, the flooding, was the proper subject of an action on the case, but it resulted from the more remote malfeasance, the stopping of the sewer, which was regarded as a trespass vi et armis. 2 Reeves' Hist. Eng. Law (Finl. ed.) 508.

2. E. g., against a sheriff for a false return of summons (26 Ass. 48), or for directing the wrong officer to summons a panel, so that it was quashed (38 Ass. 13). Actions upon the case for slander, formerly a matter of spiritual cognizance (38 Ass. 29), and selling stolen cattle upon a false representation of ownership (42 Ass. 8), were also allowed. 2 Reeves' Hist. Eng. Law (Finl. ed.) 395.

3. Theoretically the scope of trespass on the case might have been even greater than it was. Thus Blackstone, citing the remarks of Fairfax, J., in Y. B. 21 Edw. IV. 23, says: "Which provision [of Stat. Westm. II.], with a little accuracy in the clerks of the chancery, and a little liberality in the judges, by extending rather than narrowing the remedial effects of the writ, might have effectually answered all the purposes of a court of equity, except that of obtaining a discovery by the oath of the defendant." 3 Bl. Com. 51.

As a modern writer says: "It was never admitted that the virtue of the statute [of Westm II.] had been exhausted, and it was probably rather the timidity of pleaders than the unwillingness of the judges that prevented the development from being even greater than it was. It may be asked in this connection, why some form of action on the case was not devised to compete with the jurisdiction of the court of chancery in enforcing trusts. An action on the case analogous to the action of account, if not the action of account itself, might well have been held to lie against a feoffee to use at the suit of the cestuis que use. Probably the reason is to be sought in the inadequacy of the common-law remedies, which no expansion of pleading could have got over. The theory of equitable rights, wholly outside the common law and its process, and inhabiting a region of mysteries unlawful for a common lawyer to meddle with, was not the cause, but the consequence, of the court of chancery's final triumph." Pollock on Torts 430. See also 2 Reeves' Hist. Eng. Law (Finl. ed.) 605.

4. See ASSUMPSIT, vol. 1, p. 882.

5. In Y. B. 14 Hen. VII. 18, pl. 58, the purchaser of land sued his vendor in case for breach of a contract that a third person should execute a release. It was objected that the case was one of non-performance merely, and that if

of the negligent performance of a gratuitous undertaking,¹ and cases of the conversion of personal property to the use of another the contract was by deed, the action should be covenant, but otherwise no action lay. This was denied by the court, "apparently because the grievance was not so much the non-fulfillment of the covenant, as that the plaintiff had been induced to make the purchase by an undertaking which the defendant had failed to keep." Hare on Contracts 133.

Similarly, in Y. B. 3 Hen. VII. 13, an action on the case was held maintainable against one who, for a consideration, had undertaken to procure a lease for the plaintiff, but procured it for himself, and in Y. B. 14 Hen. VIII. 25, it was held maintainable against the executors of one who had agreed by parol to pay for goods, if the purchaser did not, the goods being furnished in reliance on the promise. The reasons were: first, that there was no other remedy at law; and secondly, because the plaintiff had delivered the goods on the promise of the testator, and as there were sufficient assets, the testator's soul should not be put in jeopardy by the prejudice his promise had done the plaintiff. 3 Reeves' Hist. Eng. Law (Finl. ed.), 182, 403.

Judge Hare thus reviews the authorities: "The efficient cause of action . . . was not the promise, but what had been done in the belief that it would be performed. From this point the transition was easy to holding that compensation was due whenever the plaintiff was misled by an undertaking, made with a view of inducing him to act, and broken after he had complied with its terms. The declaration, as finally reduced to form and method, averred that the defendant promised to do or render something in consideration of an act to be done or payment made by the plaintiff; that the plaintiff, confiding in the promise, did as he was desired; but the defendant, fraudulently intending to deceive and injure the plaintiff, did not, nor would keep his promise. The action was not founded in contract, but in tort. It did not rely on the promise as obligatory, but on the deceit, through which the injured party had been deprived of his time or property without compensation; and the measure of damages seems, in the first instance, at least, to have been not what the defendant promised to give, but the value of that which the plaintiff had parted with in reliance on the promise. The former is, however, necessarily persuasive evidence of the latter, and the prima facies soon became conclusive.

. . . Such was the origin of the action on the case on promises, now commonly known as the action of assumpsit. It had its source in the conceit of some one who, after inducing the plaintiff to act by promise of reward, refused to fulfill it on the plea that it was not authenticated by a seal. Under these circumstances, it was obviously equitable that he should make compensation for the loss occasioned by his breach of faith. The right grew out of the consideration, not the promise, and the latter was material only as the means by which the plaintiff had been induced to render his goods or services. As time wore on, this view yielded to a more liberal interpretation, and the action was regarded as being what it really is, ex contractu." Hare on Contracts 134.

1. The leading case is Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909; 1 Smith Lead. Cas. (9th ed.) 354. The plaintiff declared, in an action on the case, that the defendant had undertaken to take up several casks of brandy safely from a certain cellar, and lay them down safely elsewhere, but did this so negligently that one of the casks staved, and the brandy lost. After a verdict for the plaintiff on the general issue, it was moved in arrest of judgment that it was not alleged that the defendant was a common porter, nor that he was to be paid. Lord Holt, in delivering judgment, held that while the defendant could not have been required to move the brandies, yet that having begun to do so, the task became a trust, and he was liable for any loss by his default. When the bailee promises to use due care, "neglect is a deceit to the bailor. For when he intrusts the bailee, upon his undertaking to be careful, he had put a fraud upon the plaintiff by being negligent, his pretense of care being the persuasion that induced the plaintiff to trust him. And a breach of a trust undertaken voluntarily will be a good ground for an action." See further, as to this, MANDATE, vol. 14, p. 243.

than the owner.¹ In time, all cases founded upon a breach of the express or implied promise involved in a contract, rather than upon a violation of some trust reposed in the defendant, or some duty owed by him, were classed by themselves as actions of assumpsit,² and the action on the case was regarded as an action purely ex delicto. A similar differentiation occurred in the case of those actions for the recovery of chattels, known as actions of trover.³

III. WHERE IT LIES.—An action on the case⁴ (to use the broader term) lies in general where by anyone's act a legal injury is suffered, for which the common law has provided no other adequate remedy.⁵ Thus, as the application of the action of trespass is limited to injuries directly inflicted by acts of force,⁶ that of the action of covenant to the breach of a contract under seal,⁷ and that of the now obsolete writ of deceit to injuries due to forgery or other unlawful use of a person's name,⁸ actions on the case lie for consequential injuries⁹ to persons, property, or rights, whether

2. Hare on Contracts, 135, 150. See ASSUMPSIT, vol. 1, p. 882.

3. See TROVER, vol. 26.

4. A complete review of the whole ground covered by actions on the case would involve the repetition of much that has been said in other articles. All that can properly be presented here is a brief statement of the principal kinds of tort to which this form of action is applicable, with the citation of a few leading cases.

5. As was said by Willes, C. J., in Winsmore v. Greenbank, Willes 577: "A special action on the case was introduced for this reason, that the law will never suffer an injury and a damage without a remedy, but there must be new facts in every special action on the case." See also Ashby v. White, 2 Ld. Raym. 938; 1 Smith Lead. Cas. (8th Am. ed.) 472; (9th Am. ed.) 464; Chapman v. Pickersgill, 2 Wils. 146; Keeley v. McCaw, 29 Ala. 227; Hussey v. Peebles, 53 Ala. 432; Griffin v. Farwell, 20 Vt. 151.

The broad range of actions on the case is necessarily limited to established principles of liability, for "Where cases are new in their principle . . . it is necessary to have recourse to legislative interposition in order to remedy the grievance; but where the case is only new in the instance, and the only question is upon the application of a principle recognized in the law to such new case, it will be just as competent to courts of justice to apply the principle to any case which may arise two centuries hence, as it was two centuries ago." Ashhurst, J., in Pasley v. Freeman, 3 T. R. 51.

Where, moreover, a remedy for cases which are new in principle has been granted by statute, the scope of an action on the case is still limited by the terms of such statute. Thus, although a judgment, confessed by a corporation which has refused payment of its notes or other evidences of debt, is void in New York by statute, (1 Rev. Stats. N. Y., p. 603, § 4), yet the taking of such a judgment for a valid debt, and the issuing of execution upon it, do not constitute such a wrongful act as to give rise to an action on the case, or its equivalent under the code, against the party taking the judgment, by one whose lien has been defeated thereby. His remedy against such party is by proceedings to recover the proceeds. Braem v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 127 N. Y. 508.

6. "The criterion of trespass is force directly applied." Tilghman, C. J., in Smith v. Rutherford, 2 S. & R. (Pa.) 358. See TRESPASS, vol. 26, p. 568.

7. See COVENANT, vol. 4, p. 463.

9. Distinction Between Trespass and Case.—The distinction between trespass and case is thus illustrated in Reynolds v. Clarke, 1 Str. 634: "If a man throws a log into the highway, and in that act it hits me, I may maintain trespass, because it is an immediate wrong; but if, as it lies there I tumble over it, and receive an injury, I must bring an action upon the case; because it is only prejudicial in consequence, for which originally I could have no action at all."

So in Day v. Edwards, 5 T. R. 648, Lord Kenyon, C. J., said: "The distinctions between actions of trespass vi et armis, and on the case is perfectly clear. If the injury be committed by the immediate act complained of, the action must be trespass; if the injury be merely consequential upon that act, an action upon the case is the proper remedy."

To the same effect, Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Bl. 892; 1 Smith Lead. Cas. (8th Am. ed.) 797; Shapcott v. Muford, 1 Ld. Raym. 187; Haward v. Bankes, 2 Burr. 1113; Hawker v. Birbeck, 2 Burr. 1556; Gates v. Bayley, 2 Wils. 313; Bourden v. Alloway, 11 Mod. 380; Morgan v. Hughes, 2 T. R. 225; Savignac v. Roome, 6 T. R. 125; Leame v. Bray, 3 East 593; Bell v. Troy, 35 Ala. 184; Pruitt v. Ellington, 59 Ala. 454; Crawford v. Waterson, 5 Fla. 472; Johnson v. Castleman, 2 Dana (Ky.) 377; Cole v. Fisher, 11 Mass. 137; Rappelyea v. Hulse, 12 N. J. L. 257; Kelly v. Lett, 13 Ired. (N. Car.) 50; Case v. Mark, 2 Ohio 169; Carsten v. Murray, Harp. (S. Car.) 113; Johnson v. Perry, 2 Humph. (Tenn.) 569; Winslow v. Beal, 6 Call (Va.) 44.

Where Intent Is a Factor.—Where the force which occasions an injury is not that of the person by whom the injury is inflicted, but is only made effective by him, his intent in the application of the force must determine the form of the action to be brought against him. Thus, where a sailing vessel runs down another vessel, the force is rather that of the winds and waves, than of the person steering, and hence, if the collision arise from his negligence, an action on the case lies; but if it be willful, trespass is the proper remedy. Ogle v. Barnes, 8 T. R. 188; Turner v. Hawkins, 1 B. & P. 472.

Distinction Between "Immediate" and "Consequential."—The distinction stated in the cases cited above is thus amplified by Baldwin, J., in Jordan v. Wyatt, 4 Gratt. (Va.) 151; 47 Am. Dec. 720: "Terms 'immediate' and 'consequential' should, as I conceive, be understood, not in reference to the time which the act occupies, or the space through which it passes, or the place from which it is begun, or the intention with which it is done, or the instrument or agent employed, or the lawfulness or unlawfulness of the act; but in reference to the progress and termination of the act, to its being done on the one hand, and its having been done on the other. If the injury is inflicted by the act, at any moment of its progress, from the commencement to the termination thereof, then the injury is direct or immediate; but if it arises after the act has been completed, though occasioned by the act, then it is consequential or collateral, or, more exactly, a collateral consequence."

It must of course be remembered that the distinction between those circumstances which warrant an action of trespass and those where an action on the case applies has not always been carefully observed, for, as was said in an old case, "The court will not look with eagle's eyes to see whether the evidence applies exactly or not to the case, when they see the plaintiff has obtained a verdict for such damages as he deserves, [but] they will establish such verdict if it be possible." Slater v. Baker, 2 Wils. 359.

It is also true that the distinction between these two forms of action is sometimes very refined, and it is evidently to avoid the consequent danger of delay or failure of justice that, in several even of those states which have not adopted codes of pleading, the distinction has been abolished by statute. See infra, this title, Modern Changes and Substitutes.

Instances.—Where the driver of a horse-car, which was moving, told a child to jump off, and the child did so, but was unable to clear the track, and was run over, trespass on the case was held to be the proper remedy, though trespass would have lain had the driver pushed the child off the car. Bay Shore R. Co. v. Harris, 67 Ala. 6.

The cutting of a strap and pulley, which transmitted the power in a mill, is trespass as against the party in possession of the strap and pulley; but if the party who is deprived of the use of the power by the such cutting be not in possession of the machinery so cut, his damage is consequential merely, and he should sue in case. Dale Mfg. Co. v. Grant, 34 N. J. L. 138.

Where a dog is killed by the direct administration of poison, trespass is the proper remedy; but if poison is put where it is known that the dog will get it, the remedy is by trespass on the case. Dodson v. Mock, 4 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 146; 32 Am. Dec. 677.

the act from which the injury results be in itself rightful or wrongful,¹ willful² or negligent,³ forcible⁴ or fraudulent.⁵

Trespass on the case lies for the diversion of water from a millrace. "If force used in the removal of the splash boards [of the dam] was made the gist of the action, then there would be reason for holding that case would not lie; but that is not the averment. The substantial grievance alleged is diverting the water of the stream from the mill, whereby its use and profits were lessened. The removal of the splash boards was only the means whereby the consequential damages were produced and sustained. No recovery was sought or claimed, but these consequential damages. Case therefore may be sustained." Meyer v. Horst, 106 Pa. St. 552.

Where cattle get on a railroad line through defective fencing, and are run over, their damage is a consequent damage from the wrong of the defendants in letting their fences be incomplete or out of repair, and may be recovered accordingly in an action on the case. Sharrod v. London, etc., R. Co., 4 Exch. 580.

An allegation that the defendant, knowing that the plaintiff's wife was well advanced in pregnancy, violently assaulted two negroes in her immediate presence, so that the fright occasioned thereby brought on a miscarriage and injured her health, presents a cause of action in trespass on the case, and consequently in trespass, where no distinction in the form of action is recognized. Hill v. Kimball, 76 Tex. 210.

1. In an action on the case for consequential injuries, the only question which can arise is whether the plaintiff has suffered an injury, recognized by law, in consequence of an act of the defendant or of some one for whose acts he is responsible. It is immaterial whether the particular act was in itself rightful or wrongful. Keller v. Stoltz, 71 Pa. St. 356.

2. Thus, case was held to be the proper remedy for forcibly placing the plaintiff on a foreign vessel, to be taken out to sea, which vessel was subsequently captured by one of another nation, whereby the plaintiff incurred ill-treatment. Cottrel v. Cummins, 6 S. & R. (Pa.) 348. And for the indirect consequences, medical expenses, detention from business, etc., of an assault upon the plaintiff. Barnum v. Balti- more, etc., R. Co., 5 W. Va. 10. Or of an assault upon some other person. Hill v. Kimball, 76 Tex. 210.

3. Thus trespass on the case lies for the negligence of a mill-owner, in leaving machinery uncovered, whereby personal injuries were suffered. Hayden v. Smithville Mfg. Co., 29 Conn. 548.

For neglect to notify a magistrate of an arrest, whereby the hearing was delayed, to the damage of the person arrested. Shaw v. Reed, 16 Mass. 450.

For neglect to repair a division fence, which the defendant was bound to repair, whereby the plaintiff's cattle escaped and were injured. Cate v. Cate, 50 N. H. 144.

For carelessly using a defective boiler, which burst and injured the horse of a customer. Spencer v. Campbell, 9 W. & S. (Pa.) 32.

For negligently discharging a gun, and wounding the master of a vessel, whereby the voyage was prevented to the damage of the owners. Adams v. Hemmenway, 1 Mass. 145.

Individual Negligence of One of Several Defendants.—Where the plaintiff was run down on the highway, and had his leg broken, by a coach which was negligently driven by one of the owners, it was claimed that the injury being immediate, the action should have been trespass. It was held that as the plaintiff had a right to sue all the owners, and could not do so in trespass, except, perhaps, as to the one who was driving, he could join him with the others in case. Moreton v. Harden, 4 B. & C. 223; 10 E. C. L. 316.

5. An action on the case in the nature of a writ of deceit lies for a false affirmation made with intent to defraud the plaintiff, whereby he is injured, whether the defendant be benefited or not. Pasley v. Freeman, 3 T. R. 51. See also Adamson v. Jarvis, 4 Bing. 66;

Injuries to health,¹ being necessarily consequential, are proper subjects for actions on the case, and the same is true of injuries to intangible property or rights. Hence an action on the case lies for libel or slander,² conspiracy to defame,³ and the enticing away or seduction of a man's daughter, servant,⁴ or wife;⁵ or the infliction of personal injuries upon them,⁶ whereby he loses the society or services to which he was entitled.

13 E. C. L. 343; Lyde v. Barnard, 7 M. & W. 101; Swan v. Phillips, 3 N. & P. 447; Barney v. Dewey, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 224; 7 Am. Dec. 372; Culver v. Avery, 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 380; 22 Am. Dec. 586.

Instances.—An action on the case lies to recover damages for the refusal of one in possession of lands to allow buildings erected by another to be removed by a third party, who had bought them from the builder, on the strength of the defendant's representation that the builder had a right to use them. Harris v. Powers, 57 Ala. 139.

Or a false warranty on the sale of chattels. Williamson v. Allison, 2 East 446; Webster v. Hodgkins, 25 N. H. 128; Mahurin v. Harding, 28 N. H. 128; 59 Am. Dec. 401. Assumpsit, will also lie. See ASSUMPSIT, vol. 1, p. 882.

Case lies for fraud in the sale of lands, notwithstanding that the deed contains covenants. Bostwick v. Lewis, 1 Day (Conn.) 250; 2 Am. Dec. 73; Frost v. Raymond, 2 Cal. (N. Y.) 193; 2 Am. Dec. 228; Wardell v. Fosdick, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 325; 7 Am. Dec. 383; Monell v. Colden, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 395; 7 Am. Dec. 390; Ward v. Wiman, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 193.

Where the claimants of cotton in the hands of a garnishee, obtained possession of it from him, he being insolvent, and converted it to their own use, pending the trial of an issue between them and one who had recovered a judgment against the owner of the cotton, it was held that, the issue having been decided against the claimants, an action on the case would lie against them for taking the property. The court, per Clopton, J., said: "The proceeding by garnishment and condemnation of the cotton did not confer any right of property or right of possession on the plaintiff. His only right was to have the cotton sold for the payment of his judgment, which he was prevented from having done by the tortious act of the defendants, for which wrong and injury he is without remedy, unless he can maintain the present action." Aderholt v. Smith, 83 Ala. 486.

Case lies for fraudulently inducing the plaintiff to buy a share of worthless stock. Smith v. Bellows, 77 Pa. St. 441. See DECEIT, vol. 5, p. 318.

4. Some authorities held that trespass vi et armis was the remedy for seduction of a daughter. Woodward v. Walton, 6 B. & P. 476; Tullidge v. Wade, 3 Wils. 18. But as, in contemplation of law, the only injury to the father is the consequential loss of service, it would seem clear that trespass on the case was the proper remedy where the defendant was charged with seduction only. Bennett v. Allcott, 2 T. R. 166; Speight v. Oliveira, 23 Stark. 493; Furman v. Applegate, 23 N. J. L. 28; Moran v. Dawes, 4 Cow. (N. Y.) 412; Ream v. Rank, 3 S. & R. (Pa.) 215; Parker v. Elliott, 6 Munf. (Va.) 587.

In Clough v. Tenney, 5 Me. 446; Ream v. Rank, 3 S. & R. (Pa.) 215, it is said that for seduction committed on the plaintiff's own premises trespass quare clausum fregit will lie.

For enticing away a servant or minor child, trespass on the case is the proper remedy. Jones v. Tevis, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 25; 14 Am. Dec. 98; Legaux v. Feasor, 1 Yeates (Pa.) 586.

5. Winsmore v. Greenbank, Willes 579; Van Vacter v. McKillip, 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 578; Martin v. Payne, 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 387; 6 Am. Dec. 288; Haney v. Townsend, 1 McCord (S. Car.) 206.

6. Where the injury has been committed by force, trespass lies, but apparently not to the exclusion of case. Ditcham v. Bond, 2 M. & S. 436; Hoover v. Heim, 7 Watts (Pa.) 62.

For all consequential injuries to real estate, trespass on the case is the proper remedy, as where the injury results from acts done on other land,¹ or, if on the plaintiff's land, by one who is not a trespasser,² or where the estate injured is of an incorporeal nature.³ So where the estate injured, consists of an estate in reversion,⁴

Case is indisputably the remedy where the forcible injury complained of, was not inflicted by the defendant himself; thus, where the plaintiff's wife had been violently ejected from a theater by the agents of the owner in the course of their employment, an action on the case was held to be the proper remedy. Drew v. Peer, 93 Pa. St. 234.

Where the personal injury to the wife itself results from an assault on another person, the remedy is in case for the additional reason that the injury is consequential. Hill v. Kimball, 76 Tex. 210.

1. An action on the case lies for injuries to real estate by the construction of a railroad in its proximity. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Duncan, 111 Pa. St. 352; Northern Cent. R. Co. v. Holland, 117 Pa. St. 613; Philadelphia, etc., R. Co. v. Patent, 17 W. N. C. (Pa.) 198.

Or the location and use of railroad tracks on the street on which it abuts. Jeffersonville, etc., R. Co. v. Esterle, 13 Bush (Ky.) 667.

Or by the erection of the abutments of a bridge on the highway adjoining plaintiff's property. Chester County v. Brower, 117 Pa. St. 647; Delaware County's Appeal, 119 Pa. St. 159.

Or for building a house so near the adjoining property, that the eaves project over the latter, intercepting the light and causing water to drip. Garraty v. Duffy, 7 R. I. 476.

Or for injuries to the surface by the owner of underlying mineral deposits, who neglects to leave adequate support. Williams v. Hay, 120 Pa. St. 485.

Or for filling up of a dock by the discharge of the contents of a city sewer. Clark v. Peckham, 9 R. I. 455.

2. Thus, where one who had water rights in certain property, dug up the old pipes and put down new ones, was sued for unnecessarily damaging the property in so doing, it was held that if the right to enter upon the land existed, the abuse of it would sustain an action upon the case, and not an action of trespass. Edelman v. Yeakel, 27 Pa. St. 26.

Case lies for injuries resulting from a failure to replace bars or close gates by which the defendant has lawfully entered. Hinks v. Hinks, 46 Me. 423; Stone v. Knapp, 29 Vt. 501.

Where heavy articles were stored in a house, in disregard of the contract on which it was rented, and the house fell down from the pressure, trespass on the case was held to be the proper remedy, the injury being consequential. Brooks v. Clifton, 22 Ark. 54.

Similarly, case lies for obstruction of the owner's use of real estate, by one not a trespasser. See Grove v. Barclay, 106 Pa. St. 155.

3. Mainwaring v. Giles, 5 B. & Ald. 361; 7 E. C. L. 129; Hewlins v. Shipham, 5 B. & C. 221; 11 E. C. L. 207; Bryan v. Whistler, 8 B. & C. 294; 15 E. C. L. 219; Wetmore v. Robinson, 2 Conn. 529; Shafer v. Smith, 7 Har. & J. (Md.) 67; Strickler v. Todd, 10 S. & R. (Pa.) 63; 13 Am. Dec. 649; Union Petroleum Co. v. Bliven Petroleum Co., 72 Pa. St. 173; Marshall v. White, Harp. (S. Car.) 122; Wilson v. Wilson, 2 Vt. 68.

Thus, case lies for the obstruction of a right of way. Greasley v. Coddington, 9 Moore 489; Wright v. Freeman, 5 Har. & J. (Md.) 467; Cushing v. Adams, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 110; Smith v. Wiggin, 48 N. H. 105; Osborne v. Butcher, 26 N. J. L. 308; Okeson v. Patterson, 29 Pa. St. 22.

Or for using a private way, the action being brought by the party on whose application the way was laid out. Lambert v. Hoke, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 383.

Case lies, although the right interfered with was granted by covenant, under seal. Lindeman v. Lindsey, 69 Pa. St. 93; 8 Am. Rep. 219.

4. Randall v. Cleveland, 6 Conn. 328; Bucki v. Cone, 25 Fla. 1; Baker v. Sanderson, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 348; Lienon v. Ritchie, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 235; Hall v. Snowhill, 14 N. J. L. 8; *Elliot v. Hence, case is the landlord's remedy or remainder, the action of trespass on the case affords the available remedy.¹

An action on the case is the remedy for any damage received in consequence of a breach of any duty imposed upon a public officer by virtue of his office,² or upon anyone by charter,³ or statute,⁴ as also for the violation of rights acquired by these means.⁵ It lies for the abuse of legal process regularly for loss of rent and destruction or dilapidation of the premises, against one who, wishing to injure him, drives the tenant away by threats or force, even though the tenant's abandonment is a breach of contract. Walden v. Conn, 84 Ky. 312.

Even though the immediate injury be merely nominal. Schnable v. Koehler, 28 Pa. St. 181.

Case lies by a landlord against one who, with notice of the former's lien, removes the tenant's crop. "The landlord having a lien on the crop, and a stranger acquiring possession of it, with notice of the lien, holding it as the tenant held it, subject to the lien, is guilty of a tort, to the damage of the landlord, if he destroys, removes, or so converts or changes its character that the landlord cannot enforce his lien. For this tort the landlord has no other appropriate remedy than an action on the case. Not having a right of property or a right of possession, he cannot maintain trespass, trover or detinue." Hussey v. Peebles, 53 Ala. 432.

Case lies for removal of a building by the defendant in an execution, who remains in possession after the sale, without redeeming. Topping v. Evans, 58 Ill. 209.

Case may be brought by the assignee of a judgment against a person who has removed buildings from land bound by the lien of the judgment. Yates v. Joyce, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 136.

But a vendor, who has given up possession to the vendee, under articles of agreement in part executed, has not such a reversionary interest, on account of the unpaid purchase money, as to enable him to sue the vendee in case for an injury to the realty. Ives v. Cress, 5 Pa. St. 118; 47 Am. Dec. 401.

1. A life tenant and a remainder-man can join in an action on the case, such joinder working no inconvenience to the defendant, but rather the reverse. McIntyre v. Westmoreland Coal Co., 118 Pa. St. 108.

2. Brown v. Jarvis, 1 M. & W. 704; Williams v. Mostyn, 4 M. & W. 145;

Curling v. Evans, 1 M. & G. 349; Jacobs v. Humphrey, 2 C. & M. 413; Aireton v. Davis, 9 Bing. 741; 23 E. C. L. 448; Wintle v. Freeman, 11 A. & E. 539; 39 E. C. L. 159; Dorman v. Kane, 5 Allen (Mass.) 40; Bridges v. Perry, 14 Vt. 262; Starr v. Moore, 3 McLean (U. S.) 354.

It being one of the duties of county officers to provide a proper jail, they may be sued in case by a sheriff, who, through their neglect to do so, has been held liable in damages for a prisoner's escape. Brown County v. Bull, 2 Ohio 348.

3. Thus, where a raft grounded in a canal, on account of low water, and was partially destroyed by storm while aground, trespass on the case was held to lie against the canal company, it being bound by its charter to keep the canal navigable. Riddle v. Proprietors of Locks, etc., 7 Mass. 169; 5 Am. Dec. 35.

4. Case lies for injuries due to allowing diseased animals to run at large, where a statute requires them to be kept in. Mount v. Hunter, 58 Ill. 246.

When an action on the case is brought for neglect of a statutory duty, the plaintiff must show that the duty was imposed for his benefit, or for his security from the injury suffered. Smith v. Tripp, 13 R. I. 152.

5. 2 Chitty on Pleading (16th Am. ed.) *161.

Thus case lies for infringement of a patent. Walton v. Potter, 1 Scott N. R. 91; Minter v. Mower, 6 A. & E. 735; 33 E. C. L. 199; Perry v. Skinner, 2 M. & W. 471; Morgan v. Seaward, 2 M. & W. 544. Or a copyright. Clementi v. Goulding, 11 East 244; Roworth v. Wilkes, 1 Camp. 94; Moore v. Clarke, 9 M. & W. 622. Case also lies for violation of a trade-mark. Crawstray v. Thompson, 11 L. J. C. P. 301. Or for selling goods as the manufacture of another. Blofeld v. Payne, 4 B. & Ad. 410; 24 E. C. L. 87; Morrison v. Salmon, 2 Scott N. R. 449.

Where, however, a statute prescribes a particular form of action for injuries issued,¹ or for resistance to or disobedience to such process.²

This form of action is equally applicable whether the act be that of the defendant personally, or of some one acting by his direction,³ the act of one person, or of several conspiring together,⁴ or of the public, as in the case of a public nuisance producing special damage.⁵ For injuries inflicted by a servant in the course resulting from its violation, that form of action must be used. Cole v. Muscatine, 14 Iowa 296; Moore v. White, 45 Mo. 206; Green v. Bailey, 3 N. H. 33.

1. Trespass on the case lies for damage received in consequence of any act wrongfully or maliciously done under authority of lawful process regularly issued from a court of competent jurisdiction. Boot v. Cooper, 1 T. R. 535; Belk v. Broadbent, 3 T. R. 185; Gyfford v. Woodgate, 11 East 297; Wetherden v. Embden, 1 Camp. 295; Chapman v. Pickersgill, 2 Wils. 145; Luddington v. Peck, 2 Conn. 700; Watson v. Watson, 9 Conn. 141; Cannon v. Sipples, 39 Conn. 505; Balock v. Randall, 76 Ill. 224; Owens v. Starr, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 234; Plummer v. Dennett, 6 Me. 421; Turner v. Walker, 3 Gill & J. (Md.) 377; 22 Am. Dec. 329; Warfield v. Walter, 11 Gill & J. (Md.) 80; Hayden v. Shed, 11 Mass. 500; McHugh v. Pundt, 1 Bailey (S. Car.) 441; Shaver v. White, 6 Munf. (Va.) 113; 8 Am. Dec. 730; Olinger v. McChesney, 7 Leigh (Va.) 660.

Thus it lies in cases of improper arrest or malicious prosecution. Elsee v. Smith, 2 Chit. 304; Grainger v. Hill, 4 Bing. N. Cas. 212; 33 E. C. L. 328; Wentworth v. Bullen, 9 B. & C. 840; 17 E. C. L. 503; Watkins v. Lee, 5 M. & W. 270; Heywood v. Collinge, 1 P. & D. 202; James v. Phelps, 3 P. & D. 231; Swift v. Chamberlain, 3 Conn. 537; Allison v. Rheam, 3 S. & R. (Pa.) 142; 8 Am. Dec. 644; Berry v. Hamill, 12 S. & R. (Pa.) 210; Royer v. Swazey, 10 W. N. C. (Pa.) 432.

It is immaterial that the affidavit in support of the warrant of arrest was legally insufficient. Mask v. Rawls, 57 Miss. 270.

Or for the entering of judgment and issuing of execution after the claim has been paid, such judgment and execution not being nullities. Barnett v. Reed, 51 Pa. St. 190; 88 Am. Dec. 574.

Or for neglect by one who had recovered a judgment, to notify his attorney of the payment of the claim, the latter subsequently proceeding to sell under an execution. Fripp v. Martin, 1 Spears (S. Car.) 236.

In the case of excessive distress, an action on the case lies, although the distress was really void because the rent had been tendered. Branscomb v. Bridges, 1 B. & C. 145; 8 E. C. L. 63; Smith v. Goodwin, 4 B. & Ad. 413; 24 E. C. L. 89.

* Conspiracy.—Trespass on the case lies for a conspiracy to prosecute. Skinner v. Gunton, 1 Wms. Saund. 228.

Against Officers of Justice.—Case lies against a justice of the peace, who has jurisdiction, for abuse of his power. Kennedy v. Barnett, 64 Pa. St. 141. Or against a constable for disregarding a claim for the benefit of the exemption law. Van Dresor v. King, 34 Pa. St. 201; 75 Am. Dec. 643. Or for selling goods not included in the levy. McCutcheon v. Philadelphia, 7 Phila. (Pa.) 207.

2. Thus, case lies for pound-breach, or rescue of property distrained. Parrett Nav. Co. v. Stower, 6 M. & W. 564. Or against a witness for disobeying a subpoena. Pearson v. Iles, Dougl. 556; Amey v. Long, 9 East 473; Lamont v. Crook, 6 M. & W. 615.

3. Thus trespass on the case lies for injuries resulting from improper treatment of the plaintiff's strayed animal by the defendant's servant, on his master's land and at his direction. Knott v. Digges, 6 Har. & J. (Md.) 230. See AGENCY, vol. 1, p. 331.

4. Trespass on the case has taken the place of the old writ of conspiracy. Mott v. Danforth, 6 Watts (Pa.) 304; 31 Am. Dec. 468. As, apparently, that writ only applied to conspiracy to indict of treason or felony, where the party conspired against was acquitted by verdict, trespass on the case always applied in other cases of conspiracy, though the actions were sometimes called writs of conspiracy. Skinner v. Gunton, 1 Wm. Saund. 228, 230, n. 4.

5. Chichester v. Lethbridge, Willes 71; Butterfield v. Forrester, 11 East 60; Wilkes v. Hungerford Market Co., 2 of his employment, the master is liable in an action on the case¹ (it being his duty to employ careful servants), and this even where the servant would himself be liable in trespass,² unless the injury was inflicted at the master's direction, in which case an action of trespass will lie.³ The owner of animals is also liable in case for any injuries they may inflict,⁴ unless he had no reason to be aware of their noxious propensities.⁵

The liability for consequential damages within the scope of this action may result from an act which is itself a trespass, or it may grow out of a breach of express or implied contract, and in both classes of cases the plaintiff has a choice of remedies. Thus, a negligent act or other trespass may itself be declared upon as the injury,⁶ or the plaintiff may waive the trespass, and sue in case for the consequences.⁷ Similarly, in many instances where assumpsit

1. Aldridge v. Great Western R. Co., 4 Scott N. R. 156; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Reedy, 17 Ill. 580; Johnson v. Castleman, 2 Dana (Ky.) 377; Campbell v. Phelps, 17 Mass. 244; Hamilton County v. Cincinnati, etc., Turnpike Co., Wright (Ohio) 603; Drew v. Peer, 93 Pa. St. 234. This rule does not hold in the case of deputies of public officers, their acts being considered in law to be directly and personally the acts of their superiors. Broughton v. Whallon, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 474. See MASTER AND SERVANT, vol. 14, p. 740.

2. Havens v. Hartford, etc., R. Co., 28 Conn. 69.

3. To maintain trespass against an employer, it must appear that he expressly ordered or directly assented to the thing actually done. Thus, where the plaintiff's sheep were run over by a train, the engine driver having orders to go at a certain high rate of speed, it was held that trespass did not lie. Parke, B., said: "It did not follow as a necessary consequence that it [the engine] would infringe on the plaintiff's cattle. It might not have happened, if the driver had seen the cattle sooner, or the cattle had heard the engine, and got out of the way. The act, therefore, cannot be treated as a trespass, on the ground that it was, by necessary implication, ordered to be done by the defendants. . . . This is a simple case of an act done by the servant in the course of his employment, not specifically ordered by the master. . . . If in the present case the plaintiff's cattle had a right to be on the railway, the plaintiff has a remedy by action on the case against the company for causing the engine to be driven in such a way as to injure that right; for the defendants were bound to see that their carriages did not travel at such a speed as to make it impossible to avoid other persons, who had a lawful right to be there. Sharrod v. London, etc., R. Co., 4 Exch. 580. To the same effect, Philadelphia, etc., R. Co. v. Wilt, 4 Whart. (Pa.) 142; Yerger v. Warren, 37 Pa. St. 319; Allegheny Valley R. Co. v. McLain, 91 Pa. St. 442.

5. Hence, the scienter must be laid and proved. Mason v. Keeling, 12 Mod. 333; Buxendin v. Sharp, 2 Salk. 662; Jones v. Perry, 2 Esp. 482.

6. Some of the earlier cases held that trespass alone lay where immediate injury followed a negligent act. Gates v. Miles, 3 Conn. 64; Barnes v. Hurd, 11 Mass. 57; Waldron v. Hopper, 1 N. J. L. 390; Case v. Mark, 2 Ohio 169; Taylor v. Rainbow, 2 Hen. & M. (Va.) 423.

7. Branscomb v. Bridges, 1 B. & C. 145; 8 E. C. L. 63; Smith v. Goodwin, 2 N. & M. 114; Frankenthal v. Camp, 55 Ill. 169; Schuer v. Veeder, 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 342; Johnson v. will lie for a breach of contract, case also will lie for a violation of the duty which the contractual relation involves.¹ In the case of negligent performance of an undertaking requiring especial skill,² or of the breach of a duty arising in law from the circumstances of the case, or the breach of a duty imposed by operation of law,³

It has even been held that case will lie where a recovery has already been had in trespass. Blin v. Campbell, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 432.

1. The form of action is assumpsit or case, according as the contract, or the duty growing out of it, is made the basis of the defendant's liability. New Orleans, etc., R. Co. v. Hurst, 36 Miss. 660; Howe v. Cook, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 29; Cogswell v. Baldwin, 15 Vt. 404; 41 Am. Dec. 686.

Case lies against attorneys at law for negligence in the conduct of cases intrusted to them. Walker v. Goodman, 21 Ala. 647; Sevier v. Holliday, 2 Ark. 512; O'Barr v. Alexander, 37 Ga. 195; Dearborn v. Dearborn, 15 Mass. 316; Salisbury v. Gourgas, 10 Met. (Mass.) 442; Wilson v. Coffin, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 316; Holmes v. Peck, 1 R. I. 242; Crooker v. Hutchinson, 1 Vt. 73.

The more usual common-law remedy, however, is assumpsit. See ASSUMPSIT, vol. 1, p. 882.

Case lies against a broker for neglect of his duty to his principal, e. g., the unauthorized investment of money given him for a not her investment. Shreeve v. Adams, 6 Phila. (Pa.) 260.

It lies for abuse of authority under a power of attorney to sell stocks, when such abuse does not involve conversion. Sturges v. Keith, 57 Ill. 451; 11 Am. Rep. 28.

So in the case of other kinds of work which a man may be employed to do. Smith v. White, 6 Bing. N. Cas. 218; 37 E. C. L. 353.

Case is equally appropriate where a breach of warranty is superadded to the negligent performance of the contract, such warranty being merely an inducement to the contract, or to the acceptance of the article contracted for. Brown v. Edington, 2 M. & G. 279; 40 E. C. L. 371; City Iron Works v. Barber, 102 Pa. St. 156.

2. Thus, case lies against surgeons, physicians, and apothecaries for want of skill or care in the treatment of a patient. Slater v. Baker, 2 Wils. 359; Seare v. Prentice, 8 East 48; Peck v. Martin, 17 Ind. 115; West v. Martin, 31 Mo. 375; 80 Am. Dec. 107.

The want of skill being the gist of the action, it may be brought by the party injured, whether the defendant was employed by him or by some one else. Gladwell v. Steggall, 5 Bing. N. Cas. 733; 35 E. C. L. 292; 8 Scott 60.

The distinction between the liability on an express contract and that on the contract implied in law to use all necessary skill, is stated at length in Zell v. Arnold, 2 P. & W. (Pa.) 293, where a millwright contracted to build a mill, carding-machine, millrace, etc., but laid off the millrace unskillfully, so that the water failed to flow. The supreme court of Pennsylvania, per Gibson, C. J., said that although the action grew out of an express contract, "no other contract formed an ingredient in the subject of it than that implied by the law, which requires any one employed in an art or calling, to bring to the business a competent share of diligence and skill. The gist of an action on the case like the present is not a failure to perform, but a failure to perform in a workmanly manner, which is a tort. An undertaking for skill and diligence is implied no further than to raise a duty, the breach of which is the gravamen and meritorious cause of the action."

. . . A special action on the case lies for what is substantially a tort, although a tort deducible from the existence of a contract."

3. "Where there is an express promise, and a legal obligation results from it, then the plaintiff's cause of action is most accurately described in assumpsit, in which the promise is stated as the gist of action. But where from a given state of facts the law raises a legal obligation to a particular act, and there is a breach of that obligation, and a consequential damage, there, although assumpsit may be maintainable upon a promise implied by the law to do the act, still an action on the case founded in tort is the more proper form of action, in which the plaintiff in his dec-as in the case of common carriers,¹ an action on the case is the more proper remedy.

IV. PLEADING AND PRACTICE.—The form of the declaration in actions on the case depends on the circumstances which give rise to the action, and hence admits of considerable variety.² The injury ought not, in general, to be stated to have been committed vi et armis nor contra pacem.³ The statements should truly and specifically disclose the cause of action.⁴ The action being wholly distinct from that of trespass, counts in trespass cannot be joined with those in case, except where a statute specifically allows this.⁵ The plea and the evidence admissible thereupon are treated of in PLEADING.⁶ Whatever will, in equity and conscience, bar recovery, may be given in evidence.⁷ The judgment includes full costs of laration states the facts out of which the legal obligation arises, the obligation itself, the breach of it, and the damage resulting from that breach." Burnett v. Lynch, 5 B. & C. 589; 12 E. C. L. 326, per Littledale, J. Hence it was held in that case, that an action on the case lies for non-performance, by an assignee of the term, of the covenants in a lease, to the damage of the lessee, the lease having been assigned by deed-poll, without any express promise to perform the covenants or contract to indemnify, so as to sustain an assumpsit, and the ground of the action being the damage resulting to the plaintiff from the defendant's breach of duty.

1. Although assumpsit will lie against common carriers for breach of an express or implied contract of carriage, a breach of their common-law duty to carry and convey goods and passengers in safety is a tort, the subject of an action on the case, which was indeed originally regarded as the only remedy. Bretherton v. Wood, 3 B. & B. 54; Ansell v. Waterhouse, 2 Chit. 1; Pozzi v. Shipton, 8 A. & E. 963; 35 E. C. L. 574; Bridge v. Grand Junction R. Co., 3 M. & W. 244; Walker v. Jackson, 10 M. & W. 161; Bank of Orange v. Brown, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 158; McCall v. Forsyth, 4 W. & S. (Pa.) 179; Southern Express Co. v. McVeigh, 20 Gratt. (Va.) 264; Emigh v. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co., 4 Biss. (U. S.) 114.

The same holds true of shipowners, even though the master be also liable on the charter party. Leslie v. Wilson, 6 Moore 415.

"An action on the case is founded upon the mere justice and conscience of the plaintiff's case, and is in the nature of a bill in equity, and, in effect is so; and therefore a former recovery, release, or satisfaction need not be pleaded, but may be given in evidence. For whatever will, in equity and conscience, according to the circumstances of the case, bar the plaintiff's recovery, may, in this action, be given in evidence by the defendant; because the plaintiff must recover upon the justice and conscience of his case, and upon that only." Bird v. Randall, 3 Burr. 1345; 1 Wils. 45. To the same effect, Kil-

suit irrespective of the amount of the damages, except as this may be modified by state law.¹

V. MODERN CHANGES AND SUBSTITUTES.—In Alabama, Florida, Maryland, Mississippi, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Rhode Island, and the Territory of New Mexico, the action on the case remains substantially as at common law, except that in Alabama counts in trespass and case may be joined, when they relate to the same subject-matter.²

In England, and in those states which have adopted codes of pleading, case does not now exist as a distinct form of action, being merged in the single form of civil action.³ In Massachusetts, it has been merged with other actions for damages ex delicto in the "action of tort."⁴ In Pennsylvania, in the "action of trespass,"⁵ and in Tennessee in the "action on the facts of the case."⁶ In Michigan, it is employed to recover damages where, by the wrongful act of any person, an injury is produced, either to the person, personal property, or rights of another, or to his servant, child or wife, for which trespass lies, whether such act be willful, forcible, or not, and whether the injury be immediate or consequential.⁷ In Delaware, Illinois, and Maine, the distinction between trespass and trespass on the case has been abolished, and either form may be used.⁸ In Virginia and West Virginia, trespass on the case may be brought for injuries wherever trespass would lie.⁹ The rights of action which, before these changes took place, were sued on in actions on the case, remain, of course, unchanged,¹⁰ and, under whatever system they are prosecuted, must be supported by the same evidence as at common law.¹¹

2. In Whitney v. Lynn, 122 Mass. 338, it was held that under a statute providing full indemnity to a person whose land had been taken for laying out a street, for the trouble and expense to which he has been put by the proceeding, a person could not recover for the disquiet, vexation, and annoyance to which he had been subjected by the proceeding, nor for the uncertainty in which he has been kept as to whether the street would be laid out; but he may recover for his trouble and expense in visiting the city, where his land was situated, in consulting with counsel and in conferring with the officials. In that case the court, by Endicott, J., said: "The statute provides that any person claiming damages shall have full indemnity for the trouble and expense to which he has been put by the proceedings. General Statutes, ch. 43, §§ 14, 63. The respondent contends that the words 'vexation,' 'disquietude,' 'annoyance,' 'uncertainty,' as used by the learned Judge, refer to conditions of mind, and are not the subject-matter of damages within the meaning of the statute. We are of opinion that the objection is well taken. The word 'trouble,' in the statute, refers to trouble from which some material or pecuniary injury results, involving labor and the expenditure of time, or occasioning inconvenience to the owner in the use and occupation of the land; all of which may be estimated in damages by a standard common to all cases. But mental troubles, so difficult to estimate by any pecuniary standard, and which may vary in different individuals, according to their temperament or health, do not come within the meaning of the statute, and are not the subject-matter of damages. The other objection must be overruled. The petitioner's trouble and expense in visiting Lynn, employing counsel and conferring with the mayor, come clearly within the statute."

I. DEFINITION.—Trover, at common law, was an action on the case, whereby the owner of personal property recovered damages against a person who had committed the wrong of conversion with respect to that property. The action derives its name from the form which the declaration originally assumed: "That the defendant found goods which the plaintiff lost;" the finding (trouver), in the language of the ancient pleaders, was the inducement and the conversion the gist of the action.¹

1. "In form," said Lord Mansfield in Cooper v. Chitty, 1 Burr. 20, 1 Smith's L. C. 810, "the action is a fiction; in substance, a remedy to recover the value of personal chattels wrongfully converted. The form supposed the defendant to have come by the possession of the goods in a lawful manner. Where the defendant takes them wrongfully and by trespass, the plaintiff, if he thinks fit to bring this action, waives the trespass and admits the possession to have been lawfully gotten. The gist of the action is the conversion." See also 1 Chitty on Pl., p. 167; Cooley on Torts, p. 516; Bigelow's Leading Cas., tit., "Conversion."

History of the Action.—The common law afforded the owner of chattels who had been unlawfully deprived of them by the wrongful act of another, four distinct remedies, the application of each depending upon the character of the wrongdoer's act and the nature of the relief sought. First: the appeals of robbery and larceny furnished a remedy in those cases where the defendant feloniously deprived the plaintiff of his property. The judgment was restitution of the goods to the owner and punishment to the wrongdoer. 4 Bl. Com., p. 146; 2 Stephen's Hist. Crim. Law, p. 247; Bigelow's L. C. 420. Second: replevin was the proper form of action in those cases where the defendant had unlawfully distrained the goods of the plaintiff. 4 Bl. Com., p. 148. See REPLEVIN, vol. 20, p. 1041. Third: trespass was the action whereby one whose property had been unlawfully taken by another, was afforded relief. It was inapplicable to a case where the defendant acquired possession lawfully, however tortious his holding might have become subsequently. See TRESPASS, vol. 26, p. 568; 1 Chitty on Pl., tit. "Trespass"; Bradley v. Davis, 14 Me. 44; 30 Am. Dec. 729; Van Brunt v. Schenck, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 377; Parker v. Walrod, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 296; 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 514; 30 Am. Dec. 124; Cooley on Torts, 442; Cooper v. Chitty, 1 Burr. 31. Fourth: detainee afforded a more direct remedy for the recovery of chattels unlawfully detained, and in some manner supplied the defects of the action of trespass. This was the proper form of action for the recovery in specie, of chattels which were unlawfully detained by the defendant. The judgment in detainee was conditional: "That the plaintiff recovers the said goods, or (if they cannot be found) their respective values and damages for detaining them." But detainee was attended with some disadvantages. It was essential for the plaintiff to set out with minute accuracy a description of the goods detained, so as to identify them from other goods of like character. A failure to comply with this particular was fatal to the plaintiff's case; and where several chattels were detained, each had to be described so minutely that it rendered the pleadings long, tedious, and cumbersome. Nor did this formal accuracy cease with the written pleadings of the parties. The verdict of a jury which did not find a detainer as to each article separately, and estimate the damages for the detention of each specific chattel, was of no effect. 1 Chitty Pl., p. 164; 3 Bl. Com. 152; Cro. Jac., p. 681. Again, the defendant, by swearing to the non-existence of the plaintiff's cause of action, could at once defeat the plaintiff's claim, which privilege, called wager at law, was grounded upon the analogy of detinue to the action of debt; detinue being nothing more than an action of debt for chattels. History of Assumpsit, J. B. Ames, 2 Harv. L. Rev., p. 100; Bigelow's L. C., p. 422; 3 Bl. Com., p. 152; Burroughs v. Bayne, 5 H. & M. 296, per Martin, B.

In England, the necessity of a fictitious allegation of a losing and finding has been dispensed with by statute,¹ while procedural legislation in recent years, in the various states, has almost totally abolished the form of the action, though preserving the substantive right to recover for the wrong of conversion.²

After the enactment of the statute, in consimili casu, 13 Edw. I., the common lawyers were not long in devising means of overcoming the disadvantages of the action of detinue. Indebitatus assumpsit had usurped the functions of the action of debt, wager of law not being an incident to actions on the case. It was very desirable to procure a remedy in place of detinue, and several actions of assumpsit were brought which, under the old law, might have been made the subject of an action of detinue. In 26 Henry VIII., there appears an action on the case, "for that the plaintiff had delivered the goods to the defendant and the defendant for ten shillings promised to keep them safe." Bro. N. C. 4. So, again, in an action upon the case, that the goods of the plaintiff came into the hands of the defendant, and he wasted them, the defendant says they came not to his hands, etc., and gives in evidence that they were not the proper goods of the plaintiff. 34 Hen. VIII.; Bro. Action Sur Le Case 103.

Whenever detinue could be supplanted by another form of action, it was invariably rejected and an action upon the case adopted. Many actions were brought in case which, under the old law, would have been in detinue. Thus, it was held that an action on the case lay against one who had hired a horse to ride to Everwick and had ridden it to Carlisle; 21 Edw. IV., p. 76; also that it lay against one who had hired a horse to ride to Everwick and had ridden it so fast that it could not be used for many days; that it lay against one who had killed a horse which had been bailed to him. Bigelow's L. C., p. 423.

It was not, however, until the fourth year of the reign of Edward VI. that an action in the precise form from which the action of trover derived its name, appears. Brooke's N. C. 6. Judging from the exceptions taken to the declaration, the form of the action was a novelty. The earliest cases were no doubt actual instances of where the defendant found goods which the plaintiff had lost. But the advantages of the new action over detinue soon gave it a popularity among the pleadings, since the finding, as in detinue, was not traversable and the "conversion" was the gist of the action. See Reeves' Hist. of Eng. Law, vol. 3, p. 552; Bigelow's L. C., p. 425; Brooke's N. C. 122, pl. 404; Bacon's Abr., tit. "Trover;" Rolle's Abr., tit. "Trover" [a]. See also the valuable note of Mr. F. W. Maitland, Appendix A, Pollock on Torts, p. 467.

1. 15 and 16 Vict., ch. 76, § 69, the first Common Law Procedure Act. The form of the declaration prescribed by this enactment simply alleges that, "The defendant converted to his own use or wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of the use and possession of the plaintiff's goods." The alternative words were inserted at the suggestion of Lord Denman, with a view merely of explaining the nature of the "conversion." Per Bramwell, B., in England v. Cowley, L. R., 8 Exch. 126. These allegations are exactly similar to one another, and it is the latter that most correctly described the nature of the action, since the plaintiff sues in respect of the loss of goods for which he has suffered, irrespective of any particular appropriation of them, which may have been made by the defendant. Keyworth v. Hill, 3 B. & Ald. 687; Glyn v. East Indian Dock Co., 6 Q. B. Div. 490; Burroughs v. Bayne, 5 H. & N. 309; England v. Cowley, L. R., 8 Exch. 129; Hiorst v. Bott, L. R., 9 Exch. 89.

II. CONVERSION—WHAT CONSTITUTES—1. Elements of Conversion—

a. IN GENERAL.—A conversion, in the sense of the law of trover, is any unauthorized dealing with the goods of another by one in possession, whereby the nature or quality of the goods is essentially altered, or by which one having the right of possession is deprived of all substantial use of the goods, permanently or temporarily.¹

recover the specific chattel, he brings replevin. See REPLEVIN, vol. 20, p. 1041.

In Cooley on Torts, p. 516, it is said that in many states, there are statutes which permit the plaintiff, in an action of replevin, to proceed in it as in trover, and recover the value of the property, in case the officer fails to find it. See REPLEVIN, vol. 20, p. 1041.

Other definitions of conversion. "A conversion is any unauthorized act which deprives another of his property either permanently or for an indefinite time." Bosanquet, adopted by Bramwell, B., in Hiorst v. Bott, L. R., 9 Exch. 86.

In Bouvier's Law Dict., conversion is defined as, "The turning or applying the property of another to one's own use."

In Liptrot v. Holmes, 1 Kelly (Ga.) 381, Warner, J., said: "The action of trover being founded on a conjoint right of property and possession, any act of the defendant which negatives or is inconsistent with such right, amounts in law to a conversion. It is not necessary to a conversion that there should be a manual taking of the thing in question by the defendant; it is not necessary that it should be shown that he has applied it to his own use. Does he exercise a dominion over it in exclusion or in defiance of the plaintiff's right? If he does, that is in law a conversion, be it for his own or another person's use."

One who assumes to himself the property in and right of disposition of the goods of another, is guilty of conversion. Ramsby v. Beezley, 11 Oregon 49. But if the disposition of the property is consented to by the owner, there is no conversion. Tousley v. Board of Education, 39 Minn. 419; Griffin v. Bristle, 39 Minn. 456. As where the plaintiff lends an article to the defendant, to be used by him until the delivery of another which the plaintiff has contracted to sell, he cannot sue for conversion of the article loaned until delivery or tender of the one sold. Jackson v. Appleton, 2 N. Y. Supp. 787.

The mere assertion of ownership without in any way interfering with the property or the owner's right to control it, is no evidence of a conversion. Irish v. Cloyes, 8 Vt. 30; 30 Am. Dec. 446.

Forbidding an outgoing tenant taking his property from the premises, except on paying a demand which is not a lien, amounts to a conversion. Voss v. Bassett (Tex. 1890), 15 S. W. Rep. 503.

The gist of the action is the conversion, and unless the defendant has had an actual or virtual possession of the goods, he cannot be charged with conversion of them to his own use. Traylor v. Horrall, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 317.

The mere driving an estray from one's close into the highway is not a conversion. Stevens v. Curtis, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 227. One who, knowing property to be under attachment, suffers it to be sent away and sold by the owner, under an agreement by which he receives the avails of the sale, is not thereby guilty of conversion. Polley v. Lenox Iron Works, 2 Allen (Mass.) 182. Nor is the sale of property by the defendant after the commencement of the suit, evidence of conversion. Storm v. Livingston, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 44. Where, in a usurious contract, the delivery of personal property by the borrower to the lender is a part of the transaction, the possession of such property by the lender is tortious from the beginning and trover will immediately lie. Schroeppel v. Corning, 5 Den. (N. Y.) 236.

Where one sells goods, and, because the buyer does not remove them when ordered, sells them over again, he is guilty of conversion. Koon v. Brinkerhoff, 39 Hun (N. Y.) 130. The indorsement and delivery of an elevator receipt by the consignee is a conversion of the grain represented by the receipt, as against the holder of a draft drawn against it with transfer of the bill of lading. Hamlin v. Carruthers, 19 Mo.

It is a rule of law that a person who assumes dominion over the property of another, does so at his peril, and is responsible in

App. 567. The sale on execution of personal property belonging to a third person amounts to a conversion, whether the officer making the sale removes it or not. Scudder v. Anderson, 54 Mich. 122. Where a bank causes stock, indorsed in blank with a power of attorney to have transferred on the corporation books and deposited with it as collateral, to be transferred to it on the books of the corporation, and insists on its right to vote on the same, it does not constitute a conversion, the bank not intending a conversion. Union, etc., Bank v. Farrington, 13 Lea (Tenn.) 333.

In an action for the conversion of a quantity of broom corn, where the evidence showed that the defendant received the corn in question to be sold on commission, and held it in anticipation of an advance in price, until the freight and storage charges, together with the amount previously advanced, exceeded the sum realized therefor, it was held that the charge of conversion was entirely unsupported by the evidence. Worth v. Buck, 34 Neb. 703.

The Defendant, at the time of purchase of the plaintiff's farm, made a distinct oral agreement for the purchase of the manure, it being agreed that it should be put up at auction, and if the defendant was the highest bidder, he should have it. The plaintiff conveyed the farm, and put up the manure for sale, but the defendant forbade the sale, claiming the manure as his own, and spread it on the land, and it was held a conversion of the plaintiff's property. Strong v. Doyle, 110 Mass. 92. Castrating a hog running among one's stock is not such proof of a change of property as to be evidence of a conversion or appropriation to his own use. Byrne v. Stout, 15 Ill. 180.

As to what has been held a conversion under various facts, see Maxwell v. Harrison, 8 Ga. 61; 52 Am. Dec. 385; Conner v. Allen, 33 Ala. 515; West Jersey R. Co. v. Trenton, etc., R. Co., 32 N. Jordan*, 62 Me. 490, forbidding the owner of cord wood to enter and remove it from the defendant's land.

Joint-Conversion.—In order to constitute a joint conversion, the acts of the defendants need not be contemporaneous, if they all tend to the same result. Cram v. Thissell, 35 Me. 86.

Trespass by Cattle.—Where the cattle of one person break into the inclosure of another, and eat and destroy the growing corn, his remedy is in trespass, and trover will not lie. There is no conversion in such a case. Smith v. Archer, 53 Ill. 241.

Unauthorized Sale for Taxes.—The unauthorized sale of property by a tax collector amounts to a conversion. Thompson v. Currier, 24 N. H. 237.

Cancellation of Certificate of Membership.—The cancellation of a certificate of membership in the board of trade amounts to a conversion. Olds v. Chicago Open Board of Trade, 33 Ill. App. 445.

Giving "Free Certificate" to a Slave.—Giving to a negro a certificate that he is free, does not amount to a conversion in the one giving the certificate, if the negro should turn out to be a slave. Glover v. Riddick, 11 Ired. (N. Car.) 582.

Sale of Mortgaged Property.—The sale of mortgaged property by the mortgagor to the exclusion of the rights of the mortgagee, is a conversion. Ashmead v. Kellogg, 23 Conn. 70.

Use of Property Attached to the Freehold.—Where machinery has become incorporated in a mill so as to be part of the realty, the use thereof by the owners of the mill is not a conversion, and this, though the machinery was obtained through the fraud of the agent of the owners. Woodruff, etc., Iron Works v. Adams, 37 Conn. 233.

Sale Under Process.—Where, by statute, an officer is required to have damages, if, by means of his act, a fraud or an injury is inflicted upon the real owner.¹ Therefore, in trover, as in trespass, the honesty of the defendant's motive cannot enter as an element in the determination of his liability.² His intention may have been to preserve the goods for the owner, yet, if his act is unauthorized, and results in the destruction or deprivation of the owner's possession, he is liable. And this is true even where the owner has by his fault in the first instance laid bare the opportunity for the defendant's honest, but unauthorized act.³ It is only in cases of imminent peril and danger that a destruction of property is excusproperty appraised before its sale by him under process, he will be liable for conversion if he sells without an appraisal. Tripp v. Grouner, 60 Ill. 474.

3. Alvord v. Davenport, 43 Vt. 30.

In Hiorst v. Bott, L. R., 9 Exch. 86, it appeared that the plaintiffs, in consequence of a telegram from one G., their broker, forwarded to Birmingham 83 quarters of barley, and at the same time sent to the defendant a letter inclosing an invoice for the barley, in which it was stated to be "sold by Mr. G. as broker between buyer and seller," and the delivery order which made the barley deliverable "to the order of consignee or consignee." The barley had, in fact, never been ordered by the defendant, who had had no previous dealings with either the plaintiffs or G. A day or two after the receipt of these documents by the defendant, G. called; the defendant produced the documents and said, "What does this mean? I never bought any barley through you of the plaintiffs." G. said, "It was a mistake of the plaintiffs; they had no doubt confused the defendant's name and some other name." G. then asked the defendant to indorse the order, telling him that he could not get the barley without, and that by not sending the order back expense would be saved. Thereupon the defendant indorsed the delivery order to G., who took it to the railway station, obtained delivery of the barley, disposed of it, and absconded. The jury found that the defendant, in signing the order, had no intention of appropriating the barley to his own use, but was anxious to correct what he believed to be an error; and with a view of returning the barley to the plaintiffs.

It was held to be a conversion. Bramwell, B., in this case, said: "Now here the defendant did an act that was unauthorized. There was no occasion for him to do it; for the delivery order made the barley deliverable to the order of the consignor or consignee, and if the defendant had done nothing at all, it would have been delivered to the plaintiffs. And there is no doubt that by what he did, he deprived the plaintiffs of their property; because, by means of this order so indorsed, G. got the barley and made away with it, leaving the plaintiffs without any remedy against the railroad company, who had acted according to the instructions of the plaintiffs in delivering the barley to the order of the consignee. The case, therefore, stands thus; that by an unauthorized act on the part of the defendant, the plaintiffs have lost their barley, without any remedy except against G., and that is worthless. It seems to me, therefore, that this was assuming control over the disposition of these goods, and causing them to be delivered to a person who deprived the plaintiffs of them. The conversion is therefore made out. Though his intention originally was to preserve the property for the owner, if he is subsequently guilty of any unauthorized act concerning it, he is liable for conversion, as where the defendant, at the plaintiff's request, bid in property of the plaintiff sold to enforce a claim against it, and afterwards, without his consent, removed it from the state, he was held guilty of conversion." Fitchett v. Nanary (Super. Ct.), 14 N. Y. Supp. 479.

A field driver merely detaining an estray in his yard, in order to notify the owner before impounding, is not liable for a conversion. Dean v. Lindsey, 16 Gray (Mass.) 264; Van Valkenburgh v. Thayer, 57 Barb. (N. Y.) 196.

In Fitzgerald v. Burrill, 106 Mass. 446, the plaintiff delivered a letter to able, though the lack of judicial expression renders it impossible to place any limitation upon the doctrine.¹

6. MUST BE A MISFEASANCE.—The common-law fiction that trover was founded upon the idea that the defendant had found goods which the plaintiff had lost, prevented the maintenance of the action where the property was destroyed through the negligence of the defendant: "For no law compelleth him who found a thing to keep it safely."² There must be some overt tortious act. Where the defendant is wholly passive and asserts no right to the property, even though his omission causes its complete destruction, he cannot be held liable in trover.³ Where property is in the possession of a defendant who, without denying the plaintiff's right of possession, refuses to transfer it physically to the

the defendant, a clerk in a post office, to be sent by mail as a registered letter, under a mutual mistaken belief that a letter could be registered to the place to which it was addressed. On discovering the mistake, the defendant sent it by mail unregistered and it was lost. It was held that he was answerable to the plaintiff in trover. Hawkes v. Dunn, 1 C. & J. 519; 6 Wait's Act. & Def. 187.

It is no conversion for the vendee of a slave, upon the improper refusal of the vendor to receive her back and rescind the sale, to set her to work instead of abandoning her. Rand v. Oxford, 34 Ala. 474.

1. Drake v. Shorter, 4 Esp. 165. In Bird v. Astcock, 2 Buls. 280, Lord Coke said: "There was a case resolved in the common bench, when I was there, concerning a Gravesend barge, in which were a great number of passengers; one there had a pack of great value and of great weight in the barge. There suddenly happened a very great storm and they were all in great danger, and were for their own safety enforced to throw out a great part of the goods for the safeguard of their lives, which were then in the barge; amongst which goods for the lightening of the barge, this pack of goods was thrown over; afterwards he, which was the owner of this pack, brought his action upon the case against the bargeman for these his goods thus cast over. It was resolved that he should recover nothing, it being the act of God."

In a case where the plaintiff shipped 5000 cigars to the defendant, with the understanding that he could have as many as he wanted at $35 per thousand; the defendant elected to take 2000, packing away the remaining 3000, which were subsequently appropriated by the public during a yellow-fever epidemic, when the defendant was absent from the city. It was held that an action of trover would not lie against the defendant. Traylor v. Hughes, 88 Ala. 617.

2. In Mulgrave v. Ogden, Cro. Eliz. 219, decided in 1591, there was an action sur trover for twenty barrels of butter and counts that the defendant tam negligenter custodivit that they became of little value. Upon this it was demurred and held by all the justices that no action upon the case lieth in this case; for no law compelleth him that finds a thing to keep it safely; as if a man finds a garment and suffers it to be moth-eaten; or if one find a horse and giveth it no sustenance; but if a man find a thing and useth it, he is answerable, for it is a conversion, so if he of purpose misuseth it, as if one finds a paper and puts it into the water, etc.; but for negligent keeping no law punisheth him.

3. Owen v. Lewyn, 1 Vent. 223; George v. Wilburn, 1 Roll. Abr. 6 Pl. 4; Lowndes's Case, Clayt. 104; Anonymous, 2 Salk. 655; Attersol v. Briant, 1 Camp. 409; Severin v. Kerpell, 4 Esp. 156; Heald v. Carey, 21 L. J. C. P. 97; Beaton v. Wade, 14 Colo. 4; Knapp v. Willetts, 1 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 206.

"In order to constitute a conversion, there must be an intention of the defendant to take to himself the property, or to deprive the plaintiff of it." Parke, B., in Simmons v. Lillystone, 8 Exch. 442. There must be some repudiation by the defendant of the owner's right or some exercise of dominion over them in consistence with such right. Heald v. Carey, 11 C. B. 977; 73 E. C. L. 977. And see School District v. Fink, 25 Wis. 636.

One who receives goods into his possession and control as bailee, knowing them to have been stolen, and afterwards suffers the party depositing them to take them away, is not thereby guilty of conversion. Loring v. Mulcahy, 3 Allen (Mass.) 575. And see Hill v. Hayes, 38 Conn. 532. But one who receives goods to keep and redeliver to the owner, but delivers them to a third person, or suffers him to take them away, is guilty of conversion. Lockwood v. Bull, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 322; 13 Am. Dec. 539. But in Decker v. Shelton, 1 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 224, the plaintiff sent logs to the defendant's mill to be sawed, the logs afterwards being claimed by one W. One of the defendants, on seeing W. approach the mill, said to a person present, "There comes W. after that lumber; you show him where it is," and the person addressed put his head out of the window and said to W., "There is your lumber." W. carried the logs away. It was held that the action of the defendant did not render him, or his co-defendant, liable to the plaintiff for the conversion of the logs.

The accidental loss or destruction of an article by one lawfully in possession of it, is not a conversion. Salt Springs Nat. Bank v. Wheeler, 48 N. Y. 493; 8 Am. Rep. 564.

Thus, a bank cannot be held liable in trover for bonds deposited with it, but which have been either lost or stolen. Dearbourn v. Union Nat. Bank, 58 Me. 273; Smith v. First Nat. Bank, 99 Mass. 605; 47 Am. Dec. 59; nor the drawee of a bill of exchange to whom it has been presented for acceptance, for its accidental loss or destruction. Salt Springs Nat. Bank v. Wheeler, 48 N. Y. 492; 8 Am. Rep. 564; nor a carrier or warehouseman for the loss of goods destroyed by fire. Heald v. Carey, 11 C. B. 977; 73 E. C. L. 977; nor goods lost or stolen by non-feasance merely. Bowlin v. Nye, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 416; Packard v. Getman, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 613; 21 Am. Dec. 166; Hawkins v. Hoffman, 6 Hill

(N. Y.) 586; 41 Am. Dec. 767; Williams v. Gesse, 3 Bing. N. Cas. 849; 32 E. C. L. 353; nor for omitting seasonably to deliver the goods without a previous demand. Robinson v. Austin, 2 Gray (Mass.) 564; Johnson v. Strader, 3 Mo. 359; Scovill v. Griffith, 12 N. Y. 509.

In La Place v. Aupoix, 1 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 407, sometimes cited to the contrary, it appeared that the goods had been placed in the defendant's possession and had been sold by him, contrary to orders, and it was held that their subsequent loss on the voyage on which they were shipped made no difference.

In George v. Wiburn, 1 Roll. Abr. 6, pl. 4, it is said: "If I bail goods to a common carrier to carry to a place, and then the goods are taken from the carrier, that is no conversion in the carrier to charge him in trover and conversion. But an action on the case lies against him as carrier, on the custom of the realm to carry goods safely and to deliver them as is appointed." And see Lownsdell's Case, Clayt. 104; Owen v. Lewyn, 1 Vent. 223; Youl v. Harbottle, Peake's N. P. Cas. 49; Ross v. Johnson, 5 Burr. 2825; Heald v. Carey, 11 C. B. 977; 73 E. C. L. 977; Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, p. 172. Nor will an officer be liable in trover for the loss of attached property stolen from him, where due care was taken. Dorman v. Kane, 5 Allen (Mass.) 38. For losses or injuries arising to property through the neglect of a bailee, a special action and not trover must be brought. Johnson v. Strader, 3 Mo. 359. So, where the plaintiff gave goods to the defendant, as agent, with full powers of sale, and the latter gave the goods to an irresponsible agent, it was held that trover would not lie. Bromley v. Caxwell, 2 B. & P. 438. But see Doulin v. McQuade, 61 Mich. 275, where the proprietor of a skating rink was held liable for the loss of a pair of skates, which he had received from a patron and given a check for; when the plaintiff made demand for the skates, a search for them was made, but they could not be found, and he was told that they were not there, but that he could have them if they were. The court said it was the duty of the bailee to preserve the property and deliver it to the bailor, and his failure to do so, simply because he could not find it, was a conversion.

Trover may be maintained against a common carrier where the goods are delivered to the wrong person through mistake or under a forged order. Hawkins v. Hoffman, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 586; 41 Am. Dec. 767.

The defendant borrowed a double-barreled gun "to try," and in loading, he overcharged and burst it; it was held that this did not amount to a conversion, the injury being induced by an accident; and a demand of the gun in the same plight and condition as it was, etc., and a refusal to deliver it in such condition was not evidence of a conversion. Rushworth v. Taylor, 3 Q. B. 699.

In Cutter v. Fanning, 2 Iowa 580, the plaintiff's sheep by accident became mixed with the defendant's, and they were driven away to a neighboring town. It was held that, "If the defendant did not know that the sheep of the plaintiff mixed with his, he would not be liable without a demand. But though he did not know at the time of the taking, if he subsequently knew it and made no effort to separate them, the conversion would be wrongful." In Wellington v. Wentworth, 8 Met. (Mass.) 548, a cow going at large on the highway, joined a drove of cattle, without the knowledge of the owner of the drove, and was driven into New Hampshire and pastured there during the season with defendants' cattle and in the autumn returned with the drove and was delivered to plaintiff. It was held to be no conversion. But if defendant had known the cow belonged to plaintiff, the action would have been maintainable. Parker v. Lombard, 100 Mass. 405.

One who takes an estray and keeps him for the owner is not liable in trover, notwithstanding he neglects to pursue the course provided by statute for such cases. Nelson v. Merriam, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 249.

Where the plaintiff placed a bicycle with defendant for sale, and told him to use it, if necessary, and "show it to the boys" to effect a sale; and while riding with the boys broke the machine in ascending a hill, it was held not a conversion. Whittingham v. Owen, 19 D. C. 277.

Assignment of Property Subject to Lien.—Where a person assigns his interest in a chose in action, subject to a lien held by another, of which the assignee is cognizant, there is no conversion as against the holder of the lien. Comfort v. Creelman, 52 Minn. 280.

(N. Y.) 75; Richards v. Pitts. Agr. Works, 37 Hun (N. Y.) 1. And see Houghton v. Butler, 4 T. R. 364.

In Farrar v. Rollins, 37 Vt. 295, the plaintiff loaned the defendant a sled, and, upon demanding it, insisted that the defendant should carry it back to the plaintiff's house. The defendant offered to return the chattel, but refused to carry it back. It was held not a conversion.

Where the plaintiff knew where the property was, and might have taken it when he pleased, there is no conversion. Roll v. Black, Dudley (Ga.) 18.

Where no act is done, where there is no refusal to deliver and no claim of right to the property, where in truth the defendant is wholly passive, though the property is found in his possession, this does not per se subject him to an action of trover. Ragsdale v. Williams, 8 Ired. (N. Car.) 498; 49 Am. Dec. 406.

But where a bank refuses to allow stock to be transferred on its books, in accordance with a written power of attorney, thereby impairing its value to the owner, he may treat such action as a conversion of the stock and recover its value. Bank of America v. McNeil, 10 Bush (Ky.) 54.

And where B, by permission of the owner of a lot, turned his sheep into a pasture where A's sheep were pastured, and subsequently his son, by his direction and acting as his servant, removed them to another lot, and in doing so carelessly and negligently removed some of A's sheep also, and B declined, when requested by A, to assist in separating them, and his son afterwards, by his direction, removed them all to B's own farm without separating or making any effort to separate them, and B afterwards refused, on demand of A, to separate or assist in separating them, whereby A's sheep were lost to him, it was held that the latter could recover their value in a joint action of

c. HOW FAR DEFENDANT'S IGNORANCE OF PLAINTIFF'S RIGHTS A DEFENSE.—The proposition that persons deal with property in chattels or exercise dominion over them at their peril, is so well established as to have the force of a maxim in modern law.¹ And the only limitation of this principle is found in dealing with the liability of agents and servants acting innocently under the authority of a principal, in possession or actual custody of the property, but whose title is really defective.²

Generally, the capacity in which a defendant commits a wrong, can never enter as an element in the determination of his liability; therefore, an agent invested with possession, who sells or otherwise deals with the property as owner, can never justify under the authority of his principal.³ But there are circumstances where, from the nature of the agent's act, and the character of his possession, trover against B and his son. Willey v. Cox, 25 Mich. 116.

It is no defense to an action of trover that the defendant acted as servant or agent of another, who was himself a wrongdoer. McPheters v. Page, 83 Me. 234; 23 Am. St. Rep. 772. Thus, an auctioneer who, in the regular course of his business and without knowledge of the theft, sells stolen property and pays the proceeds of the sale over to the thief, from whom he received the goods, is liable in trover to the owner. Hoffman v. Carow, 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 21; aff'd 22 Wend. (N. Y.) 285; Coles v. Clark, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 399; Robinson v. Bird, 158 Mass. 357; Everett v. Coffin, 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 602; *Rogers v. Dec. 363; but the latter decision was practically overruled in Cerkel v. Waterman, 63 Cal. 34, where a commission merchant, who sold a quantity of meat, supposing it to be the property of one W., and paid him the proceeds, was held liable to the owner for conversion; and in Swim v. Wilson, 90 Cal. 126, the doctrine laid down in Rogers v. Huie, 2 Cal. 571; 44 Am. Dec. 363, was expressly disapproved, and it was held that a stock-broker who sold stolen certificates of stock indorsed in blank, which he had received for sale from the thief, and paid the latter the proceeds, was liable to the true owner for conversion and to the same effect. Anderson v. Nicholas, 5 Bosw. (N. Y.) 121.

In Koch v. Branch, 44 Mo. 542, it was held that an agent who collected the money on a United States commissionary voucher, for an innocent purchaser thereof after the voucher had been stolen, would be liable for its conversion to the original owner.

In Spooner v. Holmes, 102 Mass. 503, it was held that a broker who, in good faith, received stolen interest coupons of United States bonds, transferred them to the buyer, and paid the proceeds to his employer, could not be held liable in trover to the true owner. The court, in this case, said that the coupons did not stand upon the same ground as chattels. That they were not to be considered as goods, but as representatives of money, and subject the law absolves him from liability, although the rights of the owner are thereby infringed.¹ A servant in charge of goods upon his master's premises does not ordinarily have such possession as to the same rules as bank bills or other negotiable instruments payable in money to bearer.

One Bayley fraudulently obtained cotton from Fowler, the plaintiff; Hollins, the defendant, a broker, purchased it from Bayley in good faith, in the belief and expectation that M. one of his ordinary clients, would accept it. M. did accept it, but at the time Hollins purchased, M. had not ordered or intimated that he desired to purchase any cotton. Hollins only received from M. a broker's commission and not a trade profit on the sale. It was held, in this instance, that Hollins had made himself a principal, and, by transferring the cotton to M., had committed an act of conversion, which made him liable in trover to Fowler, the owner of the cotton. Hollins v. Fowler, L. R., 7 H. L. Cas. 757; Fowler v. Hollins, L. R., 7 Q. B. 627.

Where a cotton factor sells the crop of a tenant, under circumstances which would reasonably appraise him of the landlord's lien for rent, he will be liable to the landlord, as for a conversion of the crop. Merchants' etc., Bank v. Meyer, 56 Ark. 499. And if a commission merchant, without notice of the mortgage, sells mortgaged cattle received by him from the mortgagor, to whom he accounts for the proceeds, he will be liable to the mortgagee for conversion, for the record of the mortgage is notice to all parties. La Fayette County Bank v. Metcalf, 40 Mo. App. 494; Sprights v. Hawley, 39 N. Y. 441; 100 Am. Dec. 452; aff'g 40 Barb. (N. Y.) 397. And the same may be said of an elevator company issuing a receipt for, and transferring mortgaged wheat. Phillip Best Brewing Co. v. Pillsbury, etc., Elevator Co., 5 Dakota 62.

A bailee who, after being informed of the ownership of the property by another than the bailor, refuses to deliver it up, is guilty of conversion, although it is so intermingled with other property as to be difficult of separation. Dusky v. Rudder, 80 Mo. 400.

1. The development of this branch of the law is rather curious. It was originally held that an agent or servant could under no circumstances be held liable in trover for an act authorized by a principal or master, which infringed upon the rights of the real owner. In Mires v. Solebay, 2 Mod. 242, the court is reported to have said that, "The action would not lie against the servant, for, it being in obedience to his master's command, though he had no title, yet he shall be excused. And this rule Justice Scroggs said would extend to all cases where the master's command was not to do an apparent wrong, for if the master's case depended upon a title, be it true or not, it is enough to excuse the servant; for otherwise it would be a mischievous thing, if the servant upon all occasions must be satisfied with his master's title and right before he obey his commands, and it is very requisite if an action would lie against him for what he doth in obedience to the master." Wine v. Ryder, 2 Mod. 67; 4 Bacon's Abr. 258.

There was, however, a complete revolution from the principle of these early cases in Stephens v. Elwall, 4 M. & S. 259, founded upon the analogy of trover to trespass. In that case, a bankrupt, being possessed of certain goods, sold them after the act of bankruptcy to one Deane, to be paid for by bills on Heathcote, who had a house of trade in London and for whom Deane bought the goods. Heathcote was in America, and the defendant was his clerk and conducted the business of the house. Deane communicated to the defendant information of the purchase on the day it was made, and the goods were afterwards delivered to the defendant, who disposed of them by sending them to America to Heathcote. No demand was made upon the defendant until nearly two years after the purchase. This was held to be a conversion. Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said: "The only question is whether this is a conversion in the clerk, which was undoubtedly so in the master. The clerk acted under an unavoidable ignorance and for his master's benefit when he sent the goods to his master, but nevertheless his acts may amount to a conversion; for a person is guilty of conversion who intermeddles with my property and disposes of it, and it is no answer that he acted under authority from another, who had himself would render him liable for a refusal to deliver at the request of the owner, of whose rights he is ignorant.¹ Neither is an agent or servant liable who merely assists in a wrongful transfer of title, acting innocently in a ministerial capacity, without reference to the ownership of the goods.² If B, having a wrongful possession of A's goods, employs a broker to sell, who sells to C, and all the broker does is to send bought and sold goods to B and C, no action of trover or any other form of action can be maintained against the broker.³ Upon the same principle, a carrier who transports goods from place to place; a packer who prepares goods for shipment; a watchmaker who repairs a watch and returns it to the person who left it; a farrier who shoes a horse for a thief; a broker who simply negotiates a contract of sale, cannot be charged for assisting a wrongdoer in his conversion, if ignorant of the rights of the owner.⁴

A rule which seems to embrace all cases, and forms an accurate test, is: "One who deals with goods at the request of a person who has the actual custody of them, in the bona fide belief that the custodian is the true owner, is excused for what he does if the no authority to dispose of it. The court is governed by the principles of law and not by the hardship of any particular case." See Cranch v. White, 1 Bing. N. Cas. 414; Davies v. Vernon, 6 Q. B. 443; 51 E. C. L. 443. Also cases cited Ames' L. C. 421.

The decision in Hollins v. Fowler, L. R., 7 H. L. 757, has generally been followed in the United States.

1. In Alexander v. Southey, 5 B. & Ald. 247, the defendant had charge and kept the key, of a warehouse, for an insurance company, in which were stored the goods of the plaintiff, which had been rescued from a fire. The plaintiff demanded of the defendant the goods so deposited, and not obtaining them immediately, began an action of trover. It was held that the defendant was not liable because he had only the custody of the goods; the possession being in his employers, the insurance company. The question here was apparently one of demand and refusal; but the judgment of Holroyd, J., proceeds upon the idea that the custody of the defendant could hardly be regarded as possession of the property within the meaning of the law of trover. See Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, p. 173.

3. Brett J., L. R., 7 Q. B. 627, adopted by Lord Blackburn. Hollins v. Fowler, L. R., 7 H. L. 757.

A warehouseman who receives tobacco and sells the same on commission in the regular course of his business, without notice of any claim adverse to his consignor, cannot be held liable for conversion. Abernathy v. Wheeler, 92 Ky. 320. The warehouseman assumes an obligation to serve the entire public, and cannot refuse to receive the tobacco of a producer when shipped to him. Nash v. Page, 80 Ky. 539; 44 Am. Rep. 490.

4. Hollins v. Fowler, L. R., 7 H. L. 757. The illustrations are given and answered in the judgment of Lord Blackburn.

A carrier who removes goods from the owner's place of deposit, under the direction of a person in apparent control and able to immediately assume the actual custody of them, and delivers them to such person, is not liable to the owner for their conversion. Gurley v. Armstead, 148 Mass. 267. And see Strickland v. Barrett, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 415. But where a cartman went with B. to the stable of C. and took and carried away goods there deposited, under circumstances sufficient to put him on his guard, as to the legality of the taking, he was held to be liable in trover for the conversion of the goods. Thorpe v. Burling, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 285. And see Flanders v. Colby, 28 N. H. 34.

act is of such a nature as would be excused, if done by the authority of the person in possession, if he was the finder of the goods, or intrusted with their custody." ¹

d. ADVANTAGE TO THE DEFENDANT NOT THE TEST.—The plaintiff in the action of trover sues with respect, not to the advantage gained by the defendant from the wrongful act, but his own loss. Hence it is immaterial whether the defendant uses the property for his own profit, or confers the right to use it upon some third person. ²

It is conceived that, under some circumstances, it is not even necessary that the defendant should have acquired possession of the property; as where such force or contrivance has been used as, in the opinion of the jury, placed the owner in such a position as to prevent him from asserting his rights over the property. ³

1. This rule, furnished by Lord Blackburn, was never before distinctly enunciated until the judgment of Hollins v. Fowler, L. R., 7 H. L. 757, and is founded purely upon the technical nature of the action of trover. The test of liability seems to resolve itself into the question: Did the agent or servant have the possession of the goods and deal with it as a principal? In Alexander v. Southey, 5 B. & Ald. 247, the servant could thereby be said to have had the possession, because he kept the key of the warehouse in which the goods were stored in a capacity somewhat like a watchman of the premises, and upon this basis the judgment of Holroyd seems to proceed. The possession of the defendant in this case may be compared with the possession of the defendant in Cochrane v. Rymill, 40 L. T. 744. In that case, the plaintiff by agreement let some cabs on hire to P., who took them to the defendant, an auctioneer, and obtained an advance upon them. The defendant, by P.'s instructions and without any notice of the plaintiff's property in the goods, subsequently sold them by auction, and, having recouped himself for his advances, expenses, and commissions, handed over the balance to P. It was held a conversion.

The opposite phase of the question was presented in Turner v. Hockey, 56 L. J. Q. B. 301. The ostensible owner of a cow brought it to a public market and placed it in the pen rented by the defendant, an auctioneer, whom he instructed to sell it. The defendant, without notice that the cow was not the property of the person instructing him, sold the cow, and immediately after he received the money paid it over to the ostensible owner, the latter having previously paid him his commission. It was held that the real owner could not maintain trover against the auctioneer.

In Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, p. 171, note, it is said that the decision in Turner v. Hockey, 56 L. J. Q. B. 301, can hardly be reconciled with Cochrane v. Rymill, 40 L. T. 744.

3. See infra, this title, Taking by Duress and Fraud.

In England v. Cowley, L. R., 8 Exch. 126, the plaintiff was the holder of a bill of sale over the household furniture of a tenant of the defendant, which bill contained a clause enabling the plaintiff to take possession of and receive the furniture in case of the default of the tenant. Default was made and the plaintiff put a man in possession, and subsequently sent two men to remove the furniture. They were met by the defendant, who said he was the landlord, and as the rent was in arrear, he did not intend to permit the goods to be removed. The plaintiff thereupon went to the house himself, and was told by the defendant that he would not suffer any of the goods to be removed until his rent was paid, as he intended to distrain the next day. The defendant did not actually take possession of any of the goods. It was held that the plaintiff could not recover in trover.

Wansbrough v. Maton, 4 Ad. & El. 884; 31 E. C. L. 217, was a case where the court reached a different conclu-

The mere assertion of title to, or interest in, a chattel, however, when the claimant has neither possession nor control of it, does not constitute a conversion.¹ But it is a conversion where one having the possession, actual or constructive, asserts a title to the property antagonistic to the real owner;² or threatens violence if it is removed.³

The test, in any case, can never be what the defendant has or has not acquired; but what has been the effect of his act with respect to the plaintiff, and does it amount to an absolute denial and repudiation of the plaintiff's right.⁴

c. CONVERSION ARISING FROM CONTRACT.—The fact that the plaintiff might have brought his action ex contractu, does not prevent him from suing in trover for a conversion.⁵ Neither is the sion. There the plaintiff had occupied land belonging to the defendant, which he subsequently quitted and a new tenant entered. The plaintiff left on the land a movable barn, which he sent men to remove; but the defendant, meeting them on the ground, ordered them off. It was held that the defendant was liable, although he had not possession, actual or constructive, at the time. Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, p. 178, pointed out that in neither of these cases, was there any actual interference with the goods themselves, or any unlawful detention. See Boobier v. Boobier, 39 Me. 408; Guthrie v. Jones, 108 Mass. 191; Platner v. Johnson, 26 Miss. 142; Crocket v. Beaty, 8 Humph. (Tenn.) 20.

Assuming to one's self the property, though qualified, and right of disposing of another's goods, is a conversion, even though they are disposed of for the benefit of a third party and the defendant derives no advantage therefrom. Gilman v. Hill, 36 N. H. 311.

3. Crocket v. Beaty, 8 Humph. (Tenn.) 20.

In Hare v. Pearson, 4 Ired. (N. Car.) 76, it was held that the wrongful dominion or assumption of property in personal chattels by one who menaces the rightful owner if he attempts to take them, amounts in law to a conversion, and is not merely evidence of a conversion to be left to the jury.

4. In the case of Nelson v. Wheatmore, 1 Rich. (S. Car.) 318, it was decided that if the defendant's conduct still left the owner's rights undisputed, it was not a conversion, even though attended with damage to the owner.

Where the plaintiff purchased corn standing in the field and was proceeding to gather it, when the defendant came to the field and forbade him, and he desisted, it was held no conversion. Platner v. Johnson, 26 Miss. 142. But where a landlord, when a tenant is about to remove, during the term of the lease, chattels attached by him to the realty, but which are not fixtures, and the landlord places his hand on his shoulder and orders him to desist, and refuses a demand of the tenant for leave to remove them, and claims them as his own, he will be liable for their conversion. Guthrie v. Jones, 108 Mass. 191.

Tort," appears in 6 Harvard L. Rev., p. 223.

The defendant purchased a machine from the plaintiff, paying therefor by a promissory note. On default in payment, the seller demanded the machine from the purchaser's wife, he having left the state, and her father refused to allow the seller to take it. It was held that the father was guilty of conversion. Bolling v. Kirby, 90 Ala. 215.

Lessor and Lessee.—The absolute sale by the lessee of chattels, gives the lessor the right to avoid the lease, and trover will lie against the purchaser after a demand on the latter and a refusal on his part to surrender the property. Bryant v. Wardell, 2 Exch. 479; Sanborn v. Colman, 6 N. H. 14; 22 Am. Dec. 703; Loeschman v. Machin, 2 Stark. 311; Cooper v. Willomatt, 1 C. B. 672; 50 E. C. L. 672. But trover cannot be maintained, even on demand and refusal, where the lease contains a stipulation by the lessor to convey absolutely on the payment of a certain sum by the lessee at the end of the term, because there the purchaser is entitled to hold the property until default is made in the payment. Vincent v. Cornell, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 294; 23 Am. Dec. 683. And case and not trover is the proper remedy, where the goods are sold or removed by the wrongful act of a stranger, under color of legal process or otherwise; for such an act cannot have the effect of determining the lease. Ayer v. Bartlett, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 156; Fairbanks v. Phelps, 22 Pick. (Mass.) 535; Gordon v. Harper, 7 T. R. 9.

The right to sue in trover, or even in trespass, would seem not to be affected by mere bailment, because the present and general right of property remains in the bailor. Drake v. Redington, 9 N. H. 243; Hart v. Hyde, 5 Vt. 330; Thorp v. Burling, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 285; Root v. Chandler, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 110; 25 Am. Dec. 356; Smith v. James, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 328. See Story on Bailm. (9th ed.), p. 2.

1. The delivery of a chattel in violation of a statute, will enable the general owner to maintain an action against the vendee, for the conversion of the chattel, not under the possession so acquired, but for its use in a manner and for a purpose not contemplated in the illegal contract, and of itself amounting to a conversion. Where the plaintiff, while unlawfully traveling on the Lord's day, stopped at an inn and left a robe with the innkeeper's servant, after a demand and refusal, the next morning he was allowed to maintain an action of trover against the innkeeper for the conversion, inasmuch as the claim of the plaintiff to the property did not necessarily require him to show in its support, a violation of the Lord's day. Cox v. Cook, 14 Allen (Mass.) 165.

"The settled principle is," observed Chief Justice Parker in Dwight v. Brewster, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 50; 11 Am. Dec. 133, "that a party to an unlawful contract shall not receive the aid of the law to enforce that contract, or to compensate him for the breach of it. It is not easy to discern how a party to such a contract, who becomes possessed of the property of the other party, with which he is to do something which the law prohibits, can acquire a right to that property. The contract being void, the property is not changed, if it remains in the hands of him to whom it is committed. If he has executed the contract with it, or if it has become forfeited by judicial process, or if stolen or lost without his fault, he may defend himself against any demand of the owner in ordinary cases; but if he has it in his possession, he must be liable for the value of it; so that in an action of trover, with proper evidence of a conversion, the plaintiff would undoubtedly prevail." King v. Green, 6 Allen (Mass.) 139; Ladd v. Rogers, 11 Allen (Mass.) 209; Scarfe v. Morgan, 4 M. & W. 270; Myers v. Meinrath, 101 Mass. 366; 3 Am. Rep. 368.

2. Where chattels are delivered to an infant for a fixed purpose, and he uses them in a manner inconsistent with or contrary to that purpose, he is liable in trover for the conversion of the chattels, although if sued upon in contract, his infancy would be a valid defense. Furness v. Smith, 1 Roll. Abr. 530. In Bunard v. Haggis, 14 C. B. N. S. 45; 108 E. C. L. 45, the defendant hired a mare for a ride along the road, being expressly told by the plaintiff that she was not fit for leaping. The defendant loaned the mare to a friend and the latter put it to a fence, and in taking it she fell upon a stake, from the effects of which she died. It was held that the defendant was liable in trover, independently of the contract. Byles, J., said: "Here the mare was lent for a specific purpose of a ride along the road and for the purpose of being ridden only by the defendant. The defendant not only allows his friend to mount, but allows him to put the mare to a fence for which he was told she was unfit. Quite independently, therefore, of the question of necessities, the defendant is responsible for the wrong done."

2. Conversion by Detention—a. IN GENERAL.—While a mere detention, without more, was sufficient to support an action of detinue, the action of trover required that the defendant not only detain the property, but accompany the detention with a claim of right as against the plaintiff. The intention of the defendant here becomes an element in the determination of his liability. The customary method of proving intention is by a demand and refusal.¹

The American courts have generally adopted the English rule just stated in its entirety. Redfield, J., in Town v. Wiley, 23 Vt. 355, declared that so long as the defendant kept within the terms of the bailment, his infancy was a protection to him, whether he neglected to take proper care of the chattels or used them immoderately. But when he departs from the object of the bailment, it amounts to a conversion of the property, as if he had taken the horse in the first instance without permission, and it was accordingly held that an infant, in whose hands money had been put by the plaintiff to abide the result of an illegal wager, and who paid it to the winner after notice from the plaintiff not to do so, was liable in trover. Lewis v. Littlefield, 15 Me. 233; Loeschman v. Mackin, 2 Stark. 276; Deane v. Keate, 3 Camp. 4; Cooper v. Burton, 3 Camp. 5; Jones on Ballm. 86; Bray v. Mayne, Gow 1; Farrar v. Thompson, 5 B. & Ald. 826.

The cases seem to support the following distinction: Where the chattel is used in a manner inconsistent with the spirit of the contract of bailment, as in the ordinary case of where a horse is driven beyond the distance agreed upon in the contract, the bailee or lessee is liable in trover to the owner. But where the chattel is used for a purpose assented to by the owner and agreed upon in the contract, an immoderate use of the chattel, which results in its destruction, is an injury which can be redressed only in an action of trespass on the case. Fisher v. Kyle, 27 Mich. 454; Fish v. Ferris, 5 Duer (N. Y.) 49; Disbrow v. Ten Broeck, 4 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 397; Woodman v. Hubbard, 25 N. H. 67; 7 Am. Dec. 310; Angus v. Dickerson, Meigs (Tenn.) 459; Horsely v. Branch, 1 Humph. (Tenn.) 199; Mullen v. Ensley, 8 Humph. (Tenn.) 428; Bell v. Cummings, 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 275; Parker v. Thompson, 5 Sneed (Tenn.) 349; M'Neill v. Brooks, 1 Yerg. (Tenn.) 73.

In Spooner v. Manchester, 133 Mass. 270; 43 Am. Rep. 514, there was a curious modification of this principle. The defendant hired a horse to go to a particular place and unintentionally took a wrong road. Discovering his mistake, he endeavored to return by the best road, which was by a circuit through another town. It was held that there had been no conversion.

In Pennsylvania, the courts have invariably refused to recognize the doctrine which would make an infant liable in tort for a possession acquired under a contract which, if sued upon, his infancy would be a defense. In Penrose v. Curren, 3 Rawle (Pa.) 351; 24 Am. Dec. 356, Rodgers, J., said, that the foundation of all these suits is contract, and disguise it as you may, it is but an attempt to convert a suit originally in contract into a constructive tort, so as to charge the infant. Wilt v. Welsh, 6 Watts (Pa.) 9; Livingston v. Cox, 6 Pa. St. 360; Cooley on Torts, 125. And see INFANTS, vol. 10, p. 668.

1. Much that would otherwise be treated of here, may be found in DEMAND, vol. 5, p. 528r. In the leading case of Baldwin v. Cole, 6 Mod. 212, a carpenter sent his servant to work for hire in the queen's yard; and having been there for some time he would go no more. The surveyor of the work refused to let him have his tools, pretending a usage to retain tools to enforce workmen to continue until the queen's work was done. Upon proof of a demand and refusal, it was held, a conversion. Watkins v. Wooly, Gow 69; Davies v. Nicholas, 7 C. & P. 339; 32 E. C. L. 533; McCormick v. Pennsylvania Cent. R. Co., 49 N. Where the defendant had the right to detain certain brandy by virtue of a lien, but insisted upon his right to detain the property upon other grounds, it was held by Lord Ellenborough, to be a conversion. "As the brandy was detained on a different ground, and as no demand for warehouse rent had been made, the defendant must be taken to have waived his lien, if he had one, which would admit of some doubt." Boardman v. Sill, 1 Camp. 410.

A tenant having the right to remove fixtures placed by him upon the de-mised premises during the term, in case he holds over after its termina-tion without a new lease, has the same right of removal so long as he remains in possession, and on being evicted by summary proceedings, if he claims and is refused the right to take such fix-tures with him, may maintain an ac-tion for their conversion. Lewis v. Ocean Nav., etc., Co., 125 N. Y. 341. And see Adams v. Goddard, 48 Me. 212; Bircher v. Parker, 43 Mo. 443.

Where a bank, with which the treas-urer of a corporation had deposited bonds belonging to his company as se-curity for a personal debt, after being informed that the bonds belonged to the corporation and that the treasurer had no right to pledge them, asserted its authority to retain them and to ap-ply the proceeds of their sale to the satisfaction of its debt, it was held that the assertion of such authority was in itself a conversion, and that proof of formal demand and refusal were un-necessary. University of North Caro-lina v. State Nat. Bank, 96 N. Car. 280.

Detention Under a Lien.—Where, by agreement between a landlord and tenant, the former is to retain possession of the latter's part of the crop until all his advances are paid, a demand and refusal before full payment does not establish a conversion by the landlord. Hudson v. Goff, 77 Ga. 281. But where the plaintiff offers to pay the charges and demands the goods, it is a conver-sion to detain them. Wagenblast v. McKean, 2 Grant Cas. (Pa.) 393. And see Coller v. Shepard, 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 305; Whitcomb v. Hungerford, 42 Barb. (N. Y.) 177; Parkerson v. Simons, 2 McMull. (S. Car.) 188.

But where one having a lien sets up a right hostile to the owner, he cannot afterwards set up the lien as a bar to an action against him. Andrews v. Wade (Pa. 1886), 6 Atl. Rep. 48. And see Williams v. Smith, 153 Pa. St. 462; Bean v. Bolton, 3 Phila. (Pa.) 87; West v. Tupper, 1 Bailey (S. Car.) 193.

Refusal to Pay Over Money Received for Another.—A person receiving money for another, on refusing to pay it over until a debt due him by the lat-ter is paid, is guilty of conversion. Richmond v. Soportas (City Ct.), 18 N. Y. Supp. 433. And the same is the case if he withholds sufficient to pay the debt. Tobin v. Kage (Supreme Ct.), 19 N. Y. Supp. 440.

Detention by Co-Owner.—Where one

The detention may be either by the defendant or by his agents or servants, and if by the latter, they will also be liable for conversion, for ignorance of a master's want of title does not excuse a servant.¹

b. DEMAND AND REFUSAL EVIDENCE OF CONVERSION.—Proof of a demand properly made by the plaintiff or his agent, and a refusal to deliver by the defendant, is evidence of a conversion. The principle rests upon the idea that the law regards it as highly probable that, if one person detains the property of another and refuses to deliver it to the owner upon request, the intention of the detainer is to exercise a dominion in defiance of the owner's right.²

of the owners of grain detains it in his possession, refusing to allow his co-owner to sever and take away his share, he is liable for conversion. Channon v. Lusk, 2 Lans. (N. Y.) 211. And see Loddell v. Stowell, 51 N. Y. 70; Bray v. Bray, 30 Mich. 479.

Surrender of Pledge on Payment of Debt.—The failure to surrender stock pledged, on payment of the debt secured by it, is a conversion, and where $18,000 worth of stock was pledged to secure a debt of $8,000, upon payment of which the pledgee refused to return the stock, and afterwards set up the defense that $37 interest due, which both had overlooked at the time, was neither paid nor tendered, it was held that the defense was of no avail, the maxim de minimis non curat lex being applied. Kullman v. Greenebaum, 92 Cal. 403. And see Abrahams v. Southwestern, etc., Bank, 1 S. Car. 441; 7 Am. Rep. 33.

Effect of a Demand as to Time of Conversion.—A demand and a refusal is not only evidence to prove a conversion at the time the demand is made, but it may be made the basis of an inference from which the jury may find a conversion any time prior to the demand and during the defendant's possession. In Wilton v. Girdlestone, 3 B. & Ald. 847; 7 E. C. L. 278, it was held that a demand and refusal was evidence of a prior conversion, and therefore where deeds were in the defendant's possession, prior to Michaelmas Term, and the demand and refusal proved were on the day after that term, it was held that this was evidence of a conversion before the term, to be determined by the jury.

1. Doty v. Hawkins, 6 N. H. 247; 25 Am. Dec. 459; State v. Stevenson, 46 N. J. L. 326; Judah v. Kemp, 2 Johns.

But the refusal of a bailee to deliver up the article on the demand of a third person who has authority from the bailor to demand it, but who gives no evidence of such authority, does not amount to a conversion. Beckley v. Howard, 2 Brev. (S. Car.) 94; Dowd v. Wadsworth, 2 Dev. (N. Car.) 130; 18 Am. Dec. 567. But unless he demands evidence of authority at the time the demand is made on him for the goods, he cannot afterwards, in an action against him, object that the demandant did not exhibit the evidence of his title. Holbrook v. Wight, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 169; 35 Am. Dec. 607. A bailee who claims no property in himself, but only asks for time to surrender the goods to his bailor, is not guilty of conversion. Dowd v. Wadsworth, 2 Dev. (N. Car.) 130; 18 Am. Dec. 567. Nor where he requests an order from his bailor, or reasonable time to confer with his partner. Carroll v. Mix, 51 Barb. (N. Y.) 212; or requests time to ascertain the ownership. Singer Mfg. Co. v. King, 14 R. I. 511.

2. See DEMAND, vol. 5, p. 528r; Pollock on Torts, p. 169; Fry v. Clow, 50 Hun (N. Y.) 574; Moore v. Prentiss Tool, etc., Co. (Super. Ct.), 15 N. Y. Supp. 150; Dozier v. Pillot, 79 Tex. 224.

It is upon the principle that a demand and refusal is only evidence of a conversion, that a finding of that fact by a jury in a special verdict without more, is insufficient to support the action. Eason v. Newman, Cro. Eliz.

c. PROPERTY MUST BE IN DEFENDANT'S POSSESSION.—Failure to deliver goods upon demand is no evidence of a conversion, where it appears that they were not in the defendant's possession at the time the demand was made, and that, had he so minded, he could not have delivered them.¹

495; Chancellor of Oxford's Case, 10 Rep. 56b; Isaac v. Clark, 2 Buls. 308; Morris v. Pugh, 3 Burr. 1243; Cutter v. Fanning, 2 Iowa 580; Hill v. Coverell, 1 N. Y. 522.

It was said by Lord Holt, in a very early case, that, "The very denial of goods to him that hath the right to demand them, is an actual conversion, not only evidence of it; for what is a conversion but the assuming upon one's-self the property and right of disposing of another's goods." Baldwin v. Cole, 6 Mod. 212. It is upon the assumption that the denial in the case before him was absolute and unexplained, that the statement is based. Morris v. Pugh, 3 Burr. 1243. A conversion is proved by evidence, that the president of a corporation having possession of the plaintiff's property, instructed the manager, upon demand being made upon him for the property, not to deliver it, claiming title in the company. Campan v. Bemis, 35 Ill. App. 37.

Where the plaintiff's agent told the defendant that the team in his possession was claimed by the plaintiff and that he demanded the same, producing a paper by virtue of which he made the demand and which he read to the defendant, it was held a sufficient demand, though the paper was ambiguous and at the trial required parol proof as to its meaning. Kendrick v. Beard, 90 Mich. 589.

Where furniture was left under a contract for repairs, the plaintiff, after waiting a reasonable time for them to be made, is not bound, as a condition precedent to demand before bringing an action for conversion, to tender the money that would have been due had the defendant performed his contract. Phillips v. McNab, 16 Daly (N. Y.) 150.

Though the defendant be unable to deliver through the action of the plaintiff, as where the defendant requested the plaintiff to remove ice purchased by the latter from his ice house, as he wished to house the new crop, and the plaintiff told him to go ahead and put the new crop in over his ice, which he did, if afterwards, upon demand being made, he base his refusal, not upon his inability to deliver, but upon a claim of title in himself, he will be liable for conversion. Hartford Ice Co. v. Greenwood's Co., 61 Conn. 166.

When Demand Necessary.—Where the only question is as to whether a delivery by a carrier of the plaintiff's goods to a third person was rightful or wrongful, a demand upon them for the return of the goods is unnecessary. Fulton v. Lydecker (City Ct.), 17 N. Y. Supp. 451. And where the defendant was a trespasser in taking away the goods, no demand is necessary. Clink v. Gunn, 90 Mich. 135. Where there is an actual conversion of the property, demand before action is unnecessary. Baker v. Lothrop, 155 Mass. 376; Knipper v. Blumenthal, 107 Mo. 665; First Nat. Bank v. Kickbusch, 78 Wis. 218. Where a sheriff attaches mortgaged property at the suit of the mortgagor's creditors, who claim that the mortgage is fraudulent, the mortgagee need not demand the goods of the officer before suing him in trover for the value of the mortgage lien. Malachiski v. Stellwagen, 85 Mich. 41.

In Ross v. Johnson, 5 Burr. 2825, goods belonging to the plaintiff were delivered by the captain of a vessel to the defendant as wharfingers, for the use and account of the plaintiff, but were lost or stolen out of their possession. A demand was made before the commencement of this action and the wharfage tendered, but the goods were not delivered to him. Lord Mansfield said: "This is not to be esteemed a refusal to deliver goods. They cannot deliver them. It is not in their power to do it. It is a bare omission."

The fact that he claims the goods will not, in such case, amount to a

d. PROPERTY IN CUSTODIA LEGIS.—Where goods are in custodia legis, as under an attachment proceeding by a sheriff, although in the actual custody of the defendant, and upon his premises, a demand and refusal is no evidence of a conversion, since the defendant could not deliver without a breach of the law.¹ But where goods in the custody of a warehouseman have changed ownership, and are subsequently attached as the property of a former owner, for the purposes of the law of trover, such conversion, nor will the fact of his giving an undertaking, to prevent the delivery of the property by the sheriff, to the plaintiff in an action brought to recover the possession, operate as an estoppel in pais. Andrews v. Shattuck, 32 Barb. (N. Y.) 396.

1. See DEMAND, vol. 5, p. 528^a. Mires v. Solebay, 2 Mod. 242; Jenner v. Joliffe, 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 381.

A carrier in whose hands property is attached, cannot be held liable for conversion for refusing to deliver it to the owner. Stiles v. Davis, 1 Black (U. S.) 101. The action does not lie against one who, as a magistrate, has the custody of papers which have been used in evidence in a pending suit, and have been placed on file. Greene v. Mead, 18 N. H. 505.

In an action of trover for a chaise, it appeared that one B. had hired the chaise in question from the plaintiff and had placed it at livery with the defendant, and that whilst it was in the defendant's possession, it was attached by process out of the sheriff's court as the property of B. The plaintiff demanded the chaise, but the defendant, alleging that it had been attached, refused to deliver. It was held that there was no evidence of a conversion by the defendant, the chaise being at the time of the demand in the custody of the law and not the defendant. Verrall v. Robinson, 2 C. M. & R. 495.

In Catterall v. Kenyon, 3 Q. B. 310; 43 E. C. L. 749, certain cattle of the plaintiff had been wrongfully taken in execution by means of process directed against the goods of her father, and lodged by the attaching officer in the stable of an inn. The plaintiff demanded them several times of the wife of the defendant, who refused to deliver them. It was held that the facts did not show that the goods were in the custody of the law, per Lord Denman. The learned judges who decided that case (Verrall v. Robinson, 2 C. M. & R. 495), thought that the chattel was in the custody of the law, and that the defendant was not at liberty to give it up. The particular article being attached by process, the defendant held it as servant of the law and would not have been justified in surrendering it. Here the officers, being authorized only to seize the goods of A B, had seized the goods of C D. The owner claimed them of defendant, and she at first took time for consideration, but ultimately said: "I am told I shall be borne harmless and I will keep them." That is sufficient to make the husband and wife liable in trover. See Jenner v. Joliffe, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 381. This was an action of trespass on the case. The declaration contained four counts, the first and second of which were in trover for a quantity of oak timber. It appeared that the defendant, an officer of the court, had attached certain timber, and kept it so negligently that it became worthless. It was resolved at the outset that trover would not lie for goods seized by virtue of legal process and held in the custody of the law.

A bailee of chattels, without the knowledge or consent of the owner, mortgaged them to secure rent, and the rent remaining unpaid, they were seized by the landlord, with a view to a foreclosure of the mortgage. The owner of the property replevied the property and placed it back in the possession of the original bailee, and while so in the custody of the latter, pending the proceeding in replevin, were again seized by the landlord under a distress. It was held that the property, when placed in the hands of the bailee, under the writ of replevin, was in the custody of the law, and its seizure by the landlord under his distress warrant was wrongful, so that the owner could maintain trover without a demand. Hardy v. Keeler, 56 Ill. 152; Black v. Cleasby, 97 Cal. 482.

In Garabaldi v. Wright, 52 Ark. 416, an action was maintained for goods in the custody of a chancery court in a suit property is not regarded as being within the custody of the law, and their custodian is not justified in refusing to deliver them to the real owner.¹

Process directed to A, the custodian of the goods of B, informing him that B's goods are attached, will not justify A in detaining goods belonging to C, merely because the server of the process tells him that those particular goods form the subject of the attachment. In such a case there can be no custody of the law.²

e. DEMAND DOES NOT WAIVE ACTUAL CONVERSION.—If there has been a tortious use or taking of a chattel, which of itself amounts to a conversion, a subsequent demand will not amount to a waiver of the right to sue for an actual conversion.³

f. TENDER SUBSEQUENT TO DEMAND AND REFUSAL.—Where the refusal is absolute and unexplained it is plenary evidence of a conversion.⁴ But where the character of the refusal is doubtful, the evidence which results from an unsuccessful demand is neutralized to some extent by a subsequent demand and the defendant's then offering to surrender the property.⁵

3. Conversion by Purchase.—It is no defense to an action of trover that the defendant is a purchaser for value, and without notice of the rights of the real owner.⁶ It is fundamentally clear that a between the same parties, as such action did not interfere with the possession of the property.

5. The evidence of conversion is very much affected by a subsequent demand and the defendant's then offering to surrender the property. Manwell v. Briggs, 17 Vt. 176. If the taking is willful, or the refusal to surrender is willful and unqualified, or the property has suffered injury or deteriorated in value, the defendant cannot compel the plaintiff to accept the property in mitigation of damages. Hart v. Skinner, 16 Vt. 138; 42 Am. Dec. 500; Green v. Sperry, 16 Vt. 390; 42 Am. Dec. 519. The plaintiff may claim damages for their deterioration. Shotwell v. Wendover, 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 65. But if the property came lawfully into the defendant's hands, and the refusal was qualified or the conversion not willful, it would seem that the defendant may compel an acceptance in mitigation of damages. Wells v. Kelsey, 15 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 53; Pickering v. Truste, 7 T. R. 53; Hayward v. Seaward, 1 Moore & S. 459; 28 E. C. L. 459. In this last case, the defendants refused to deliver a boiler until a sum of money due them was paid. The plaintiffs would not pay this sum, but made tender of a smaller amount, which the defendants refused. Subsequently the defendants offered to restore the boiler, and resorted to an action to recover what was due them; it was held no conversion.

If, after demand and refusal, the defendant, before suit is brought, unconditionally offers to deliver the possession, the plaintiff, although he cannot maintain an action for the possession, may yet have his action for the damages for refusing to deliver when demanded. Savage v. Perkins, 11 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 17. The return of the chattel will only go in mitigation of damages. Sparks v. Purdy, 11 Mo. 219.

In this last case it is said, that the doctrine that possession carries with it the evidence of property so as to protect one acquiring property in the usual course of trade, is limited to cash, bank bills and bills payable to bearer.

But in an action for the conversion of railroad ties, both parties claiming as purchasers from a third party, an instruction which ignores the necessity of the plaintiff's possession, as required by the Statute of Frauds, is erroneous. Thomas v. Ramsey, 47 Mo. App. 84.

One who, without notice and in the absence of any representation to mislead him, purchases the husband's property from the wife, will be liable to the former in trover. Rice v. Yocum, 155 Pa. St. 538; 32 W. N. C. (Pa.) 356.

If the purchaser knows of the claim of another to the property, he is so much the more guilty of conversion. Allison v. King, 25 Iowa 56; Babcock v. Gill, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 287.

Where the purchase is for the joint account of two, and after being informed of the ownership of a third party, one of the joint purchasers sells the goods for the benefit of the joint account, both are liable for the conversion. Guerry v. Kerton, 2 Rich. (S. Car.) 507.

It is immaterial that the purchaser acted in good faith and afterward parted with the goods before any demand was made upon him. Carter v. Kingman, 103 Mass. 517.

A plaintiff consigned a carload of potatoes to an agent who had no authority to sell, but was to deliver them to a purchaser as demanded. A third party, to whom the plaintiff was indebted, purchased them of the agent with knowledge of the facts, and sold them to the original purchaser and credited the plaintiff with the amount received, after paying the agent for freight, etc., and his own expenses. The original purchaser had knowledge of all the facts, and it was held that all the parties to the transaction were jointly liable for the conversion, and that the original purchaser, having abandoned the contract of the plaintiff and purchased of the third party to assist him in collecting his debt, could not be heard to say that he purchased them from the plaintiff and that his only liability was in contract. Kavanaugh v. Taylor, 2 Ind. App. 502.

If, after the purchase of goods in satisfaction of a debt, the purchaser is informed that his debtor holds the goods only as factor, his subsequent taking of them away is a conversion. Scriber v. Masten, 11 Cal. 303.

Lien on Crops—Liability of Purchaser.—One purchasing crops from a tenant for value and without notice of the landlord's lien allowed by Illinois Rev. St. ch. 80, p. 31, is not liable to the landlord for their conversion. Finney v. Harding, 136 Dec. 573, reversing 32 Ill. App. 98. And see Thew v. Miller, 73 Iowa 742.

So where a wharfinger sold certain lead intrusted to his care, without any authority from the owner, to an inno-

4. A striking illustration of the truth of this statement is to be found in the case of Hollins v. Fowler, L. R., 7 H. L. Cas. 757; L. R., 7 Q. B. 616. A. fraudulently obtained cotton from the plaintiff; the defendant, a broker, purchased it from A. in good faith in the belief and expectation that M., one of his ordinary clients, would accept it. M. had not ordered or intimated that he desired to purchase any cotton. The defendant only received from M. a broker's commission, and not a trade profit on the sale. It was held that the defendant was liable for the conversion. In the opinion of the House of Lords, Lord Blackburn declared that the plaintiff was not limited to an action against the defendant, but that he might with propriety have sued A., the original wrongdoer—M., the intention of asserting some right or dominion over them, is guilty of a conversion.¹ The defendant need not assert an absolute purchaser; and it was even doubted whether the yarners and pickers in the mill operated by M., where the cotton was worked into yarn, were not also liable.

But where a creditor receives in pledge the goods of another, supposing them to belong to the debtor, and afterwards permits the debtor to sell and deliver them on the promise of the buyer to pay him the purchase price towards the discharge of his debt for which they were pledged, he does not thereby render himself liable to the true owner in an action of trover. *Leonard v. Where a title has passed under a contract of sale, which provided that the purchase price should be secured by a mortgage, the seller is liable for conversion if he enters and takes the property during the buyer's absence, the latter being ready and willing to execute the mortgage. *Washburn v. Where a clerk, left in a store in the absence of the owner, permitted an alleged creditor to enter without process, and, without the owner's knowledge, sell the stock and close out the concern, it was held to be a conversion by the creditor for which trover could be maintained by the owner without demand. Bane v. Detrick, 52 Ill. 19.

So where the defendant, on applying to A for the loan of a horse, was told that he had none, but that the defendant might take the plaintiff's, and the plaintiff being absent, the defendant took the horse, knowing that A had no authority to lend him, the defendant was held liable for conversion upon the horse being accidentally killed while in his possession. *Childress v. Where by a contract between a landlord and tenant, the latter was to prepare cotton for market as rapidly as it could be reasonably done, by picking and carrying it to whatever gin the landlord might select, the title to all the cotton to remain in the landlord until the tenant's indebtedness to him should be paid, the landlord, on ascertaining that seven or eight thousand pounds of cotton had been gathered and stored in the gin house, requested the tenant to have it packed and sent to market, in order that his indebtedness might be paid, also for fear the gin house might be burned. The tenant refused until he had first gathered the entire crop. It was held that no conversion of the property by the tenant was shown which would authorize a recovery in trover. *Forehand v. title; it is sufficient if his intention is to acquire a special property.¹

b. DISTINCTION BETWEEN CONVERSION AND TRESPASS.—Every conversion consists of—First: A dealing with the goods in a manner inconsistent with the right of the person entitled to the immediate possession; Second: An intention in so doing to deny his right, or assert a dominion which is inconsistent with such right.²

While the intention of the wrongdoer can never alter the effect of his act, it may determine its character and the measure of his liability. To take another's goods without his consent is always a trespass, regardless of how honest the taker's intention may be. But a mere taking, without more, is never a conversion unless there is an intention in the taker to assert a right of property.³

Finding Lost Property.—One finding lost property and refusing to surrender it may be held liable for conversion. Sovern v. Yoran, 15 Oregon 644.

Mistake of Servant in Cutting Timber.—Where the defendant contracted with a laborer to cut timber for him on his own land, and the laborer, by mistake, cut it from the land of the plaintiff, the defendant was held liable in trover for converting it to his own use, although he supposed it was cut on his own land. Benton v. Beattie, 63 Vt. 186. And see Lee v. McKay, 3 Ired. (N. Car.) 29. And in Donahue v. Shippee, 15 R. I. 453, it was held that the laborer who made the mistake was guilty of conversion.

Taking Property by a Soldier.—A soldier in the confederate army who took a horse from a federal soldier, the latter's private property, sold it and applied the proceeds to his own use, was held liable to the owner for conversion. Barnhill v. Phillips, 4 Coldw. (Tenn.) 1.

Supp. 579, where mortgaged property was purchased under an agreement by the mortgagee to release the mortgage, but who afterwards foreclosed the mortgage and sold the property.

Taking under color of a license which has been revoked, is a conversion. Holland v. Osgood, 8 Vt. 281. Roe*, 1 Sid. 264. Thus, where a toll of corn had been customarily taken by dipping into the sack so as to bring out a certain quantity, and the collector varied from the proper mode by sweeping instead of lifting the toll, so as to take more, it was held that trover lay against him for the excess. *Norman v. 3. For example, if A B become possessed of the personal chattels of C D by finding, and subsequently lose them, or be deprived of them, he is not thereby guilty of a conversion, because he does not, in either case, treat the goods as if they were his own. Bacon's

On the other hand, if there is a use or any act done with respect to the property taken, inconsistent with the owner's rights, it is a conversion, despite the taker's intention.¹

Abr., "Trover" (B); 1 Leon. 223; Vandrink v. Archer, 1 Roll. Abr. 6 (L), pl. 4.

As long as the owner's right is recognized and nothing is done inconsistent with such ownership, no claim asserted, nor act of appropriation committed, the alleged wrongful force does not amount to a conversion. Wilson v. McLaughlin, 107 Mass. 587; Nelson v. Merriam, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 249.

Tobin v. Deal, 60 Wis. 87; 50 Am. Rep. 345, would seem contrary to the principle that it is not conversion when force is employed with no purpose to deprive the proprietor of his rights of ownership, temporarily or permanently. This was an action for the wrongful conversion of four calves belonging to the plaintiff. On the trial, the defendant testified, among other things, that after having taken the calves in the afternoon while they were doing damage on his premises, he kept them confined during the night and in the morning turned them into the highway; that they fed about two hours in front of his house, and then went up on a cross-road further from the plaintiff's premises; that afterwards, while he was driving away some stray pigs, he scared the calves and they ran along with the pigs in the direction opposite plaintiff's land, and went into the field of one P. The plaintiff, on searching for the calves, was unable to find them. The lower court decided in favor of the defendant and the plaintiff appealed from the judgment. Upon appeal, the supreme court reversed this judgment, on the ground of an alleged erroneous charge by the lower court regarding the question of intent in defendant. The propriety of the form of action does not appear to have been questioned. From the standpoint of reason and authority, it seems that it should not have been trover.

1. In Fouldes v. Willoughby, 8 M. & W. 540, the plaintiff had embarked with two horses on the defendant's ferry boat and paid for their passage; subsequently the defendant without justification refused to carry out his contract, and desired the plaintiff to remove the horses from the ferry boat, which he refused to do. The defendant

then took them from the plaintiff and turned them loose on the landing, whereby they were lost. The jury were directed that this was a conversion. Upon appeal the verdict was set aside. Lord Abinger, C. B., said: "It is a proposition familiar to all lawyers, that a simple asportation of a chattel, without any intention of making any further use of it, although it may be a sufficient foundation for an action of trespass, is not sufficient to establish a conversion. I had thought that the matter had been fully discussed, and this distinction established, by the numerous cases which have occurred on this subject; but, according to the argument put forward by the plaintiff's counsel to-day, a bare asportavit is a sufficient foundation to support an action of trover. I entirely dissent from this argument; and therefore, I think that the learned judge was wrong in telling the jury that the simple fact of putting these horses on shore by the defendant amounted to a conversion of them to his own use. In my opinion, he should have added to his direction, that it was for them to consider what was the intention of the defendant in so doing. If the object, and whether rightfully or wrongfully entertained is immaterial, simply was to induce the plaintiff to go on shore himself, and the defendant, in furtherance of that object, did the act in question, it was not exercising over the horses any right inconsistent with, or adverse to, the rights which the plaintiff had in them. Suppose, instead of the horses, the defendant had put the plaintiff himself on shore, and on being put on shore the plaintiff had refused to take his horses with him, and the defendant had said he would take them to the other side of the water, and had done so, would that be a conversion? That would be a much more colorable case of a conversion than the present, because, by separating the man from his property, it might, with some appearance of fairness, be said the party was carrying away the horses without any justifiable reason for so doing. Then, having conveyed them across the water, and finding neither the owner or anyone else to receive them, what is he to do with them? Suppose,

Intention serves only to determine, where there has been a wrongful taking, and no apparent further act towards the chattel, whether the wrongdoer has committed a trespass or a conversion. It follows, therefore, that under such circumstances, the owner may always sue in trespass where there has been a conversion by wrongful taking, but it is not true that whenever trover will lie, trespass may be maintained.¹

c. TAKING NEED NOT BE ACTUAL.—There may be a symbolical taking, as where the defendant takes by assignment from one who has no title, thereby acquiring a right with respect to the property, which hinders or prevents the real owner from obtaining possession. Any indorsement of a document of title or a transfer on the books of a warehouseman which vests in the transferee the control, or right to control the property, and which is effectual to deprive the owner of his right of possession, is a conversion.²

under those circumstances, the defendant lands them, and leaves them on shore, would that amount to a conversion? The argument of the plaintiff's counsel in this case must go the length of saying that it would. Then, suppose the reply to be that those circumstances would amount to a conversion, I ask, at what period of time did the conversion take place? Suppose the plaintiff had immediately followed his horses, when they were put on shore, and resumed possession of them, would there be a conversion of them in that case? I apprehend, clearly not. It has been argued that the mere touching and taking them by the bridle would constitute a conversion, but surely that cannot be; if the plaintiff had immediately gone on shore and taken possession of them, there would be no conversion."

1. There seems to have been some doubt prior to the decision just quoted, as to whether, when trespass for taking goods would lie, trover would also lie. In Bishop v. Montague, Cro. Eliz. 824, beasts were taken absolutely by the defendant's bailiff as for a heriot due, the defendant afterwards agreeing to the taking and converting them. The court differed in opinion as to whether trover was maintainable, or whether the action should not have been trespass.

In Bacon's Abr., "Trover" (A), it is said: "It is said if J. S. takes the goods of D. N. unlawfully, this is a conversion, such a taking being a disposing of the goods as if they were the goods of J. S." Such indeed seems to have been the well-defined rule of the common law, and in Bruen v. Roe, 1 Sid. 264, it was resolved that an actual taking of the goods of another is sufficient to support trover without evidence of a demand. It is settled at the present time, both in England and in the United States, that a mere taking without more is insufficient to support trover. Sparks v. Purdy, 11 Mo. 219; Eldridge v. Adams, 54 Barb. (N. Y.) 417. See also Jordan v. Greer, 5 Sneed (Tenn.) 165.

So in Tucker v. Housatonic R. Co., 39 Conn. 447, where the plaintiffs forwarded some grain over the defendant's railroad in a sealed car, which was not to be opened until it reached its place of destination. The defendant, for his own convenience, opened the car and transferred the grain to another car. For this reason, upon its arrival, the plaintiff refused to receive the consignment, and brought trover against the defendant for the grain. It was held that the action would not lie. Foster, J., said: "If the arrangement between the parties was such that the plaintiff was entitled to have his grain go through in a blue car, a change of the property from one car to another for the convenience of the defendant would not be a conversion."

2. In McComble v. Davis, 6 East 538, the defendant advanced money to a broker upon a quantity of tobacco in the king's warehouse, taking an assignment from him of the tobacco and having it transferred to his own name. The broker, in fact, had bought the tobacco for the plaintiff, but the defendant had no knowledge of the transaction and his dealings with the

The mere transfer, however, of a document of title to personal property in the possession of a third person, without any other interference with the chattel, is not, as against the owner of the property, a conversion by either the person giving or receiving such document.¹

d. TAKING POSSESSION OF PREMISES UPON WHICH GOODS ARE DEPOSITED.—Bare entry and assumption of dominion over premises upon which are the goods of a former tenant, is no evidence of a conversion, where the entry is lawful. If the owner, however, comes and demands the property, or enters quietly upon the land with his servants, and attempts to remove it, and the person in possession prevents the removal, he is liable.²

The rule is, that if the entry of the defendant was lawful, it is broker were bona fide, under the belief that he owned the tobacco and it stood in the broker's name in the warehouse, being so entered by the broker without the plaintiff's knowledge. A rule of the warehouse prevented the removal of property therein except by the person in whose name it was warehoused. The defendant declined to deliver to plaintiff without the broker's order and payment of advances. The court held that this was a conversion, although in fact the defendant had never had the tobacco in his possession, because by the assignment he controlled its delivery from the warehouse. Hiort v. Bott, L. R., 9 Exch. 86; Johnson v. Stear, 15 C. B. N. S. 338; 109 E. C. L. 330; Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, p. 169.

To constitute a conversion, the party need not have the exclusive control or manucaption of the goods; the term embraces, in its legal import, any intermeddling with, or dominion over the property of another, subversive to the rights of the true owner; as if the defendants are actually present, aiding and assisting another in the unlawful design of removing the plaintiff's slaves from the state, with the intention of wrongfully depriving him of them, each act in furtherance of the common design is the act of all, and all are guilty. Freeman v. Scurlock, 27 Ala. 407. No manual taking or removal is necessary. Dickey v. Franklin Bank, 32 Me. 572.

1. In Fuller v. Tabor, 39 Me. 519, the plaintiff brought trover for a building which had been placed on the land of another by his consent. The defendant, when a demand was made, said he had bought it and paid for it. The court instructed the jury that taking a quitclaim of the land and building and putting it on record, would not of itself constitute a conversion on the part of the individual so receiving the deed.

Upon the same principle, the mere giving of a deed of land, the lessee continuing in quiet possession, will not be deemed a conversion of fixtures which the lessee has the right to remove during his term. Burnside v. Twitchell, 43 N. H. 390.

Taking a mortgage of personal property from one having no title, and recording the same, without taking possession of the mortgaged property or interfering with the same, constitutes no conversion for which trover will lie. Davis v. Buffum, 51 Me. 160; Burnside v. Twitchell, 43 N. H. 390. And see Mattewan Co. v. Bentley, 13 Barb. (N. Y.) 641.

In Davis v. Buffum, 5 Me. 160, the defendant leased his sawmill to one M., who, after putting in the machinery which was the subject-matter of the action, assigned the lease and sold the machinery to the plaintiffs, who thereupon entered the mill and occupied it. During their occupation, the defendant conveyed the mill, together with "the privilege and appurtenances thereto belonging" by deed, to a third person, to whom the plaintiff attorned, paying to them rent during the residue of the term. It was held that the giving of the deed on the part of the defendant did not of itself constitute a conversion.

2. Woodis v. Jordan, 62 Me. 490; Fouldes v. Willoughby, 8 M. & W. 540.

The bare removal of the chattels from the premises by the party taking possession, is no conversion. Sparks v. Purdy, 11 Mo. 219; Shea v. Milford, always a question for the jury, whether his intention was to take possession of the goods themselves.¹

c. TAKING BY DURESS OR FRAUD.—If the defendant acquires possession through duress or fraud, he is liable, because the possessory title so derived is without right and against the plaintiff's 145 Mass. 525. And see Farnsworth v. Lowery, 134 Mass. 512. Nor is the removal of them to another part of the building a necessary act in taking possession, where the right of the former tenant, who was alone in fault for not removing them, is not denied. Mattice v. Brinkman, 74 Mich. 705.

Where the owner of land felled timber and sold it, and afterwards, before it was removed, sold the land, notifying the vendee that the timber had been sold, the vendee of the land was held liable for conversion for refusing to permit the purchaser of the timber to remove it. Sherman v. Way, 56 Barb. (N. Y.) 188.

In Thorogood v. Robinson, 6 Q. B. 769; 51 E. C. L. 768, the plaintiff was in possession of some land on which was lying certain lime and breeze, etc. The defendant had recovered judgment in ejectment for the land, and he entered under the writ of possession and turned two of the plaintiff's servants, who were loading a barge there with lime, off the premises. It was held that it was a question for the jury whether the conduct of the defendant, in turning the plaintiff's servants off the premises, and not letting them take away the lime and breeze, amounted to a conversion or not. The jury found that it did not. Patterson, J., said: "The mere turning the plaintiff's servants off the premises could not amount to a conversion of the goods; for the defendant had a right to turn the servants off." See also Needham v. Rawbone, 6 Q. B. 771, where the plaintiff brought an action for a lot of wearing apparel. It appeared that he had left his house in which were stored the articles in question. The defendant entered the premises, under an order from the court of chancery, placed a man in charge, took an inventory of the goods, locked up the rooms containing them and prevented the plaintiff's servants from having access thereto, and finally expelled them from the house. It was held that, "It did not constitute a conversion, because it did not appear that the plaintiff might not have had the use of the goods had he desired it." Badger

He was forbidden to do so by the party in possession who had succeeded to the title to the real estate, upon which the boiler was situated. It was held a conversion. Badger v. Batavia Paper Mfg. Co., 70 Ill. 302.

1. Cooley on Torts, p. 531.

In an action for the conversion of mirrors claimed by the plaintiff under a chattel mortgage, it appeared that the mirrors were in different apartments of a building occupied by tenants of the defendant's predecessor in title, the defendant having purchased the building at a sale under a mortgage. Afterwards, some of the tenants moved out, and the defendant, with notice of the plaintiff's claim, relet the apartments with the mirrors in them to other tenants. It was held to be an error to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the plaintiff did not show that the defendant was in actual possession of the mirrors. Wilson v. Cummings (Super. Ct.), 24 N. Y. Supp. 115.

The plaintiff stored goods in a building-occupied by a company in which the plaintiff had an interest. The defendant afterward assumed possession of the premises under a mortgage against the company and put an agent in charge of the same. The agent notified the plaintiff to remove the goods, but refused to allow him to remove them without a receipt, "in good order." No demand had been made on the defendant for the goods; he had given no order in reference thereto, and he was not informed that the plaintiff had applied therefor. It was held that the defendant was not liable for a conversion. Amberg v. Philbrick, 33 Ill. App. 200; Miller v. Lamery, 62 Vt. 116.

will.¹ To secure property by a threat is a conversion, but the conduct of the defendant must amount to a forcible taking.²

1. See supra, this title, Advantage to Defendant Not the Test. In Bristol v. Burt, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 254; 5 Am. Dec. 264, the defendant, a collector of the port, prevented the removal of certain goods of the plaintiff which were stored in a warehouse, on the ground that the plaintiff was going to carry them into Canada, contrary to an embargo. Two armed men were stationed near the warehouse, and the defendant avowed his determination to prevent the removal of the goods in question from any of the stores in the port. It was held that this was sufficient evidence to support an action for conversion. The court said: "The bare denial to deliver is not always a conversion, as in Thimblethrop's Case, 2 Bulst. 310, where a piece of timber was left upon the lands of the defendant by the lessee at the expiration of his term, and he was requested to deliver it and refused, but suffered the timber to lie without intermeddling with it. The reason why this was held not to be a conversion was, that there was no act done or dominion exercised; but in the present case there were the highest and most unequivocal acts of dominion and control over the property, not only by claiming jurisdiction over it, but in placing armed men near it to prevent its removal. This fact is of itself a conversion. It is intermeddling with the property in the most decisive manner and detaining it for months in the storehouse." See Chapman v. Allen, Cro. If the goods are received by a third person with a knowledge of the fraud, or under such circumstances as would put him on inquiry, or if such third person fails to put himself on the footing of a bona fide purchaser for value, he will be liable for conversion. Gage v. Epperson, 2 Head (Tenn.) 669.

2. In Granger v. Hill, 4 Bing. N. Cas. 212, the defendant obtained from the plaintiff, under threat of executing a warrant of ca. sa., a ship's register, and it was held that this amounted to a conversion because the chattel was taken without right and against the defendant's will. See Powell v. Hoyland, 6 Exch. 67.

In Harlan v. Brown (Ind. App.), 30 N. E. Rep. 928, the complaint alleged that the plaintiff was the owner of a note which was past due; that while he was intoxicated, it was wrongfully taken from him without his consent, and sold to the defendants; and the defendants delivered it to the makers for a new note. It was held that the complaint stated a cause of action against the defendants for the conversion of the note.

The owner of a note of which another

5. Conversion by Wrongful Use or Disposition.—Any wrongful disposition of property which purports to vest in another, along with the possession, some right over the property itself, whether as owner or as dominus pro tempore, is a conversion.¹ If one intrusted with property for a qualified purpose transgress the limits fraudulently obtains possession, and which he converts to his own use by suing to judgment, and collecting the amount due thereon, may, in an action of trover, recover from the latter the value of the note; notwithstanding such note and judgment and the collection thereof, and notwithstanding that the plaintiff had knowledge of these facts before bringing suit. *Rushin v. In Wheelock v. Wheelwright, 5 Mass. 104, the defendant hired a horse and sleigh of the plaintiff to go from Boston to the Punch Bowl and return, the trip to occupy four hours and a half. He rode the horse four and a half miles farther to Watertown, and while returning, owing to the hard driving and intense coldness of the weather, the horse fell dead. In an action on the case for improperly using the horse, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover. "The plaintiff has misconceived his action. He should have brought trover. The defendant, by riding the horse beyond the place for which he had liberty, is answerable to the plaintiff in trover." And to the same effect see Perham v. Coney, 117 Mass. 102.

of his authority, he is liable.¹ The intention of the wrongdoer need not necessarily be to confer an absolute property upon the defendant; to deliver goods so as to enable another to acquire a lien, is a conversion. "If a person take my horse to ride and leave him at an inn, that is a conversion; for though I may have the horse on sending for him, and paying for the keeping of him, yet it brings a charge on me."² So, if a person in possession of another's property pledge it without the owner's consent, it is a conversion.³ The same principle applies to the repledge by a

Where an attorney, on making a collection for an infant client, without his knowledge, takes notes in his own name, which he transfers to one not a bona fide purchaser, either the attorney or purchaser will be liable in trover. Petrie v. Williams, 68 Hun (N. Y.) 589.

Where the agent of a mortgagor disposed of the mortgaged chattels by sale and paid the proceeds, which were sufficient to satisfy both mortgages, to a prior, in exclusion of the rights of a junior, mortgagee, he will be liable to the latter for the damages sustained by the conversion. Merchants', etc., Bank v. Meyer, 56 Ark. 499.

But it is not a conversion for an agent intrusted with property to sell at a certain price, to sell for a less price. Moore v. McKibbin, 33 Barb. (N. Y.) 246.

Where one left in charge of horses wrecked on board a steamboat, part of the horses belonging to himself, sold them and took notes payable to himself and the other owner jointly, he was not guilty of conversion. Wood v. Worthington, 4 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 174.

Where a slave put on board a steamboat for transportation was set to "wooding" by one of the officers of the boat, without permission of the master, and while so employed fell overboard and was drowned, the boat was held liable for conversion if the employment contributed to the loss. *Johnson v. Sale by Conditional Purchaser.—Where the conditional purchaser of chattels, the property in which was to remain in the vendor until paid for, sells or gives them away before fully paid for, he is liable for conversion. Johnston v. Whittemore, 27 Mich. 463.

Conversion by Carrier.—A carrier may be held liable in trover for the loss or wrongful delivery of goods intrusted to him for carriage. Bullard v. Young, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 46. But not for a mere delay in delivery. Briggs v. New York, etc., R. Co., 28 Barb. (N. Y.) 515.

Mason*, 64 N. H. 98. And where one had a horse for agistment and rode him fifteen miles, the horse dying immediately afterward, though not in consequence of the riding, it was held no conversion. *Johnson v. pledgee,¹ or a change in the nature of the security.² But a sale by a mortgagee of personal property before condition broken would not be a conversion.³

It is not necessary that there should be a sale of the entire chattel by the defendant; an alienation or use of a portion may be treated as a conversion of the whole.⁴ But it seems that where there is a distinct bailment of several chattels, each independent of the other, a conversion of one will not operate as a conversion of all.⁵

One having a life interest in chattels who attempts to convey

If one having the possession of another's property for a specified purpose, pledges it as security for advances, both he and the one with whom it is pledged are liable to the owner for conversion, and trover may be maintained without demand. Hotchkiss v. Hunt, 49 Me. 213. And see Stump v. Roberts, Cooke (Tenn.) 352.

But the pledge of a bond, and as incident thereto of collaterals, is not per se a conversion of the collaterals. If they are redeemed by the obligee of the bond before maturity, and before suit brought, and are in his hands ready to be restored upon payment of the bond, the obligor has no cause for complaint. Shelton v. French, 33 Conn. 489.

So, also, a sale by a pledgee, without authority, for non-compliance with a demand which he had no right to make, or after a tender of the debt for which the pledge is held, is a conversion. Hope v. Lawrence, 1 Hun (N. Y.) 317.

2. The payee of a promissory note receiving collateral security from the maker, has no authority, without the latter's consent, to surrender the collateral to the makers of the note or exchange it for their promissory note, giving them time for payment, and such acts amount to conversion. *Greenwald v. Sale by Mortgagee After Default.—If the mortgagee of property, after default, sells more than is necessary to satisfy the debt and costs, he will be liable for conversion of the excess.

Omaha Auction Co. v. Rogers, 35 Neb. 61.

Sale by Conditional Vendor After Condition Broken.—Under the Vermont acts of 1884, No. 93, a conditional vendee is entitled to the possession of the chattel until taken and sold by a public officer, and he may maintain trover against the vendor who takes and sells the same at private sale. Smith v. Wood, 63 Vt. 534; Roberts v. Hunt, 61 Vt. 612.

Sale by Second Mortgagee.—A second mortgagee who takes possession of and sells the mortgaged chattels after default in a condition of the first mortgage, is guilty of conversion and liable to the first mortgagee. Kleinberger v. Brown (Super. Ct.), 8 N. Y. Supp. 866.

5. Gentry v. Madden, 3 Ark. 127. See, generally, Richardson v. Atkinson, 1 Stra. 576; Bowen v. Fenner, 40 Barb. (N. Y.) 383.

In Philpot v. Kelly, 3 Ad. & El. 106; 30 E. C. L. 40, the question was as to the liability of one who, having in his possession a cask of wine belonging to the plaintiff, drew part of it off and bottled it, to preserve it from destruction on account of the rotten wood in the casks. Much space is devoted in the opinions of the various judges to the discussion of when a conversion of a part amounts to a conversion of the whole. Patteson, J., said: "I think that the mere taking away or destroying a part of property which remains in the hands of a bailee, is not such a conversion that the owner may sue in trover for the whole. In Richardson v. Atkinson, 1 Stra. 576, where part of the liquor was drawn off, it was held a conversion; but the defendant had filled the vessel up with water. I am not prepared to say that if a person draws off part of the contents of a cask, and is ready to deliver the rest, his taking away such part is necessarily a conver-

the entire property, is guilty of a conversion.¹ The remainderman is not bound to follow the property into the hands of the purchaser, but may, at his option, sue either the life tenant or successive purchaser.²

A temporary use of a chattel by a licensee, whose title is derived from a tortfeasor, it has been held, does not amount to a conversion.³

III. TITLE TO MAINTAIN TROVER—1. Who May Maintain Trover—a. IN GENERAL.—A plaintiff in trover must recover upon the strength of his own legal title;⁴ and there must be a concurrence both of the right of property, general or special, and of the actual possession or the right to immediate possession.⁵ But it is not essential sion of the whole. If it were so held, a person with whom a cask of liquor was deposited, and who wished to convert all of it, might draw off a part of the contents, and if the vessel remained with him for six years afterwards, refuse to deliver up the rest, and set up his conversion of the part so many years ago, in answer to an action of trover."

2. Moore v. Baker, 4 Ind. App. 115.

The plaintiff purchased negroes of a tenant for life, intending to run them out of the state and to defeat the interests of those in remainder, who, to protect their interests, seized the negroes, and such seizure was held not to be a conversion. Sharp v. Nesmith, 6 Rich. (S. Car.) 31.

3. In Frome v. Dennis, 45 N. J. L. 515, the plaintiff left his plough upon A's farm for safekeeping. The farm changed ownership and the new owner loaned the plough to the defendant, who used it three or four days in the belief that the lender was the owner. The defendant returned it and was subsequently notified by the plaintiff that the plough belonged to him. It was held there was no conversion. Dixon, J., said: "He (the defendant) received it for temporary use only, and without any claim of right or dominion over it, but having a mere license from the possessor, revocable at once by either the possessor or the true owner. He surrendered it to the possessor, from whom he had received it, without any intention of enlarging or changing his title, without any reference to anybody's title, and doubtless would have as readily surrendered to the plaintiff upon the ownership being shown. Neither in the use nor in the surrender by the defendant does there appear any repudiation of the owner's right, or any exercise of dominion inconsistent with such right. His acts may have constituted a trespass, but not a conversion."

4. The nature of the title in the plaintiff, upon which his suit in trover is to be founded, must be a legal, in contradiction to an equitable title. In Myers v. Hale, 17 Mo. App. 204, the court reaches the conclusion that where there is a deed of trust conveying the legal title to the trustee, he only, and not the beneficiary, is entitled to bring trover for the conversion of chattels embraced therein.

In Byam v. Hampton (Supreme Ct.), 10 N. Y. Supp. 372, the court uses this language: "A mere equitable interest in personal property where legal title and actual possession are in another, is not sufficient to enable the party to maintain trover for the conversion." See Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Paine, 119 U. S. 513; Halleck v. Mixer, 16 Cal. 574; Mather v. Trinity Church, 3 S. & R. (Pa.) 509; 8 Am. Dec. 663; Harlan v. Harlan, 15 Pa. St. 507; 53 Am. 5. In Darlington on Personal Prop., p. 36, the rule is stated that the action of trover "may be maintained only when the plaintiff has been in possession of the goods, or has such a property in them as draws to it the right of possession." See also Swenson v. Kleinschmidt, 10 Mont. 473; Glaze v. McMillion, 7 Port. (Ala.) 279; Kemp v. Thompson, 17 Ala. 9; *Danley v. Consignees.—Whether or not consignees may maintain an action of trover for conversion of goods shipped, before they are received, depends upon the construction of the contract of consignment—the same principles applying to consignees as to other plaintiffs.

Where, by the contract of consignment, the property, absolute or special, passes, coupled with a right to the possession, the action of trover lies. Fitzhugh v. Wiman, 9 N. Y. 559; O'Neill v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 60 N. Y. 138. See also Green v. Clarke, 12 N. Y. 343; Perkins v. Dacon, 13 Mich. 81; Gibbons v. Farwell, 58 Mich. 233.

Assignees.—Assignees, in this connection, may be considered in two aspects: assignees of the right of action, and assignees of the right of property. The general rule of the common law is, that rights of action for torts to the person or character are not assignable, but that such as affect property, real or personal, may be transferred—not, however, so as to invest the transferee with all the rights, legal and equitable, of his transferor, but, by the intervention of equity, to enable him to maintain an action on the right thus assigned, in the name of the assignor. In many of the states, however, statutes have been passed enlarging the privileges of the assignee as respects such choses in action as were assignable at common law, so that now, by statute, all such rights of action for torts as would survive to the personal representative of the injured party may be assigned, so as to pass an interest to the assignee which he may enforce at law, and in his own name. See Final v. Backus, 18 Mich. 218; Grant v. Smith, 26 Mich. 201; Brady v. Whitney, 24 Mich. 154; Finn v. Corbitt, 36 Mich. 318; Butler v. New York, etc., R. Co., 22 Barb. (N. Y.) 110; Purple v. Hudson River R. Co., 4 Duer (N. Y.) 74; Jordan v. Gillen, 44 N. H. 424.

Little need be said in this connection regarding assignees of rights of property, as contradistinguished from rights of action; Story, J., in the Brig Sarah Ann, 2 Sumn. (U. S.) 211, contrasts the two. He says: "There is no principle of law which establishes that a sale of personal property is void because the property was not in the rightful possession of the owner at the time the sale was made. Under such circumstances the sale is not a right of action, but a sale of the thing itself, and is good to pass title against every person not holding the same in good faith for a valuable consideration without notice à fortiori against a wrongdoer."

In Tome v. Dubois, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 548, it is maintained that the owner of personal property is not obliged to treat every act of a third person who infringes his right of property or possession as constituting a tortious conversion of the property, but may, if he sees fit, waive the tort, and sell the property and convey a good title, and that his vendee may, upon demand and refusal, maintain trover therefor. See Carpenter v. Hale, 8 Gray (Mass.) 157; Zabriske v. Smith, 13 N. Y. 322; 64 Am. Dec. 557; Morgan v. Bradley, 3 Hawks (N. Car.) 559.

An instrument conveying property for the better securing of promissory notes, conveys such title in the property as will authorize the payee of the notes to maintain trover for the conversion of the property. Johnson v. Osburn, 85 Ga. 654.

Adverse Possessor.—One in adverse possession cultivating turpentine, though not the owner of the land, is nevertheless the owner of the turpentine gathered, and entitled to support the action of trover against the true owner of the soil for taking it. Branch v. Campbell, 7 Jones (N. Car.) 378; Branch v. Morrison, 6 Jones (N. Car.) 16. See Doering v. Kenamore (Mo.), 1 West 741, as to the insufficiency of title derived by gift, where the chattel is in the adverse possession of the defendant. See also in this connection Stedman v. Riddick, 4 Hawks (N. Car.) 29; Mather v. Trinity Church, 3 S. & R. (Pa.) 509; 8 Am. Dec. 663.

To maintain trover, there must be either a taking from the owner without his consent, an assumption of ownership, an illegal use or abuse, or proof of demand and refusal. Kennet v. Robinson, 2 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 84.

Right to Specific Chattels.—Where the plaintiff in an action of trover is out of possession, the invariable legal requirement is that in connection with a property, absolute or special, in the chattels in controversy, he must have had, at the time of the conversion, a right to the immediate possession. This makes it necessary that the plaintiff should have title to specific chattels, or to a specific portion of specific chattels, for were this not the case, his right to the possession would not be strictly immediate, but must await a subdivision, identification, or designation. In Orton v. Butler, 5 B. & Ald. 652, it was decided that a count in the declaration stating that the defendant had and received to the use of the plaintiff a certain sum of money, and that the defendant "converted and disposed thereof" to his own use, was bad upon demurrer, that the absolute title should be in him; it is enough if he stands in such a relation to the property that he is entitled to the pos-for, as Abbott, C. J., said: "This is a count in trover, now, the action of trover is only maintainable for specific property. . . . In this case the defendant might redeem himself by returning to the plaintiff an equal sum of money." Little v. Gibbs, 4 N. J. L. 211, is to the same effect. "If money or cash be lost or stolen," says the court, "the loser cannot maintain trover to recover it, because it cannot be distinguished."

In Stott v. Alexander, 2 Sneed (Tenn.) 650, an administrator de bonis non sought to bring an action of trover against the personal representative of the former administrator, for a sum of money collected by such former administrator and belonging to the plaintiff's intestate. The court held that the action of trover lay not, inasmuch as, under the circumstances, there was nothing to specifically designate and identify the money sought to be recovered.

In Holmes v. Bailey, 16 Neb. 300, the circumstances were as follows: the plaintiff purchased seventy-five tons out of one hundred tons of hay standing on the field in stacks; no part of the hay being designated or specified as his portion. The vendor delivered to the purchaser only twenty tons, and the plaintiff sought to recover the remainder in trover. The court maintained that he had no such title as would enable him to bring trover therefor.

In Hill v. Robison, 3 Jones (N. Car.) 501, ten sacks of salt were bought and paid for with the means of A, and five others were bought and paid for with the means of B. They were all delivered to B unmarked, and without any separation or distinct appropriation of any particular sacks to either. C, having received the whole from B, converted them, and A sought to maintain an action of trover. The court held that such an action, under the circumstances, could not be maintained, and in an opinion used the following language: "In an action of trover, the plaintiff must show title to the specific property converted, at the time of the conversion, or of his then present right to the possession. In this case no portion of the salt has been so set apart as the property of the plaintiff; no specific part, therefore, vested in him."

See also Jones v. Morris, 7 Ired. (N. Car.) 370.

This necessity for the right to the specific chattels is also illustrated in the case of parties to a contract for the sale of goods, by the application of the original proposition, as regards title in the plaintiff, where the vendee, in a contract for the sale of chattels, seeks to maintain trover while there yet remains to be done before delivery, some material act by the vendor, such as setting apart, designating, weighing, and counting. For, so long as such acts remain to be done, the property in the goods does not pass to the vendee. See SALES, vol. 21, p. 476. Hence, no action of trover can be maintained by him. White v. Wilks, 5 Taunt. 176; 1 Chit. Pl. (16th Am. ed. 166); 2 Greenl. on Ev. (14th ed.), § 6.

Plaintiff Must Be Interested at Time of Suit.—The great weight of authority is in favor of requiring an interest in the plaintiff at the time of suit, though Barton v. Dunning, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 209, lays down an opposite doctrine. This was an action of trover; on appeal, the lower court was sustained in refusing the instruction that it was necessary that the plaintiff should be interested, as well at the time of the commencement of the suit, as at the time of the conversion. The supreme court maintained that the right of action was founded on the conversion and would not be defeated by the subsequent transfer of the right of property. The contrary doctrine is maintained by many adjudications. Brady v. Whitney, 24 Mich. 154, holds that title must be in the plaintiff, not only at the time of institution of the suit, but at the time of the verdict. A transfer of property during the pendency of the suit would defeat the plaintiff's right to recover. The defendant in trover gets title to the property by the judgment itself or by its payment, and no one is entitled to full damages unless he is in such a position that title will thus pass from him at the time of trial and judgment. Clapp v. Glidden, 39 Me. 448, was a case adjudicating directly this question. Said the court: "The question will remain whether the plaintiffs, when their suit was commenced, had any legal title to the vessel; for if they had not, the action cannot be maintained."

session of it, and will be liable ultimately to the true owner for its value, unless it is returned to him.¹

Prior actual possession is sufficient to sustain an action of trover against one who afterwards comes into possession without title, or who receives the possession from one who came into possession without title.² Possession is prima facie proof of ownership of a chattel not unlawfully acquired, and, whatever the interest of the possessor in the thing may be, is sufficient to enable trover to be maintained, as against all the world except the rightful owner, for a conversion committed in respect to it.³

Prior possession obtained by a purchaser of chattels sold under a void execution, enables the purchaser to maintain trover against a stranger. Duncan v. Spear, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 54. Compare Chamberlain v. Darrow, 46 Hun (N. 3. In Burton v. Hughes, 2 Bing. 173; 11 E. C. L. 368, it was decided that

If the possessor holds in the right of someone else, as a servant for a master, or a trustee for a cestui qui trust, the proof of such fact negatives the presumption of personal right arising from mere possession, and controls the application of the general principle.¹ The character of the plaintiff's possession need not necessarily be lawful.² It may even be wrongful as against others coming into the title by higher right.³ It is sufficient if it is higher than that of the defendant, and the latter cannot be heard to set up the weakness of his adversary's title in bar of the action.⁴

The possession must have been rightfully acquired,⁵ since the possession of a chattel may be lawful with respect to the right to hold against others, while the possessor may have failed to where property was lent to the plaintiff under a written agreement, trover could be maintained for it without producing the agreement; for though it had been necessary to prove the nature of his interest in it, the rules of evidence therefor rendered the production of the writing indispensable. Still, its possession is sufficient title against a wrongdoer. It was sufficient to show his possession without inquiring into the terms of it. See also Final v. Backus, 18 Mich. 218; Brown v. Trask, 35 Me. 150, where a wife gave the administrator of her husband one hundred dollars in gold, and he afterward claimed that it belonged to the estate, it was held to be a question for the jury whether she held in her own right or the right of her husband, and that her possession under the circumstances raised no presumption of property in her favor. *Webb v. In Ingersoll v. Emmerson, 1 Ind. 76, it was held that, as between the plaintiff, the owner of a chattel, and the defendant, a bona fide purchaser for value from a bailee of the former who had sold in contravention of the purposes of the bailment, the higher title was in the plaintiff. Kitchel v. Vana-dor, 1 Blackf. (Ind.) 356. But in Dyer v. Pearson, 3 B. & C. 42, it was said that if the real owner of goods suffers another to have possession, he enables such other to hold himself out to the world as having both possession and ownership, and that then, perhaps, a sale by such person might bind the true owner.

A wife, though living apart from her husband, cannot lawfully dispose, by gift, of chattels acquired during coverture. But in an action by the donee against a wrongdoer for the conversion of chattels so given, it is not competent for the defendant to set up the title of the husband. Bourne v. Fosbrook, 18 C. B. N. comply with the statutory regulations imposed for reasons of public policy; and this circumstance cannot be made available by a wrongdoer in bar of the action.¹

The joint owner of a chattel may maintain trespass for a separate interest, and the defendant cannot take advantage at the trial of the nonjoinder of the other parties, but must plead in abatement.² A vested legal interest is sufficient to support trover.³ In trover for property purchased, the plaintiff must show that he is entitled to the property by having performed completely the terms of his contract of purchase.⁴

An officer who attaches goods in the mode designated by statute acquires therein a special property, which will enable him to maintain trover, as well against the defendant in the attachment as against a stranger, for any unlawful meddling with the property.⁵ A legal seizure, even though unaccompanied by actual

What Constitutes a Seizure.—In Richardson v. Rardin, 88 Ill. 125, a constable in actual view of the property levied upon a large crib of corn, indorsing the levy on the execution, the defendant in execution being present at the time. The constable notified him of the levy and forbade his further interfering with the corn, and at the time nailed boards across the crib to secure the property, and then gave notice in the hearing of several persons near by that he had levied on the corn and that it must not be disturbed. It was held that, as his act, but for the writ, would have been a trespass, the levy was good, and sufficient publicity given to it. See also Minor v. Herriford, 25 Ill. 344; *Harely v. 3. Pettingill v. Rideout, 6 N. H. 454. This is clearly according to the weight of authority in the United States; that a civil action may be maintained for goods feloniously taken, before the institution of criminal proceedings against the wrongdoer. Boston, etc., R. Co. v. Dance, 1 Gray (Mass.) 83; Allison v. Farmers' Bank of Virginia, 6 Rand. (Va.) 226; Story v. Hammond, 4 Ohio 376; Blassingame v. Graves, 6 B. Mon. (Ky.) 38; Ballew v. Alexander, 6 Humph. (Tenn.) 433. In some of the states, where the contrary rule had been established by decisions of the courts, it has been abrogated by statutes. New York Rev. St., pt. 3, ch. 4, § 2; Maine Statute of 1844, ch. 102.

But in Pennsylvania it is held that the civil action is suspended until the public prosecution for the offense has been duly prosecuted and ended. Hutchinson v. Bank of Wheeling, 41 Pa. St. 44; 80 Am. Dec. 584. The injured party may, however, institute his suit, pending the prosecution; the civil suit is only suspended. Keyser v. Rodgers, 50 Pa. St. 275.

And in England a party injured by a felony could obtain no recompense out of the estate of a felon, nor even the restitution of his own property, except after a conviction of the offender, and it is the settled rule at this day that all civil remedies are suspended until after the termination of a criminal prosecution against the offender. *Markham v. One to whom a letter sent by mail is addressed may maintain trover, in a state court, against the postmaster who unlawfully refuses to deliver it.⁸ So one enjoined against moving property may maintain trover for a conversion of it.⁹ The owner of a note, although he cannot maintain an action thereon in his own name, may bring trover for its conversion.¹⁰ Beneficiaries entitled to

The bailee of goods may maintain trover or trespass against everyone but the legal owner. And a bailee whose possession is coupled with an interest, may maintain his action against one tortiously taking the goods out of his possession. Jones v. McNeil, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 466.

For the possession of property fraudulently obtained from a bailee, by the general owner, the bailee may maintain trover for the property, either against the owner or a subsequent vendee. O'Connell v. Maxwell, 3 Blackf. (Ind.) 419.

Where a bailee sues his bailor in trover, he can only recover the value of his special property in the goods. But where he sues a stranger, he can recover their whole value and hold the balance above a special interest in trust for the bailor. Benjamin v. Strengle, 13 Ill. 467.

1. In Mears v. London, etc., R. Co., 11 C. B. N. S. 849, Williams, J., said: "It is fully established that in the case of a bailment not for reward, either the bailor or the bailee may bring an action for an injury to the thing bailed. But in the case of a hiring, the owner cannot bring trover because he has temporarily parted with the possession. It seems to me, however, clear that though the owner cannot bring an action where there has been no permanent injury to the chattel, it has never been doubted that where there is a permanent injury, the owner can maintain an action against the person whose wrongful act caused the injury." See also Fancred v. Allgood, 4 H. & N. 438; Hotchkiss v. McVickar, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 403; Sheldon v. Soper, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 352; Glaze v. McMillion, 7 Port. (Ala.) 279; Taylor v. Horrall, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 317; Barton v. Dunning, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 209.

One who leases a house and furniture, agreeing to board the lessor and allow him to use the furniture in return for a fixed weekly compensation, may maintain trover against the lessor for any conversion of the furniture, although he has refused to board the lessor, when it appears that the lessor failed to pay the sum agreed upon for board. *Chamberlain v. lien, acquired the property by theft or fraud from the rightful owner.¹ But since the right depends upon possession, with the loss of possession the right is lost,² and immediately reverts to the general owner.³ Hence, a sale by the lienee, or a delivery to the general owner, destroys his right of action.⁴ A party having goods, however, may transfer the possession, subject to the lien of a third person, who may lawfully hold the property until the lien is paid. But if the transferees sell the goods, the owner is remitted to his original right freed from the lien, and may bring trover against him.⁵

c. MORTGAGEES.—Under a mortgage of personal property, the whole legal title being vested in the mortgagee, he is entitled to maintain trover for its conversion, although he has never had possession and has never foreclosed.⁶ He may maintain the ac-

1. In York v. Grenaugh, 2 Ld. Raym. 866, it was held that where a traveler had stolen a horse and left him at an inn, the innkeeper might have a lien for his keep as against the true owner, for since the innkeeper is obliged to accept the horse, he should have a remedy for payment which was by retainer. So, where A. stole goods and delivered them to the Exeter carrier to be carried to Exeter, the real owner, finding them in possession of the carrier, demanded them of him, upon which the carrier refused to deliver without being paid for his carriage. In trover by the real owner, it was held that the carrier might be justified for detaining them against the rightful owner for the carriage. Exeter Carrier's Case, cited in 2 Ld. Raym. 867; Johnson v. Hill, 3 Stark. 172; King v. Richards, 6 Whart. (Pa.) 419; 37 Am. Dec. 420; Grinnell v. Cook, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 490; 38 Am. Dec. 663; Sweet v. Pym, 1 East 4; *Jones v. In Hollingsworth v. Dow, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 230, it was held that a person, even though a wrongdoer, who puts up at an inn, shall be deemed the agent of the owner, and upon this principle the innkeeper shall be deemed to have his lien for the horses keep. See also Cook v. Cain, 19 Oregon 482.

A landlord having a lien on a tenant's crop, of which he has received one third as rent, has not, before the third is set apart, such special property, accompanied with right of possession, as will support his action of trover against a purchaser from the tenant. Frink v. Pratt, 26 Ill. App. 222.

In Corbitt v. Reynolds, 68 Ala. 378, the court declares that a landlord, simply by virtue of his lien on a tenant's crop, cannot maintain trover against a wrongdoer who has converted it. tion, without proof of a demand and refusal, against an officer who sells the mortgaged property on execution against the mortgagor, although the latter was the purchaser at the sale, and has the present actual possession of the property.¹ The rights of the mortgagee are the same whether the action is against the mortgagor or a third person.² The holder of the senior mortgage may join the junior mortgagee with him in an action against a third person; the principle being that a first mortgagee has the right to waive his priority and allow a second mortgagee to stand upon the same footing as himself.³

f. PLEDGEES.—By virtue of the pledge, the pledgee at common law acquires a special property in the thing pledged,⁴ and is entitled to the exclusive possession of it during the time and for the objects for which it is pledged. If the owner should wrongfully repossess himself of the pledge, the pledgee may, at his election, maintain an action for the restitution of the thing itself, or for damages.⁵ If it should be taken from his possession by a stranger, he may sue the stranger in like manner.¹ The title of the pledgee is good against all the world, and, before tender and payment, even as against the pledgor for a conversion with respect to the property.²

g. TRUSTEES.—Trustees having a title to chattels with an immediate right of possession can sue in trover for the chattels, although they may never have taken actual possession, but have allowed the goods to remain in the possession of their cestui que trust, and although the title may be liable to be defeated by the claim of some third person. Yet the wrongdoer cannot set up the title of that third person as a defense to an action against him for the recovery of the goods.³ An action for the conversion of trust property should be brought in the name of the trustee.⁴

h. action can never set up as a defense the weakness of the plaintiff's title,¹ unless he shows that he has at first come into the rightful possession of the chattels, as in case of a seizure by a sheriff, or where goods have been placed in the hands of a bailee,² and then only when such third person has made a demand upon the defendant for the goods.³ The rule, however, does not apply to the finder of a lost chose in action, for example, a promissory note.⁴

2. BANKRUPTS—AS TO AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY.—The title of a bankrupt to after-acquired property, while liable to be defeated by the intervention of the trustee or assignee in bankruptcy, is, until that event occurs, sufficient to maintain trover, trespass, or replevin, for any unauthorized taking or assumption of dominion over his property.⁵ And this conditional right of property passes to the administrator of the bankrupt.⁶

2. Absolute and Special Property Compared.—One has absolute property in a chattel, where not only the possession, actual or constructive, but the exclusive right to enjoy it, is vested in the so-called absolute owner;—a possession and a right so absolute and exclusive as to be paramount to the claims of all others and such as can only be defeated by some act or default of his own.⁷ The person in whom the general property in a personal chattel is, may maintain an action of trover for the conversion thereof, although he may never have been in actual possession; because the general property, in the case of a personal chattel, draws to it a possession, in construction of law, and such possession is, by reason of the transitory nature of a personal chattel, sufficient to found this action upon.⁸

It was held that the replication was a good answer to the plea and sustained the declaration. See also Herbert v. Sayer, 5 Q. B. 965; 48 E. C. L. 965; Matson v. Cook, 4 Bing. N. Cas. 392; 33 E. Special property, in this connection,¹ may be either a qualified right or interest in the thing itself, or one annexed to or connected with it, such as that of a carrier, factor, or bailee; or, on the other hand, it may be that of a mere gratuitous loanee or simple custodian of the property.² When a special owner has a jus in re or a jus ad rem, his interest in the chattel is not necessarily subservient to the claims of the general owner, but an action of trover may be maintained as readily against such general or absolute owner as against a stranger, when the rights of the special owner are infringed.³ The special property in a gratuitous loanee or naked depository is, more accurately, only a "possessory interest,"⁴

Where one has raked manure scattered in a public street into heaps preparatory to its removal, he may maintain trover against one who, twenty-four hours after it is gathered, carts it off. Haslem v. Lockwood, 37 Conn. 500; 9 Am. Rep. 350.

If a testator has bequeathed specific goods, the legatee may maintain an action of trover for the conversion thereof by a stranger, although they have not been delivered to him by the executor, because a general property in the goods was vested in him immediately upon the death of the testator. Bacon Abr., "Trover" 642.

In Pope v. Tucker, 23 Ga. 484, it was decided that since a husband has an absolute right to the wife's chattel personally in possession, he might maintain trover for an injury committed while they were in her actual custody.

A plaintiff, in ejectment, after the title to the land had been determined in his favor, may maintain an action of trover for logs cut by the defendant from standing timber and moved from the land during the pendency of the suit, and while in possession of the land under a bona fide claim of title adverse to the plaintiff. Willson v. Hoffman, 93 Mich. 72.

1. In Turley v. Tucker, 6 Mo. 583, Napton, J., says: "The special property spoken of by the books as sufficient to maintain the action of trover is of two kinds, and of two kinds only; the first is, the property which is founded on a mere possession held subject to the claims of the absolute owner; the second is, a temporary property without possession, only one instance of which I have seen recorded in the books. Roberts v. Wyatt, 2 Taunt. 268." This was a case of trover for the recovery of the value of an abstract of title to which the plaintiff had a temporary right, and which was delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant for certain purposes; after their accomplishment and during the continuance of the plaintiff's temporary right, upon a demand for its return, the defendant refused to comply, and detained the abstract. The plaintiff recovered in trover.

2. See Story on Bailments, par. 93.

3. A person who has a temporary property in goods, delivering them to the general owner for special purposes, may, after the accomplishment of that purpose, upon demand and refusal to deliver, maintain trover for them. Roberts v. Wyatt, 2 Taunt. 268; O'Connell v. Maxwell, 3 Blackf. (Ind.) 419; Jones v. McNeil, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 466.

A party having a general interest is allowed to recover in trover against the general owner, but only to the extent of such special interest; though as against a mere wrongdoer, the whole value of the converted property may be recovered, the special owner being accountable over to the general owner. See infra, this title, Measure of Damages.

4. The term special property is often used in a very qualified sense, excluding every notion of interest; thus, a mere depository has what is more accurately called a "possessory interest." He cannot be said to have any special property in the goods. He has no jus in re. He has only their rightful custody and possession, which is enough to support an action of trover against

but, as such, will prevail against all without claim of title.¹ Where only a special property exists, there must be evidence of actual possession.² Both the person in whom the general property in the goods is, and the person in whom the special property therein is, may maintain an action of trover for the conversion thereof, but a recovery by one is a bar to a recovery by the other.³ The absolute and special property cannot exist as distinct rights in the same person.⁴

3. Trover and Trespass Compared.—Trover and trespass are to this extent concurrent remedies; wherever trespass for the unlawful taking and conversion of personal property will lie, trover also may be maintained.⁵ The converse of this proposition, however, a wrongdoer. 2 Black. Com. 452; Story on Bailments (6th ed.), par. 93; infra, this title, Who May Maintain Trover.

The possession of chattels, however, may be looked upon as presumptive evidence of property and it becomes a conclusive presumption against a stranger. "In a certain sense one always shows a right of property when he shows that he has gained an apparently rightful possession; such a possession is evidence of property and whoever, by force or fraud, intercepts it without being able to show any right in himself is liable to this action (trover). Indeed, the possession gained is not only evidence of right against such a person, but it is conclusive evidence, unless he is able in some manner to so connect himself with the right of the real owner as to be actually able to defend such owner's interest." Cooley on Torts 521.

And indeed it seems that there may be possession without even this transitory interest and a fortiori, without property special or general; a servant, for instance, in possession of his master's goods, cannot bring trover for their conversion; the possession of the servant being in the eye of the law regarded as the possession of the master. Lehigh Co. v. Field, 8 W. & S. (Pa.) 232; Farmers' Bank v. McKee, 2 Pa. St. 318; Tuthill v. Wheeler, 6 Barb. (N. Y.) 362.

It seems that there is an exception to the rule that in the case of a special property, it must have been accompanied with possession in order to support trover. A factor, for instance, to whom goods have been consigned and who has never received them, may, nevertheless, maintain trover for their conversion. Fowler v. Down, 1 B. & P. 44; 2 Saund. 47 D.; Stirling v. Vaughan, 11 East 626; Smith v. James, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 329; Everett v. Saltus, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 474.

This apparent inconsistency may perhaps be reconciled on the ground that the possession of the carrier is the possession of the factor; the carrier being the servant of the factor for the purpose of transportation. *Bull N. does not hold good,¹ for, to use the quaint language of Saunder's Reports, "One may qualify but not increase a tort."² It will readily be seen that, though every tortious taking of personal chattels is itself a conversion,³ every act of conversion is not a tortious taking for which trespass will lie;⁴ for in trover the taking, or original acquisition of possession, is, by the fictitious form of the action, assumed to have been lawful.⁵

The gist of the action of trespass is wrong to the possession,⁶ actual or constructive;⁷ the gist of the action of trover, wrong to property by illegal assumption of ownership, or some act of appropriation inconsistent with the rights of the owner.⁸ Hence, anciently it was said that "In trover the plaintiff sues in respect of his property, while in trespass he sues in respect of his possession."⁹ It was owing to this distinction that a title acquired by relation was deemed sufficient to support the action of trover,¹⁰

Forbes v. Marsh, 15 Conn. 385; O'Neill J., in Jones v. McNeil, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 466.

1. But the converse of this proposition does not hold, for trover may often be brought where trespass cannot; as, where goods are lent or delivered to another to keep, and he refuses to return them on demand, trespass does not lie, but the proper remedy is trover. Sir T. Raym. 472; 2 Vent. 170. So, where the taking is lawful, or, at least, excusable, trespass cannot be supported, but the owner may bring trover. Cooper v. Chitty, 1 Burr. 20; 2 Saund. 47 K.; Smith v. Milles, 1 T. R. 475; Wyatt v. Blades, 3 Camp. 396.

Trespass will not lie by the assignees of a bankrupt against a sheriff for taking the goods of a bankrupt in execution, after an act of bankruptcy, and before the issuing of the commission; notwithstanding he sells them after the issuing of the commission, and after a provisional assignment and notice from the provisional assignee not to sell. 5. Lord Mansfield in Cooper v. Chitty, 1 Burr. 20, says, regarding the nature of the action of trover: "In form, it is a fiction; in substance, a remedy to recover the value of personal chattels wrongfully converted by another to his own use. The form supposes the defendant may have come lawfully by the possession of the goods."

6. Says Lord Kenyon, C. J., in Ward v. Macauley, 4 T. R. 487: "The distinction between trespass and trover was well settled; the former is founded on possession, the latter on property. Here, in the case under consideration, the plaintiff had no possession; his remedy was by an action of trover founded on his property in the goods." Smith v. Milles, 1 T. R. 475; Balme v. Hutton, 9 Bing. 471; 23 E. C. L. 338; Holmes v. Doane, 3 Gray (Mass.) 328.

7. In Smith v. Milles, 1 T. R. 475. Amherst, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "To entitle a man to bring trespass, he must, at the time when the act was done which constitutes trespass, either have an actual possession in the thing which is the object of the trespass, or he must have a constructive possession in respect of the right actually vested in him."

If the owner of a chattel which is in York, gives it to J. S. who is in London, and it is taken or injured by a stranger, J. S. may maintain trespass. Bacon's Abr., "Trespass" C. Holmes v. Doane, 3 Gray (Mass.) 328; Woodruff v. Halsey, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 333; 19 Am. Dec. 329; Burrows v. Stoddard, 3 Conn. 160; Clark v. Skinner, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 469; 11 Am. Dec. 302.

though not that of trespass.¹ The more modern authorities, however, hold that a title which relates back suffices to maintain either trespass or trover subject to the qualification that, if the act of the defendant was lawful at the time it was done, trover only can be maintained.² "The only distinction," says a learned judge, "between trover and trespass de bonis asportatis appears to be, that the one is founded on mere possession, while the other rests on right as evidenced by possession."³ In trespass, no proof of right of action in a third person will defeat the plaintiff's right of action, unless the defendant connects himself with the title so set up in such manner as to justify his apparent wrong.⁴

In trover, the plaintiff's right of recovery may be annihilated by evidence on the part of the defendant, merely showing the title to be in a stranger;⁵ though it seems that if the plaintiff was in possession of the property at the time of the alleged wrong-

So the assignee of a bankrupt may sue for an injury committed after the act of bankruptcy but before the issuing of the commission. Balme v. Hut-ton, 9 Bing. 471; 23 E. C. L. 338; Cooper v. Chitty, 1 Burr. 20; Lazarus v. Waithman, 5 Moore 313; Bailey v. Bunning, 1 Lev. 173; Price v. Helyar, 4 Bing. 597; 15 E. C. L. 87; 1 Mo. & P. 541; Potter v. Starkie, 4 M. & S. 260.

1. For example, a writ commands a sheriff to take the goods of A. He takes goods which had been the property of A, and are still in his possession, though in point of law they have ceased to be his property, if certain contingent events happen. The sheriff, in this case, is not liable to be sued in trespass by the person who, by the happening of subsequent events, turns out to have had in law the property of the goods at the time of the seizure. If he takes the proceeds, he is liable in trover to render the value of the goods to the person whose property they turn out to be.

2. The rule that a man could not be made a trespasser by relation, was explained by Creswell, J., to apply where the act complained of was lawful at the time. The reason for such a rule is, that in trespass the damages are unlimited; in trover they are limited to the value of the property. See Tharpe v. Stallwood, 5 M. & G. 760.

3. Hare, J., in Armory v. Delamirie, Smith L. Cas. (8th ed.) 691.

4. In Kissam v. Roberts, 6 Bosw. (N. Y.) 153, Hoffman, J., says: "If it were held that in an action of trover for the wrongful conversion of goods, the defendant might show property in a third person, it would by no means follow that such a defense was admissible in trespass for the wrongful taking. An action of trover is consistent with the idea that the goods came into the possession of the defendant without wrong and that the only wrong on his part may be that he has converted them to his own use. If, in such case, it were held that the owner of the goods could alone recover their value as damages, still it would be true that for a wrongful taking from the lawful possession of another, it is no defense that a third party owns the goods, unless the defendant also shows that he took them by authority of the owner, or by virtue of process under which he had a right to take the goods from the owner. It would be dealing with great and unreasonable indulgence with a tort-feasor if, when sued for illegally, forcibly, and wrongfully taking the goods from the lawful possession of another, the plea that some stranger was in fact the owner of the goods were held a justification."

ful taking, the defendant must establish such connection with, or right under, such title as to authorize his act.¹

"The defendant," says the court in Harker v. Dement, "having failed to connect himself with the estate of Richard Dement, occupied the position of a mere tort-feasor, who had invaded the possession of the plaintiff without authority, and under such circumstances, it is very clear that he could not be permitted to prove that the title to the property in dispute was not in the plaintiff, but was at the time of conversion, outstanding in a third party with whom he had no connection or privity, to defeat the action or in mitigation of the damages." *Bourne v. Trover lies for wild geese which have been tamed, but which, without having regained their natural liberty, have strayed away. Amory v. Flynn, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 102; 6 Am. Dec. 316. So also for domestic fowls that have wandered into a neighbor's flock, and he refuses to turn them at large to be identified. Leonard v. Belknap, 47 Vt. 603.

In Cummings v. Perham, 1 Met. (Mass.) 555, it was held that trover lay for a dog, which, by statute, the defendant had a right to kill because it had no collar on, but which he converted to his own use. See Binstead v. Buck, 1 W. Bl. 1117.

Trover may be maintained upon the refusal to deliver a letter, Teal v. Felton, 12 How. (U. S.) 284; for a whale which has been killed and anchored with marks of appropriation, Taber v. Jenny, Sprague (U. S.) 315; for a cow wrongfully impounded, Drew v. Spaulding, 45 N. H. 472; for the recovery of copies of a creditor's accounts, if the creditor obtains possession thereof and refuses to deliver them to the debtor, Fullan v. Cummings, 16 Vt. 698.

Oysters.—It has been held that trover cannot be maintained for taking and converting oysters planted in a public river where oysters usually are found, although no oysters were to be found where they were planted at the time of the planting. Shepard v. Levenson, 2 N. J. L. 369. And in Brinckerhoff v. Starkins, 11 Barb. (N. Y.) 248, where the plaintiff had planted oysters in a navigable stream opposite the defendant's land, and the latter took them and carried them away, it was held that oysters being fera natura, the plaintiff could not maintain an action therefor unless he had them under his immediate control.

Derelict Goods.—Trover will not lie by the owners of derelict goods to recover the same from the first finder. Wyman v. Hurlburt, 12 Ohio 81; 40 Am. Dec. 461.

example, as counterfeit coins,¹ instruments for counterfeiting, or burglars' tools,² cannot be made the subject of this action.

2. Money.—Trover lies for the conversion of money, when there is an obligation on the part of the defendant to return specific coin or notes intrusted to his care.³ So the action will lie for money

1. Spalding v. Preston, 21 Vt. 9; 50 Am. Dec. 68. See Cox v. Cook, 14 Allen (Mass.) 165.

2. Morrill v. Goodenow, 65 Me. 178.

3. The question whether money can, in any case, be the subject-matter of an action of trover, is open to many difficulties of a technical nature. The obligation to pay money to another is primarily within the confines of the action of debt, and it seems to have been originally the law, that there must be some special quality attached to coins in order to make them proper subjects of an action of tort. Thus, in Hall v. Dean, Cro. Eliz. 841, it was said that the money must be in a bag. See Draycot v. Plot, Cro. Eliz. 818. But in both these cases the money was "out of a bag," yet the plaintiff was successful. The test seems to be: is there any obligation on the part of the defendant to deliver specific money to the plaintiff. A servant who receives a sum of money for his master, which he converts, is liable in this form of action, because the law imposes upon him the duty of returning the money in specie. Of course the action is always maintainable where the defendant unlawfully took the money in dispute out of the possession of the plaintiff. See generally, upon this subject, Kinaston v. Moor, Cro. Car. 89; Orton v. Butler, 5 B. & Ald. 652; 7 E. C. L. 224; Foster v. Green, 7 H. & N. 881. A recent text writer makes the question depend upon whether the same state of facts would also support a charge of larceny—if so, there is also a conversion. Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, p. 187, citing Reg. v. Hassal, 30 L. J. M. C. 175; Reg. v. Eden, 12 Cox 512; Reg. v. De Banks, 13 Q. B. Div. 29. Abbott, C. J., in Orton v. Butler, 5 B. & Ald. 652; 5 E. C. L. 224, sums up the law upon this subject: "The law has provided certain specific forms of actions for particular cases and it is of importance that they should be preserved; we ought, therefore, to look with great jealousy upon an innovation of this sort. The present count states, that the defendant had and received to the use of the plaintiff, a certain sum of money, to wit, ten shillings, to be paid to the plaintiff, but which the defendant converted to his own use. It is contended that this is a count in trover. Now the action of trover is only maintainable for specific property. It will lie for so many pieces of gold and silver, and in that case a defendant can only redeem himself by tendering to the plaintiff the same specific pieces. But in this case he clearly might do so by returning an equal sum of money. There is, therefore, not merely a want of certainty in the count, but it states that which is not the subject of an action of trover at all. The demurrer must, therefore, be allowed."

In Muskegon Booming Co. v. Hendricks, 89 Mich. 172, it was held that where the plaintiff owed the defendant $108.86, and by mistake gave him a draft for $198.86, which was negotiated and afterwards paid by the plaintiff before discovering the error, that trover did not lie for the recovery of the $90 excess paid.

The plaintiffs' agent, intending to be absent on the arrival of a certain package of money belonging to the plaintiffs, requested the defendant to receive it from the express company, for the purpose of safely keeping it until his return, and the defendant consented. The money was delivered to him on the written order of the agent. It was held that the defendant's refusal to deliver the money upon demand was a conversion. Jones v. Hunt, 74 Tex. 657.

The plaintiff, in an action of ejectment for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of lands, obtained a verdict in his favor and paid the purchase-money in gold into court, to be taken by the defendant on his filing his deed. The prothonotary deposited the money with reliable bankers to his own credit. They employed the money without profit. The defendant filed his deed after the passage of the legal tender acts, and the prothonotary offered to pay him the money in court in legal tender which he refused, and brought trover for the gold. It was held that he could not recover, as the prothonotary was an involuntary bailee, whose duty it was to take that care of a de-received by the defendant, and not paid over as requested,¹ or for money paid by mistake to the wrong person.² Where the money can be identified, as specie on special deposit, or bank bills by proof of denomination, trover will lie.³ So bank bills deposited in pledge may be recovered in this form of action; and the rights of the plaintiff are not prejudiced by the fact that the subject-matter of the action is money, or the bills of the bank itself, but the same principle is to govern as if the article deposited had been a watch or a jewel.⁴

Trover will lie where a bank treats a special deposit as general assets. First Nat. Bank v. Dunbar, 19 Ill. App. 558.

4. Boyle v. Levings, 28 Ill. 314.

During the civil war, a customer of a bank in South Carolina left $4,000 of his own bills with the bank as security for the return of a like sum of Confederate treasury notes borrowed for a limited time. Within this time he tendered this sum in treasury notes and demanded a return of the bank bills; and upon the refusal of the bank to deliver them, brought trover for their conversion. It was held that his right to recover was not taken away by the fact that the property pledged was money or bills of the bank itself, but that the same principle was to govern as if the article deposited had been a watch or a jewel. Abrahams v. Southwestern, etc., Bank, 1 S. Car. 441.

But where the plaintiff alleged that she deposited with the defendant money, by handing him a check drawn in her favor which she had collected, and that he had refused to turn over the proceeds of the check on demand, it was held that the action was to recover a deposit, and not for a conversion. Moore v. Craig (B'klyn City Ct.), 4 N. Y. In an action to recover certain notes, or their proceeds, executed by the plaintiff and delivered to the defendant for the purpose of being discounted, the complaint alleged that the defendant had them discounted and converted the proceeds to his own use, except as to $901 paid by the defendant to the plaintiff as a pretended loan or advance, and on the representation that the defendant had not been able to discount the notes. Since it is the regular and usual course of business in commercial transactions, to deliver out a bill of exchange left for acceptance, to any person who mentions the amount and describes any private mark or number upon it, and if the clerk of the party leaving it, by his conduct enables a stranger to discover the mark or number, in consequence of which the bill is delivered out to him, the party leaving it cannot maintain trover for the bill against the party who so delivered it out. Morrison v. Buchanan, 6 C. & P. 20; 25 E. C. L. 258. See De Lizardi v. Pennell, 25 L. J. Q. B. 387.

In Brind v. Hampshire, 1 M. & W. 365, A, resident abroad, remitted a bill to B, his agent in London, drawn by A and specifically indorsed by him to C, with whom A's children were at school, in payment of C's account for their board and lodging. B got the bill accepted by the drawees and sent a letter by post to C, stating that he had got a commission from A to pay her some money on account of his children, and desired to be informed when and how it should be delivered. B subsequently was instructed by A not to pay the bill to C until an investigation of A's accounts should take place. The investigation never took place. It was held that C could not recover it in trover.

In Buck v. Kent, 3 Vt. 99, the plaintiff gave his note to the defendant, to whose order it was payable, in exchange for two horses, upon the understanding that if the plaintiff should elect to rescind the contract, the note was to be returned. The plaintiff did rescind, but the defendant transferred the note to a third person, who recovered its value against the plaintiff. It was held that trover was maintainable for the note, the measure of damages being its face value. Murray v. Burling, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 172.

Where the plaintiff indorsed bills to A. B., specially in this form: "Pay A. B. or order for account of the plaintiffs," and A. B. pledged the bills with the defendant for his private debt, it was held that the defendant took them with sufficient notice that they did not belong to A. B., and the defendant was liable to the plaintiffs in an action of trover. Byles on Bills (Wood's ed.), p. 84; Treuttell v. Barandon, 8 Taunt. 100; 4 E. C. L. 33; 1 Moo. 5.

Where the plaintiff, the holder of a bill of exchange made payable at the defendant's banking house, lost it before maturity, and both the acceptor and the plaintiff notified the defendant not to discount it, nevertheless he did discount it, and afterwards debited his customer with the amount of the bill, wrote a discharge on it and delivered it up to the customer as the banker's voucher of his account, it was held muniments of title to real estate,¹ policies of insurance,² or other evidences of ownership in property,³ where the act of the defendant amounts to a conversion according to the tests heretofore given. The maker of a note may maintain the action against one who wrongfully retains possession and refuses to deliver it up on demand.⁴ Trover lies against a payee who has wrongfully dis-that the defendant was guilty of an actual conversion. Byles (Wood's ed.), p. 549; Down v. Halling, 4 B. & C. 330; 10 E. C. L. 347; Lovell v. Martin, 4 Taunt. 799.

In Wilkinson v. Whalley, 5 M. & G. 590; 44 E. C. L. 311, A, to whom B was indebted, received a bill from B to get discounted, or return to A on demand. A sent the bill to C with directions to place it to A's account with C, which C did, minus the discount. It was held in trover by B against A, that this was substantially a discounting of the bill; and that A was entitled to a verdict under a plea of not possessed. Aikens v. Owen, 4 A. & E. 819; 31 E. C. L. 191; Roberts v. Wyatt, 2 Taunt. 268; Perry v. Frame, 2 Bos. & P. 451.

The action will lie by an administrator against a stranger for the conversion of a title deed of the plaintiff's intestate. Towle v. Lovet, 6 Mass. 394.

In Gleason v. Owen, 35 Vt. 588, the action was allowed for the recovery of parish records. Sawyer v. Baldwin, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 492; Stebbins v. Jennings, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 172.

Land scrip may be recovered in an action of trover. Nelson v. King, 25 Tex. 655.

In Gleason v. Owen, 35 Vt. 588, where two notes and a mortgage to secure the same were executed, the notes transferred, and the mortgage deed delivered to the defendant, and the defendant afterwards, but before a written assignment of the mortgage had been made to him, sold and transferred the notes to the plaintiff and agreed to get the mortgage deed, which was then in the hands of another person, and delivered it to the plaintiff, which he afterwards refused to do, it was held that the plaintiff could maintain trover for the deed.

Title Deeds.—Where A sold an estate to B, who paid part of the purchase-money, and it was agreed that the title deeds should be deposited with C, and delivered up to B, when he paid the residue, and subsequently A got possession of them again and pledged them to a third party for a valuable consideration, it was held that B, on tendering the remainder of the purchase-money, might recover the deeds from such party. Cooper v. Ramsbottom, 2 Taunt. 12.

In an action for the conversion of a title deed, it is not necessary to give the defendant notice to produce the deed to be given in evidence at the trial; and parol evidence of the existence and contents of the deed is admissible, unless it is produced without notice. *Aswald v. posed of, or refused to hand over, a paid note.¹ On the other hand, the action may be maintained by the payee against the maker for a wrongful conversion.²

But it is held that the action cannot be maintained for the conversion of a judgment, or for a note on which judgment has been recovered.³

4. Shares of Stock.—Certificates of corporate stock, of which the owner has been wrongfully deprived, may be the subject of an action of trover.⁴ And it seems that whenever there is a conversion of shares by means of a wrongful use of a certificate, the owner

L. 748; Lowremore v. Berry, 19 Ala. 130. In Otisfield v. Mayberry, 63 Me. 197, it was said: "The maker of a note has a right to its possession upon payment. In his hand it is evidence of such payment. In the hands of a stranger it is prima facie evidence of indebtedness. If a suit is brought, it imposes upon the maker the necessity of a defense, the procurement of testimony, the employment of counsel, and the delay, expense and vexatious litigation. The possession of it by the maker is of importance. See Neal v. Hanson, 60 Me. 84.

Trover will lie for a note which has been paid and left by mistake in the hands of the holder. Pierce v. Gilson, 9 Vt. 216.

Where the plaintiff gave a note for accommodation to the defendant, who was to pay and take care of it and save the defendant from liability, and the defendant paid and took up the note, after using it for the purpose designed, and then claimed to hold it as a valid instrument and refused to give it up, it was held that the plaintiff had a right to maintain trover for it. Park v. McDaniels, 37 Vt. 594.

Where notes were deposited with the defendant to be held as security until a piece of land conveyed by the plaintiff to a third person, and by him to the defendant, should be relieved of certain mortgages, and the plaintiff took up the mortgaged note procured by the mortgage to be discharged against the other, the mortgagee being dead, he tendered to the defendant, together with the mortgaged notes and indemnifying bond, which was accepted, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to have them back and maintain trover for them against the defendant, having sufficiently complied with the condition on which they were given. Robbins v. Packard, 31 Vt. 570; 76 Am. Dec. 134.

Trover, however, will not lie for a paid note by the maker against a holder or payee, where the latter denies the payment, since it is undesirable to litigate a question of payment in such an action. Pierce v. Gilson, 9 Vt. 216.

2. Alexander v. Rundle, 75 Ill. 85. But to enable the payee to maintain the action, a wrongful taking must be shown, or a refusal to deliver the same when demanded by the plaintiff.

may count either upon the conversion of the certificate, or the shares themselves without mention of the certificate, since the one is merely symbolical of the other.¹

In Ayres v. French, 41 Conn. 150, Parke, C. J., said: "There is really no difference in any important respect between shares of stock and other kinds of personal property. A man purchases a share of stock and pays $100 for it; he afterwards purchases a horse and pays the same price. The one was purchased in the market as readily as the other, and can be sold and delivered as readily; the one can be pledged as collateral security as easily as the other; as easily attached to secure a debt, and its value as easily estimated. The one enriches a man as much as the other, and fills as important a place in the inventory of his estate. It is considered personal property, as substantial as the other, both in law and in the transactions of men. It is, therefore, as great a moral wrong to convert the one to his own use as it would be the other, and it ought to be as great a legal wrong. . . . What matters it whether the thing itself is capable of being taken into hand and carried away, so long as it is personal property of as substantial value as any other; and in no case can the thing itself be recovered in this form of action, but only its value. There was force in the claim originally when trover was confined to property lost. From the nature of the action it could not then lie unless the property was tangible. The fiction of lost property is still retained, but the allegation has long since ceased to be substantial, and there is no longer any reason for requiring that the property should be tangible. . . . If a certificate of stock is unlawfully retained, when demanded, what is presumed to have been converted? The certificate has no intrinsic value disconnected from the stock which it represents. No one would say that the paper alone had been converted—that the conversion of the paper constituted the entire wrong. The real act done in such case is precisely the same as done here, no more, no less; and to say that trover will lie in one case and not in the other, is to make a distinction, where there is really no difference. Conversion is the gist of the action of trover . . . and we think that in these days, when the tendency of courts is to do away with technicalities not based on reason, a technical distinction of this character should no longer be sustained."

It seems difficult to understand why a share of stock cannot be made the subject of an action of trover when it is remembered that, in every jurisdiction where that section of the statute of frauds is in force, which declares that no contract for the sale of any goods, wares and merchandise, for the price of £10 or upwards, shall be allowed to be good unless, etc., it has been held that a share of stock comes within the scope of the word "goods." See Ayres v. French, 41 Conn. 151; North v. Forest, 15 Conn. 400; Reed on Statute of Frauds, vol. 3; Cook on Stock, § 566; Biddle on Stock Brokers, p. 349.

Where certificates of stock are purchased from one who has wrongfully taken them from the owner, and the purchaser has reason to suspect this, as where the shares are purchased from a youth of sixteen years for one-third of their value, the purchaser may be liable for conversion. Anderson v. Nicholas, 28 N. Y. 600.

Budd v. Multnomah St. R. Co., 12 Oregon 271; 53 Am. Rep. 355; Connor v. Hillier, 11 Rich. (S. Car.) 193; 73 Am. Dec. 105.

1. In McAllister v. Kuhn, 96 U. S. 89, Waite, C. J., said: "It is true that a certificate of stock is not stock itself, but it is documentary evidence of title to stock and may be used for the purpose of symbolical delivery, as the stock itself is incapable of actual delivery. A blank indorsement of a certificate may be filled up by writing an assignment and power of attorney over the signature indorsed. In this way an actual transfer of the stock on the books of the corporation may be perfected. A wrongful use of such an indorsed certificate for such a purpose may operate as a conversion of the stock."

In Pennsylvania,¹ however, it is held that while trover may be maintained for the wrongful use of a certificate,² yet it will not lie for the conversion of the shares, as shares.

It is not every wrongful dealing with a certificate which will amount to a conversion of the shares; trover will not lie where the title of the shares has been divested.³ An unlawful retention of a certificate of stock which can be transferred only by the indorsement of the owner, while amounting to a technical conversion of the certificate, will not work a conversion of the shares.⁴

In Daggett v. Davis, 53 Mich. 35; 51 Am. Rep. 91, it was said: "We see no reason why, if the shares are converted by means of a wrongful use of the certificate, the owner in suing may not count upon the conversion of either. The shares are the property converted, but the certificate itself is also property; standing as it does as the representative of the shares from the owner, it seems to be as proper to count upon its conversion as upon the conversion of money or any chattel." See also Morton v. Preston, 18 Mich. 60; 100 Am. Dec. 146.

In Payne v. Elliot, 54 Cal. 339; 35 Am. Rep. 80, it was held that in an action for the conversion of shares of stock of a corporation, it is the "shares of stock" which constitute the property, and not the certificate; and that an action is maintainable for the conversion of the shares of stock which the certificate represents, as well as that of the certificate.

A conversion of the certificate by the corporation amounts to conversion of the stock. Condouris v. Imperial Tobacco, etc., Co. (C. Pl.), 22 N. Y. Supp. 655; Ryman v. Gerlach, 153 Pa. St. 197.

An action will lie, although the plaintiff used the terms "shares of stock" and "certificates of stock" interchangeably. Godfrey v. Pell, 49 N. Y. Super. Ct. 226.

A stockholder whose stock has been canceled on the books of a company, and new stock has been issued to one not entitled thereto, may abandon his claim to the stock and pursue his remedy for its value against anyone who has illegally converted it. Baker v. Wasson, 59 Tex. 140.

1. In Sewall v. Lancaster Bank, 17 S. & R. (Pa.) 285, it was said: "Though trover might lie for a certificate of stock, as it does for a bond or a deed, yet it will not lie for one hundred shares of bank stock, any more than it would for a debt due on a right of entry." In Neiler v. Kelley, 69 Pa. St. 407, where there was a declaration of a single count in trover for seventy shares of stock of the value of $100 each, and for four bonds of $1,000 each, it was held on demurrer, that the declaration was defective as to the stock, but not as to the bonds, and a demurrer to the whole declaration was properly overruled. Sharswood, J., said: "A share of stock is an incorporeal, intangible thing. It is a right to a certain proportion of the capital stock of a corporation—never realized except upon the dissolution and winding up of the corporation—with the right to receive meantime, such profits as may be made and declared in the shape of dividends. Trover can no more be maintained for a share of the capital stock of a corporation than it can for the interest of a partner in a partnership firm. The two cases are precisely analogous. But the document or writing which is the evidence of ownership is a tangible corporeal thing—the subject not only of property but of possession—the right to which is essential in trover."

3. Broadbent v. Varley, 12 C. B. N. S. 214; 104 E. C. L. 214.

In Sturges v. Keith, 57 Ill. 451; 11 Am. Rep. 28, it was held that where a party authorized to sell certain stocks, who violates his instructions, or in any manner abuses his authority to the injury of his principal, his wrongful acts in that regard will not constitute a conversion so as to support trover.

The action will not lie to recover stock which the plaintiff has placed in the defendant's hands to be used in his business. Borland v. Stokes, 120 Pa. St. 278.

4. In Daggett v. Davis, 53 Mich. 35; 51 Am. Rep. 91, where a certificate of stock accidentally became mixed with some papers of the defendant, the certificate could avail the defendant nothing,

A corporation is liable if it refuses to register a transfer in the name of one entitled to the stock. And the same is true with respect to the assignee who sues the corporation for refusing the transfer or issue of a certificate of stock, it being immaterial that the assignment was not made on its books in pursuance of its charter and by-laws. The right of the assignee to sue becomes perfected when he makes his right known to the corporation, and requires the transfer to be entered upon its books.¹ But the corporation is not liable for a conversion upon a refusal to transfer stock pending a contest between several claimants therefor.² Where stock is put up as collateral security for a debt, trover may be maintained if, after payment, the pledgee fraudulently sells the stock.³ In general, if anyone standing in a fiduciary relation to another, violates any rule of law defining that relation, which has the effect of depriving the owner of his property, the latter may elect to treat that act as tortious, and sue in trover. Thus, if a bailee of stock vested with a power of sale, upon the because, being in the name of the plaintiff, it could be transferred only by his indorsement. It was held that while there was a technical conversion of the certificate, there was no conversion of the stock itself. The measure of damages here was the inconvenience occasioned by the unlawful act of the defendant.

The above is to be compared with Morton v. Preston, 18 Mich. 60; 10 Am. Dec. 146, where the widow and heirs of a stockholder in a corporation, thinking to avoid the expense of administration, took his certificate of shares, indorsed their names upon it and then left it with one of their number to be sold for the benefit of all. This one, instead of selling it, pledged it for his own debt and the pledgee was recognized by the corporation as the owner of the stock, and disposed of it as owner. An administrator upon the original shareholder's estate having been appointed, he brought suit against the pledgee, and it was held that trover was maintainable, and that the damage sustained was the value of the stock.

B. 333, where the president of the defendant corporation assigned certain shares of stock in the same to the plaintiff, and upon application to the secretary of the company to register the assignment, the latter refused the registry; it was held that the plaintiff could recover even though his assignor, as president of the company, might have perfected the transfer to himself.

Where the defendants, stock brokers, at the request of the plaintiff and for him, but in their own names and with their own funds, purchased certain stocks, he depositing with them a margin of ten per cent., which was to be kept good, they carrying the stocks for him, it was held that the legal relation created between the parties was necessarily that of pledgor and pledgee, the stock purchased being the property of the plaintiff, and the effect pledged to the defendants as security for the repayment of advances made by them in noncompliance of a condition by his bailor, purchases at his own sale, either in person or through the agency of a broker, the bailor may waive his right to sue for breach of contract and sue for the conversion.¹ And where stock has been wrongfully converted by a trustee, the cestui que trust may either compel a redelivery of the stock, or claim the value at the time of the conversion.²

5. Severed Portions of the Realty.—The action of trover, as a rule, will not lie for fixtures, or property which is attached to, and forms a part of, the freehold,³ but if anything attached to the freehold is wrongfully detached therefrom by a trespasser, the property in the thing severed vests immediately in the person entitled to the

the purchase; and that a sale of such stock by them, except in judicial proceedings, or after a demand upon him for the repayment of such advances and commissions and a reasonable personal notice to him of their intention to make such sale in case of default in payment, specifying the time and place of sale, was a wrongful conversion by them of the property of the plaintiff. Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 235. See also Baker v. Drake, 66 N. Y. 518; 23 Am. Rep. 80.

Where A held stock of B's as collateral security for a debt due by B, sold it without authority and appropriated the proceeds to his own use, B then demanded the stock and offered to pay his debt, but did not tender any money; but A, without objecting that money was not tendered, refused the demand upon the pretense that he had a right to hold the stock in pledge for the debt of a third person; it was held that B might recover from A the market value of the stock on the day of the demand with interest, less the amount of his debt, without any further demand or tender. Fisher v. Brown, 104 Mass. 259; 6 Am. Rep. 235. See also Bayard v. Farmers', etc., Bank, 52 Pa. St. 234; Pratt v. Taunton Copper Mfg. Co., 123 Mass. 110; 25 Am. Rep. 37; Salisbury Mills v. Townsend, 109 Mass. 115; Sewall v. Boston Water Power Co., 4 Allen (Mass.) 277; 81 Am. Dec. 701. Under similar circumstances, in an action of trover for the collateral, it was held that the defendant might recoup the balance due him from the damages for the conversion. Work v. Bennett, 70 Pa. St. 484. See also Narbring v. Bank of Mobile, 58 Ala. 204.

1. In Maryland F. Ins. Co. v. Dalrymple, 25 Md. 242; 89 Am. Dec. 779, the plaintiff borrowed money from the defendant, depositing certain stock as collateral. The contract of loan provided that if the plaintiff should not repay the loan at a certain day, the defendant was authorized to sell the stock without further notice. The loan not being repaid on the day appointed, the defendant sold the collateral in the stock exchange and bought it in himself through the agency of a stock broker. It was held that the sale of the pledge by the defendant to himself was contrary to the faith of the bailment, forbidden by the common law and might have been treated by the bailor as a tortious conversion of the property. No such election being made by the plaintiff, there was no conversion, and the bailment continued.

In Dean v. Turner, 31 Md. 52, a bond was lent by the plaintiff to G., who borrowed it at the defendant's suggestion for the purpose of raising money to form a partnership with A. G. hypothecated the bond with the defendant as collateral security for an advance of $1,000 made by the defendant, the latter agreeing to return the bond when the $1,000 should be paid. The money was fully paid and the return of the bond demanded, but the defendant refused and sought to hold it as security for another debt due by A. before the formation of the partnership but assumed by the partners who repledged the bond. It was held that trover was maintainable against the defendant; that G. had no authority to repledge the bond for the antecedent indebtedness, of which fact the defendant was well aware.

Nor could the action be maintained against one who, without notice, had purchased real property, a part of which had been sold by his vendor as personalty, with a stipulation that the title should not pass until it was paid for, but which had been allowed to be made a part of the realty. Landlord and Tenant.—A tenant who has the use and not the dominion of property demises; and, therefore, when he separates any part of it to convert it from a chattel real to a chattel personal, the property in the thing reverts to the owner of the fee, who has the right to the immediate possession of it. And if the tenant wrongfully uses or disposes of it, or commits any act tantamount to a conversion, he is liable in trover. Property attached to the freehold, such as mill machinery, and demised with the realty, for the purposes of this action, is the same as standing trees or other property attached by nature to the earth. Farrant v. Thompson, 5 B. & Ald. 826; 7 E. C. L. 272. See LANDLORD AND TENANT, vol. 12, p. 658; FIXTURES, vol. 8, p. 41.

In New York, it has been held that the right to bring trover for chattels severed from the freehold depends upon whether the severance and the conversion are two distinct acts. If they are, the plaintiff's only remedy is an action of trespass, or its equivalent under the code. In American Union Tel. Co. v. Middleton, 80 N. Y. 408, where the defendant had telegraph poles on the highway and carried them to the side fence on the road and there left them, it was held that the proper of the land resists the removal of such building, or otherwise converts it to his own use, he will be liable in trover, either to the builder or his assignee.¹ Trover may be maintained to recover growing crops illegally converted,² trees and timber when severed,³ form of action was trespass quare clausum fregit, and that trover would not lie. Miller, J., said: "It is quite obvious that the cutting of the poles and the removal of them was one continuous and uninterrupted transaction, inseparably connected, which constituted a single cause of action which cannot be divided into two actions—one for the cutting and another for the conversion. The one was a part of the other, and the conversion so coupled with the cutting that they were the same and both of them are thus made local."

In Wright v. Guier, 9 Watts (Pa.) 172; 36 Am. Dec. 108, Gibson, C. J., said: "The true reason why trover or replevin lies not against an actual occupant is not any supposed locality of the question, but the impolicy of suffering him to be harassed with his separate action for each bushel of wheat consumed or stick of firewood burnt on the premises instead of having the matter settled at once by an action to recover the possession."

In Mather v. Trinity Church, 3 S. & R. (Pa.) 509; 8 Am. Dec. 663, the plaintiffs had for ninety years been in possession of land, a portion of which had not been inclosed, but nevertheless was occupied. Near the boundary line of the land claimed by the plaintiffs was a stone quarry, out of which the defendant dug and carried away the stone and gravel which were the subject of this action of trover. Both the plaintiffs and the defendant claimed to have been in possession of this quarry. The judge charged the jury that, although they should be of opinion that the defendant had the exclusive and adverse possession of the land from which the stones were taken, for any time less than twenty-one years, yet the plaintiff defendant has the actual occupation, "not a bare solitary trespass, but an actual, visible, notorious, hostile occupation."¹ A mere temporary holding for the purpose of excluding a trespasser, by nature having no right of possession, is not sufficient to defeat the constructive possession which the law casts upon an owner not an actual occupant.²

V. WHO LIABLE IN TROVER—1. In General.—As everyone who interferes with another man's right to the possession of his goods is guilty of a conversion, and as no man can, as a general rule, give to another a better title than he possesses himself, a series of persons may each be guilty of successive acts of conversion of the might recover in the action of trover, which was held to be error. Tilghman, C. J., said: "This is not the proper form of action to try the title to land, nor have I been able to find any case where it has been sustained for that purpose, although there are many cases where it has been brought for the conversion of wood and coal, when the right of the freehold was not claimed by the defendants. The inconvenience of trover to try the title to land would be great; for being a transitory action, the trial might be transferred to a distant county or even to a distant state, if the defendant should happen to be found there. Neither is the action maintainable when the possession of the land was held adversely to the plaintiff."

The leading case of Player v. Roberts, 1 Jones 243 (cited in Viner's Abr. 237, pl. 7), is thus explained by Tilghman, C. J., in Mather v. Trinity Church, 3 S. & R. (Pa.) 509; 8 Am. Dec. 663: "A, the lord of a manor, leased to B all the coal and coal mines open or to be found in the manor. C was a copyholder of parcel of the manor for term of his life. A entered on the copyhold during C's life and dug coal, which he converted to his own use. B recovered against him in trover, although neither A nor B could enter into the copyhold without being trespassers. But it must be remarked that the title and possession of the copyholder were not adverse to B, because he claimed no right to the coal; so that, although B could not have entered to dig that coal, yet being dug, A did him wrong in converting it to his own use, because A had leased to him all the coal in the manor. There was no contest about the title to the lands, but only about the coal. The title was confessed by both A and B to be in C, so that as between A and B it was proper to consider the possession of the coal as in B."

The Pennsylvania Act of May 16th, 1871 (P. L. 268), altered the existing law in so far as it applied to the action of replevin, but in National Transit Co. v. Weston, 121 Pa. St. 485, the action of trover was decided to have been unaffected by this legislation. Renick v. Boyd, 99 Pa. St. 557; 44 Am. Rep. 124.

A wrong possession from one part of the tract to another, or entries into it to take timber for a sawmill, or wood for an iron-works, is not such an adverse possession as will exempt the defendant from this form of action. Potts v. Gilbert, 3 W. N. C. (Pa.) 475; Sorber v. Willing, 10 Watts (Pa.) 141; Adams v. Robinson, 6 Pa. St. 271; Hole v. Rittenhouse, 25 Pa. St. 491.

In Yates v. French, 25 Wis. 661, to an action of trover for cutting down and converting three million feet of lumber, the property of the plaintiff, the defendants were justified under a license given them by the plaintiff, in compensation for a trespass committed by the latter upon their land. It was held that since the license was revocable, and hence created no interest in the land, the justification of the defendant raised no question of title to real estate so as to defeat the action on the ground that it was local.

2. The mere temporary occupancy for the purpose of taking off timber by one having no right of possession, is not such an actual possession as defeats the constructive possession which the law casts upon the owner. Brewer v. Fleming, 314 Pa. St. 102.

An action of trover will lie by the owner of the legal title to land to recover the value of wood cut upon it by a trespasser; and he who purchased the land at a sheriff's sale as the property of one who had trespassed upon it by cutting timber, and in pursuance of his

same goods, and each therefore be liable to an action of trover by the owner, although there can be but one recovery; the choice of defendants lies with the owner, and his election cannot be hampered by considerations of moral guilt or innocence of any tortfeasor.¹ The fact that an action could be maintained against a carrier who wrongfully delivered goods is no defense to an action against the person to whom they were delivered.² A corporation is responsible in its corporate capacity for a conversion committed by one of its officers or agents, but the injured party may proceed against the agent or officer individually.³

He who intermeddles with personal property not his own must see to it that he is protected by the authority of ownership, or otherwise clothed with the authority he attempts to assert.⁴ So one who assists a wrongdoer, even though he acts as agent, in the execution of his act, is liable regardless of his ignorance of the rights of the owner or his participation in the profits of the illegal enterprise.⁵ But trover will not lie against a servant for taking goods by his master's command and for his master's use, when the command is not to do an apparent wrong, and the servant's possession is lawful.⁶ purchase continued to cut timber also, at the same time owning and occupying adjoining lands, included in the same deed from the sheriff, has not such a colorable title or possession as will protect him from this form of action. Wright v. Guier, 9 Watts (Pa.) 172; 36 Am. Dec. 108.

Where A, having bona fide purchased a stolen horse at public auction, sent it for sale to a repository for horses kept by B, and the owner of the horse found it there and upon the demand of it of B, in the presence of A, B refused to deliver it, it was held that there was a joint conversion. Lee v. Bayes, 18 C. B. 599; 86 E. C. L. 597.

Auctioneer.—In Hoffman v. Carow, 22 Wend. (N. Y.) 285, it was held that an auctioneer who, although in the regular course of business, receives and sells stolen goods, is liable to the true owner as for conversion. But this was denied in Rogers v. Hine, 2 Cal. 571; 56 Am. Dec. 363.

Where a mortgagor, by false and fraudulent representations, prevailed upon the mortgagee to allow the mortgaged goods to remain in his possession, and for the purpose of cheating and defrauding the mortgagee, sent the goods to an auctioneer, by whom they were sold and the proceeds paid over to the mortgagor, it was held that the mortgagee might maintain trover for the goods against the auctioneer, although the auctioneer did not participate in the fraud and had no knowledge of the fact of the mortgage. Coles v. Clark, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 399.

Where the owner of a horse lent him to a person, who subsequently exchanged him with the defendant for another horse, and the defendant afterwards loaned him to another person, it was held that the defendant was who has no power to sell,¹ and disposes of it, or otherwise shows an intent to appropriate it to his own use, although in good faith, may be liable in trover. A purchaser of personal property on which there is a valid lien recorded, is liable in an action of trover if he sells it.² The general rule, however, is not applicable to one who seizes bank bills or other negotiable instruments transferable merely by delivery.³ And a mere naked bailee of stolen goods, although with knowledge that they are stolen, who does no act and has no intent to appropriate the property to his own use, but delivers it up before any demand to the person from whom he received it, is not liable in trover.⁴

In McMorris v. Simpson, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 610, Bronson, J., said, the general rule that the action of trover "may be maintained whenever the agent has wrongfully converted the property of his principal to his own use; and the fact of conversion will be made out, by showing either a demand and refusal, or that the agent has, without necessity, sold or otherwise disposed of the property contrary to his instructions. When an agent wrongfully refuses to surrender the goods of his principal, or wholly departs from his authority in disposing of them, he makes the property his own, and may be treated as a tort-feasor."

In Lavery v. Snethen, 68 N. Y. 525, Church, C. J., said: "The result of the authorities is that if the agent parts with the property in a way or for a purpose not authorized, he is liable for a conversion." In this case the plaintiff indorsed and delivered a note to the defendant for negotiation, with the instruction that the defendant was not to let the note get out of his reach without receiving the money. The defendant delivered the note to F., under a promise by the latter that he would get it discounted and return the proceeds. Where F. took the note, got the proceeds and appropriated them, it was held that, "The act of the defendant in permitting the note to get out of his possession and beyond his reach was an act which he had no legal right to do. It was an unlawful interference with the plaintiff's property."

In Syeds v. Hay, 4 T. R. 260, where the owner of goods on a vessel moored at a certain wharf, directed the captain not to land them on that wharf, but he did so, supposing the wharfinger had a lien upon them for wharfage, it was held that the captain was liable in trover. In Spencer v. Blackman, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 167, where a watch was delivered to the defendant to have its value appraised by a watchmaker, and he put it into the possession of a watchmaker, and it was levied upon by virtue of an execution issued against the owner, the act of the defendant was held to be a conversion.

Where a factor in Buffalo was directed to sell wheat at a specified price on a particular day, or ship it to New York, his failure to sell or ship on that day, selling it on the day following at the price named, was held to be a conversion. Scott v. Rogers, 31 N. Y. 676.

When a wife gave a note to an attorney with instructions to pay it over to her husband when he should obtain a divorce, but the attorney indorsed it over to a bank which collected it from the maker, it was held that he was liable as for the conversion. Eadger v. Hatch, 71 Me. 562.

If empowered to sell goods, the agent pledges them,¹ or makes an exchange of the property,² the action may be maintained against him. An agent to whom money is intrusted to be loaned or invested in the name of his principal, is liable for a conversion if he invests it in his own name,³ or makes an investment not authorized.⁴

But if the agent sells in accordance with his authority, although under the fixed price;⁵ fails to take sufficient security therefor;⁶ or misapplies the proceeds of the sale, the action of trover cannot be maintained against him.⁷

In Comley v. Dazian, 114 N. Y. 166, plaintiffs executed a bill of sale to F. of certain property which remained in the possession of the plaintiffs. F., at the plaintiffs' direction, transferred the bill of sale to the defendant, under an arrangement by which the defendant should take possession of the goods, and, with the consent and approval of the plaintiffs and not otherwise, sell them and distribute the proceeds to plaintiffs' creditors. Where the defendant sold the goods without such consent, it was held to be a conversion.

In Galbreath v. Epperson (Tenn. 1886), 1 S. W. Rep. 157, where cotton was shipped to brokers in Memphis to be held by them for sale on an advance in the price, the shipment of the cotton to a foreign port without the knowledge of the consignor, was held to be a conversion, although the defendants accounted for the cotton as sold in Memphis at the market price there.

4. So where money was placed in the hands of the defendant to invest in good real-estate security, but he retained the money in his possession and caused his wife to assign to the plaintiff a bond not representing an investment of money, but obtained as a part of the consideration expressed in a real estate trade by her, and secured by mortgage on property already fully incumbered, the agent was held liable for its conversion. *King v. to convert it. Moore v. McKibbin, 33 Barb. (N. Y.) 247; Dufresme v. Hutchinson, 3 Taunt. 117.

In Sarjeant v. Blunt, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 74, an agent who, under authority to sell, sold a watch deposited with him, for three hundred dollars, when told not to sell for less than five hundred dollars, was held to be guilty of a breach of trust, not conversion. In this case, Spencer, J., said: "If every departure from instruction is to expose a party to an action of trover, I should consider it as introducing a new rule which might operate injuriously. There is no need of this refinement. An action on the case is well calculated to redress an injury arising from a breach of instructions. In this case the defendant was authorized to sell the chronometer for a particular price. The complaint is not that he sold it, but that he sold it for a less sum, and thus violated his orders. The selling was not a conversion, but selling for a less price was a breach of duty."

6. In Cairnes v. Bleeker, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 300, where an agent authorized to deliver goods to a third person on receiving sufficient security for the amount, took security which was inadequate, it was held that trover did not lie against the agent, but that the proper remedy was an action on the case.

See also Stierneland v. Holden, 4 B. & C. 5.

And, in general, it may be said that the agent will not be liable as for a conversion so long as he acts within the scope of his authority.¹

4. Pledges.—Action for breach of promise or pledge is not the only remedy of the parties to the contract, but whenever there has been a disregard of the property rights of one party by the other, the more efficacious remedy is the action of trover. Upon the performance of the engagement for which the security is given, the lien of the pledgee is at an end, and upon a refusal to return the property, or his wrongful disposition thereof, the action of trover lies.²

5. Mortgages.—A mortgage of personal property passes the whole legal title to the mortgagee conditionally, and upon failure to perform the condition within a stipulated period, the sale or disposition of the property by the mortgagee, subject to the right of redemption, is not a conversion;³ but if he transfer or

In Holmes v. Bell, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 322, where personal property mortgaged to secure the payment of a note in six months was immediately delivered to the mortgagee, by whom it was sold on the expiration of sixty days for the breach of condition, it was held that the mortgagor could not maintain trover therefor against the mortgagee by proving that the note was given to indemnify the latter against the liability incurred by him for the mortgagor, which had terminated without damage to the mortgagee, and that the property had been demanded of him before the commencement of action. In this case the court said, "If the property had been pledged, the action might have been maintained if the defendants had never been damnified, for in that case they would have no right to sell the property, and such sale would have been wrongful and would have been a conversion for which trover would lie, the pledgee's special property having been terminated by their wrongful act and the general property always having remained in the plaintiff. But the law is otherwise in the case of a mortgage. By such a conveyance, the whole legal title passes to the mortgagee conditionally; and in the present case the condition had not been performed at the time of the sale; and at that time the legal title of the property was in the defendant and the plaintiff had no right to the possession. By the sale the legal title was vested in the purchaser, and the subsequent demands on the defendant were of no avail."

In Wood v. Dudley, 8 Vt. 435, the difference between a mortgage and pledge is thus stated: "The difference between a mortgage and a pledge is important; the effects of each are widely different. In a mortgage of a personal chattel the general property passed to the mortgagee subject to be redeemed according to the terms of contract; if not redeemed within the time limit, the property becomes absolute in the mortgagee. The consequence is that the mortgagee may sell or dispose of the chattel immediately, but in case of a pledge the general sell after the condition is fully performed, or tender of payment is duly made;¹ or if he sell or transfer the entire property before default, the mortgagor may maintain an action in trover against him for the conversion,² although it has been held that it makes no difference whether the sale is made before or after default, if the mortgagor does not make tender or payment before the lapse of the time allowed for redemption.³ And it is held, that if a sale is made of part of the mortgaged property, a sufficient amount to pay the debt, the mortgagee becomes bailee of the remainder, and if he deny the mortgagor's title, and assert absolute title thereto in himself, he is liable to an action of trover.⁴ If the mortgagee takes possession before default of the mortgaged property which, by the terms of the mortgage, the mortgagor has a right to retain until default, he is liable in an action of trover by the mortgagor.⁵

6. Fraudulent Vendees.—A sale effected by fraud does not make a change of property, but the true owner may maintain trover against a fraudulent vendee who, as such, has tortiously acquired possession;⁶ so, where a vendee purchases goods on credit by property does not pass, but remains in the pawnor, the pawnee having only the subject property or lien."

In Burdick v. McVanner, 2 Den. (N. Y.) 171, in which the mortgagor, after the day for the performance of the condition had passed, tendered the amount due and demanded the mortgaged property, which the defendant refused to deliver, and thereupon the mortgagee sued for the conversion, the action was held not maintainable. The court said: "At law he had no title whatever against the defendant, and could only redeem in equity, a right which in this case, owing to the small value of the property, could not be enforced in chancery. But this circumstance cannot change the construction of a mortgage, nor give to the plaintiff a right or a remedy which he would not have if the property was of greater value."

But where a party who held a mortgage of chattels took possession of them on a claim that he was the absolute owner, by virtue of the sale by the mortgagor, and converted them to his own use, and denied upon the stand at the trial that he held or claimed them by virtue of the mortgage, he was liable in trover, notwithstanding the mortgage. Clark v. Rideout, 39 N. H. 238.

the possession, has sold the property. Landon v. Emmons, 97 Mass. 37.

means of false representations and with a preconceived design not to pay for them, the vendor may treat the sale as void and bring an action of trover for the recovery of his property;¹ any exception to this rule is founded upon the fact that there has been some fault in the vendee, or that the property has passed to a bona fide purchaser.² But an exception does not maintain where the fraudulent vendee has wrongfully obtained possession of the goods from the defrauded vendor.³ And as against any sub-

In Ferguson v. Carrington, 9 B. & C. 52; 17 E. C. L. 330, where the defendant purchased goods on credit, fraudulently intending not to pay for them, it was held that while assumpsit would not lie for the goods sold before the time for credit expired, yet the plaintiff might treat the contract as void and maintain trover. See also Noble v. Adams, 7 Taunt. 59, per Lord Ellenborough.

In Ayres v. French, 41 Conn. 153, the action of trover was maintained to recover shares of bank stock which it was alleged the plaintiff was induced to part with, inconsideration of a promise which the defendant had no intention of fulfilling.

In Thurston v. Blanchard, 22 Pick. (Mass.) 18; 33 Am. Dec. 700; it was held that where goods were obtained by fraudulent representations upon the sale, demand and refusal to deliver are not necessary to maintain the action. Shaw, C. J., said: "Where goods have been tortiously obtained, that fact is sufficient evidence of conversion. Such a sale, obtained under false and fraudulent representations, may be avoided by the vendor, and he may insist that no title pass to the vendee, or any person taking under him, other than a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice, and in such case the seller may maintain replevin or trover for his goods." And in Farwell v. Hanchett, 120 Ill. 573, Sheldon, J., said: "It is quite well settled, that when goods have been obtained by fraud by a vendee, or otherwise unlawfully obtained, the vendor, or true owner, may, without previous demand, maintain trover or replevin for the goods, against any person not holding them as an innocent purchaser for value. . . . The fraudulent vendee is not considered a purchaser of the goods, but as a person who has tortiously gotten possession of them." See also Butters v. Haughwout, 42 Ill. 18; 89 Am. Dec. 401; Hardy v. Keeler, 56 Ill. 152; Moriarty v. Stofseran, 89 Ill. 528.

Measure of Damages.—Where the defendant obtained possession by purchase of the plaintiff when the latter was, by reason of intoxication, unable to make a contract, the measure of damages was held to be the difference between the value of the property delivered and the consideration received. A contract for the sale of goods obtained by fraud on the part of the purchaser, is void only at the election of the vendor; and it is too late to declare such election after the goods have passed into the hands of a bona fide purchaser. White v. Garden, 10 C. B. 919; 70 E. C. L. 918. See also to same effect, Parker v. Patrick, 5 T. R. 175; Wright v. Lawes, 4 Esp. 82.

Attaching Creditor.—But an attaching creditor who has not parted with his property upon the faith of the goods fraudulently purchased, does not stand upon the same ground as a bona fide purchaser. Bradley v. Obeare, 10 N. H. 477; Mowry v. Walsh, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 238.

3. Dean v. Yates, 22 Ohio St. 388. In Sheppard v. Shoolbred, C. & M. 1; 41 E. C. L. 39, Lord Abinger said: "Although a fraudulent vendee may be vendee with notice of the fraud, the action may be maintained by the owner.¹

7. Co-Owners—a. ENGLISH RULE.—One partner or joint tenant of a chattel cannot maintain trover against his co-tenant for any interference with his right of possession, unless there has been a destruction of the chattel or something equivalent thereto.² A sale of a chattel by one of two joint tenants is not a conversion, unless it operates altogether to deprive his co-tenant of his property therein.³

sued in trover, I do not agree that every other person may be subject to such an action into whose hands such goods may have passed. The case proposed is, that where the goods are fraudulently obtained and sold, no property passes to the vendee, and such is undoubtedly the fact; but in Taylor v. Plummer, 3 M. & S. 562, it is shown that where the original owner consents to the transfer, that effect does not follow. If the goods in this case were obtained by fraud, yet, if the defendants were not privy to that fraud, I am of the opinion that they are not liable in this action."

In Barnardiston v. Chapman, 4 East 121, a verdict for the plaintiff was not disturbed where it was shown that the plaintiffs and defendants were tenants in common of a ship, which the defendants took to another part of the kingdom, changed the name, altered its appearance, and then delivered it to a third party, who sent it on a voyage where it was lost. Whether the destruction was by means of the tenant in common, was left to the jury.

The conversion of a chattel by a tenant in common, from its general and profitable application, though it changes the form of the substance, is not such a destruction of the subject-matter as to prevent the plaintiff from taking and using it in its altered state, and so does not give the right of action. Fennings v. Granville, 1 Taunt. 241.

The secret removal of an entire chattel by one tenant in common, without the consent or knowledge of the other, and for the purpose of selling it and applying the proceeds to his own use, was held not to amount to a conversion; nor is it an unlawful act for which a co-tenant can maintain an action, even although the removal has created a lien on the chattel by a third party. Jones v. Brown, 25 L. J. Exch. 345.

Tenant in Common Realty.—Trover cannot be brought by one tenant in common against another tenant in common for cutting and selling the hay on the land without his permission. Jacobs v. Seward, 17 W. R. 735; 20 L. T. N. S. 448; L. R., 4 C. P. 328.

In Mayhew v. Herrick, 7 C. D. 249; 62 E. C. L. 29, commenting upon the rule as laid down by Littleton, Co. b. AMERICAN RULE.—The destruction or loss of the property or any act of appropriation by a tenant in common, which will preclude his co-tenant from any future enjoyment thereof, is a conversion for which trover may be maintained;¹ and a sale of the entire property by a tenant in common, in the majority of cases, is held to be a conversion;² although, in some cases, the annihilation of it, if that be possible, can be a conversion as against his co-tenant; it may be that the co-tenant may, if he sees fit, follow the thing and make title to it notwithstanding its sale, and deliver it to a third person, but it does not follow that where one tenant in common has dealt with the subject to an extent exceeding his authority, as where he sells out and out to a number of purchasers who carry away the articles, it would militate against the true understanding of the older authorities to hold that the party may treat that as a conversion."

Where one party takes raw material belonging to another, to work up and to manufacture articles on shares, and agrees to give the owner security for his share payable at a future time, but before doing so disposes of the property, the owner may maintain trover for his share. Rightmyer v. Raymond, 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 51. So where the plaintiff carried logs to the defendant's mill to be sawed on shares, and the defendant sold them, trover lay for the plaintiff to recover his share of the

If a co-tenant mutilate a printing press so as to take from it essential parts, he is liable in trover as for the conversion. Needham v. Hill, 127 Mass. 133.

In Sheldon v. Skinner, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 525; 21 Am. Dec. 161, the co-tenant was held liable in trover as for the destruction of the property, which he had turned into the street, and which was lost.

A joint owner of a note who takes it and without authority surrenders it to the maker for cancellation, is liable to his co-owner for its conversion. Winner v. Penniman, 35 Md. 163; 6 A. R. 385.

Liability to Officer.—When personal property, owned by two tenants, is attached in a suit against one of them, the officer is entitled to the control of the whole, although he can sell only an undivided moiety thereof on execution; and if, pending the attachment, the other co-tenant makes a division of the property and takes one-half of it to himself, he is liable to the officer in an action of trover, though the officer has sold the remaining half on execution and applied the proceeds towards to the satisfaction thereof. *Reed v. English rule is adopted.¹ The mere claim to exclusive ownership and retention of the property by the co-tenant has been held not to amount to conversion,² except where the common property is of a severable character capable of being divided by weight or measurement,³ when a tenant in common may sever and appropriate, or sell his share without being liable to an action of trover.⁴

Mingling wheat in a common bin, with a knowledge and assent of all parties, makes them tenants in common, and the disposal of the entire mass by one, subjects him to an action of trover. Nowlen v. Colt, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 461.

1. Oviatt v. Sage, 7 Conn. 95.

In North Carolina, one tenant in common of a chattel cannot sue another for a conversion unless the common property is destroyed, carried beyond the limits of the state, or, when perishable, so disposed of as to prevent the other from recovering it. Grim v. Wicker, 80 N. Car. 343; Pit v. Petway, 12 Ired. (N. Car.) 69; Lucas v. Wasson, 3 Dev. (N. Car.) 398; 24 Am. Dec. 266; Powell v. Hill, 64 N. Car. 169.

In Vermont, the sale of the entire chattel by a tenant in common is held not to be a conversion. Barton v. Burton, 27 Vt. 94; Tubbs v. Richardson, 6 Vt. 442; Welsh v. Clark, 12 Vt. 681; Sanborn v. Morrill, 15 Vt. 700; 40 Am. Dec. 701; Bates v. Marsh, 33 Vt. 122. Trover may be maintained against a co-tenant for using hay, the common property, but not for selling it. Lewis v. Clark, 59 Vt. 363.

The fact of the possession, in use by one or two tenants in common, of personal property, even though it prevents the possession and use by the other, is not ground for an action of trover, unless the possession develops into a destruction of the property or such a hostile appropriation as excludes the possibility of beneficial enjoyment, by which a conversion is established. Osborn v. Schenck, 83 N. Y. 201.

But in Michigan it is held that an assertion of ownership in the entire property by a tenant in common, in possession of the property as against his co-tenant, coupled with a refusal to allow the latter to hold at all, is equivalent to an ouster by him to his co-tenant, and amounts to a conversion. Bray v. Bray, 30 Mich. 479; Grove v. Wise, 39 Mich. 161; Webb v. Mann, 3 Mich. 139.

3. Lobdell v. Stowell, 37 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 88; aff'd 51 N. Y. 70; Burns v. Winchell, 44 Hun (N. Y.) 261; Ripley v. Davis, 15 Mich. 75; 90 Am. Dec. 262. In this last case the common property was a number of logs. So, where a tenant in common of grain, on a claim of exclusive right prevents his co-tenant from obtaining his share of the property, he is liable in trover for a conversion. Fiquet v. Allison, 12 Mich. 328; 86 Am. Dec. 54; Webb v. Mann, 3 Mich. 138; Channon v. Lusk, 2 Lans. (N. Y.) 211; Thomas v. Williams, 32 Hun (N. Y.) 260. But in Lehr v. Taylor, 90 Pa. St. 381, where, by the terms of the lease the defendant was to remain in possession until the crops should be divided, the action was maintainable.

4. Fobes v. Shattuck, 22 Barb. (N. Y.) 568; Channon v. Lusk, 2 Lans. (N. Y.) 211; Stall v. Wilbur, 77 N. Y. 158.

In Tripp v. Riley, 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 334, Johnson, J., said: "The common law gave tenants in common, of personal property, no remedy by legal proceedings for partition; they were compelled to resort to equity when they could not agree upon severance of their respective interests, and the common property was not in its nature severable. But I apprehend that the right of severance amongst tenants in common,

The purchaser from a co-tenant is not liable in trover simply by reason of his purchase, for he becomes a co-tenant, entitled to the rights, and subject to the obligations of the tenancy in common;¹ but if he sells the property or otherwise disposes of it, thereby destroying the future enjoyment by his co-tenant, he is liable for conversion.²

8. Public Officers.—An officer, who seizes goods by virtue of an execution or attachment directed to him, legal in all its forms, and issued against the plaintiff, cannot be held liable therefor in an action of trover;³ but, in the absence of statutory protection, a sheriff or other ministerial officer who, by mistake or otherwise, seizes the property of the wrong person,⁴ or makes a seizure un-by one tenant of his share, existed at common law, as to all property in its nature severable. That partition of personal property held in common, was always a matter of absolute right, both by the civil and common law, and might be called for by either tenant at any time."

In Kimberly v. Patchin, 19 N. Y. 330; 75 Am. Dec. 334, Comstock, J., said: "I think each party would have the right of severing the tenancy by his own act, that is, a right of taking a portion of the mass which belonged to him, being accountable only if he invaded a quantity which belonged to the other."

In Benedict v. Howard, 31 Barb. (N. Y.) 569, where a tenant in common of certain machinery used in manufacturing lumber, moved the property out of the building in which it was situated, and put it up in a building of his own in another town several miles distant, making it a part of the realty, and used the same there in the manufacture of his own lumber, this was held such destruction of the property as would support an action by the co-tenant for its conversion.

So long as he remains in possession of the property, although he claims to be the sole owner, the vendee is not liable in trover to the vendor, his co-tenant. Dain v. Cowing, 22 Me. 347; 39 Am. Morrill*, 39 Vt. 483; Dow v. Cheney, 103 Mass. 181; Johnson v. Farr, 60 N. H. 426.

In Woodbury v. Long, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 543; 19 Am. Dec. 348, where goods were in the possession of one not the owner, it was held that the action of trover might be maintained against the attaching officer without proving any demand, even when the goods were so situated that the officer might have supposed them to be the property of the party whose goods he was directed to attach. See also Bowen v. Sanborn, 1 Allen (Mass.) 389, where it was held that the fact that the goods were consigned to the defendant for the purpose of sale, in boxes marked with his name, which were in his store with his own goods, and it appeared at the time of making the attachment, that the officer was informed that some of the goods in the store did not belong to the defendant, did not protect the attaching officer from liability to the true owner.

But where the owner of chattels suffers them to be so mixed with those of another person that they cannot be distinguished, an officer will not be der a defective process is liable as for conversion.¹ So, if an officer under an attachment or execution against one co-tenant or partner, seizes and sells the entire interest, he is liable in trover to the other co-tenants.²

He is also liable for conversion if he seizes goods which are by law exempt from attachment or execution.³ To constitute a conversion, it is not necessary that the officer should have taken the liable for attaching them as the property of such other person. Shumay v. Rutter, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 443; 19 Am. Dec. 340.

In Blanchard v. Coolidge, 22 Pick. (Mass.) 151, whereby in an agreement entered into between a father and son, the father was to carry on the business in the name and on account of the son, as his agent, the action of trover was maintained by the son against an attaching officer who, in behalf of a separate creditor of the father, attached certain property purchased by the father in the name of the son.

Action by Conditional Vendee. — Where personal property was sold and delivered with a condition precedent to be performed by the vendee, and it was agreed that the absolute ownership and right of property therein, although delivered to the vendee, was to remain in the vendor until such condition be performed, the general owner shall hold the property even as against a creditor of the vendee, who may attach the same in the vendee's possession. But an officer who attaches and sells the same, as the property of the vendee, before the performance of the condition, is liable in trover to the general owner. McFarland v. Farmer, 42 N. H. 386. In Martin v. England, 5 Yerg. (Tenn.) 313, it was held that trover lay against an officer who had taken property upon an execution issued upon a judgment which was void for want of jurisdiction; or against any person receiving the goods from the officer.

Trover will lie against an officer who, under a writ of execution returnable to the next court, seizes goods after such court has opened on the return day, and adjourned to the next day; if he has begun before the adjournment, he may complete the service afterwards. Prescott v. Cook, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 47; 37 Am. Dec. 372.

Where a sheriff attached property under a writ issued against the partnership, and afterwards, while the property was in his possession, returned an attachment against the same property on a writ against one of the partners, it was held that this latter attachment did not render him liable in an action of trover in favor of one who claimed under a sale from the partnership, so long as the attachment subsisted on the demand against the partnership, notwithstanding the partnership debt was afterwards satisfied by the sale of other property attached at the same time. Page v. Carpenter, 10 N. H. 77.

In Woods v. Keyes, 14 Allen (Mass.) 236; 92 Am. Dec. 766, it was held that if the exempt property, such as tools, implements, and fixtures are plainly distinguishable as articles which are exempt, the owner may maintain the action against the attaching officer without first demanding the articles or pointing them out. But if the exempt articles are so mingled with other property that the officer cannot distinguish them, neglect to claim them or point them out, when the officer makes the attachment, may be a waiver. Clapp v. Thomas, 5 Allen (Mass.) 158.

property into his actual possession;—it is sufficient if he assumes control, either by actual or constructive possession.¹ A sheriff may be liable for conversion if he sells more goods than are sufficient to satisfy the execution;² or if he sells after the time limited for making the sale;³ or purchases at a sale held by himself.⁴

Where an officer told the owner of goods, which were in sight, that he had attached them, and forbade him to remove them until the debt was paid, it was held that this was a constructive taking and sufficient evidence to show a conversion by the officer. St. George v. O'Connell, 110 Mass. 475.

The wrongful seizure, under an attachment, of goods in the hands of a bailee, and taking from him a forthcoming bond for their delivery, is such a conversion as will support an action of trover by the owner against the sheriff. Abercrombie v. Bradford, 16 Ala. 560.

In Amadon v. Myers, 6 Vt. 308, where the officer attached property as the property of another, but did not take actual custody or possession, or require a receipt therefor, and the owner had not been disturbed in possession, but had actually used the property himself, and appropriated it, it was held that an action could not be maintained. Williams, C. J., said: "It would be carrying the doctrine of constructive possession to a great length, to say that a man who has the custody of his property, uses and disposes of it without interruption, can maintain an action of trover against another who asserts a claim without taking any measure to enforce the claim."

A declaration by an officer that he has attached personal property, without proof that he has taken possession or exercised any dominion or control over it, does not amount to a conversion. Fernald v. Chase, 37 Me. 289.

In Rand v. Sargeant, 23 Me. 326; 39 Am. Dec. 625, where an officer, with a writ in his hands, went to the door and found the owner in actual possession of goods, and informed him that he was going to make an attachment, but did not, in fact, interfere with the goods or take them into his custody, and the debtor informed the officer that the goods belonged to a third person and not to him, but procured one other than the owner to give a receipt for them, it was held that there was no conversion.

1. But the plaintiff can waive the tort and sue on the implied contract only where the defendant has sold or otherwise disposed of the property. See Lightly v. Clouston, 1 Taunt. 112; Bennett v. Francis, 2 Bos. & P. 554; Woodbury v. Woodbury, 47 N. H. 11; 90 Am. Dec. 555; Mann v. Locke, 11 N. H. 246; Smith v. Smith, 43 N. H. 536; Cushman v. Jewell, 7 Hun (N. Y.) 525; Barlow v. Rogers, 3 Ill. 317; Guthrie v. Wickliffe, 1 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 83.

Some benefit must have actually accrued to the defendant. Webster v. Drinkwater, 5 Me. 319; 17 Am. Dec. 238. It must appear that he has actually received money or what he considers its equivalent, as a promissory note. Saville v. Welch, 58 Vt. 683.

"Where property has been received in satisfaction of a money demand, it is equivalent to money." Per Prout, J., in Kidney v. Persons, 41 Vt. 86; 98 Am. Dec. 595. As where a converted note is used to pay a debt, it being "the same thing as though he had paid his debt with the plaintiff's money." Doon v. Ravey, 49 Vt. 293. And see Miller v. King, 67 Ala. 575. So where school-district orders are used as money. Bowen v. School Dist., 36 Mich. 149. "If the property has been sold, it makes no difference whether the price is received in money or in a chattel at any estimated price for money." Fuller v. Duven, 36 Ala. 73; 78 Am. Dec. 318.

In Miller v. Miller, 7 Pick. (Mass.) 136; 19 Am. Dec. 264, Parker, C. J., said: "In regard to the objection that the price of some of the wood was received in real estate, we think, as the sale was made for money, the defendant was answerable for the price when he discharged the purchaser, whether he received cash or anything else. He may be considered as the purchaser of the real estate with the money for which he sold the wood. The plaintiff consents to the sale for money, but not that real estate shall be substituted. Suppose after selling the wood for money to be paid at a future day, the defendant had set off a debt which he owed the purchaser, for the price; he would virtually have received the money. So he has by taking the real estate." In Budd v. Hiler, 27 N. J. L. 48, it is said that the taking of a note is not sufficient.

Where the defendant traded the chattel for a set of harnesses, it was held that assumpsit would not lie. Kidney v. Persons, 41 Vt. 386; 98 Am. Dec. 595. And see Fuller v. Duren, 36 Ala. 73; 76 Am. Dec. 318, where it is said that this principle does not apply where the defendant has simply exchanged the property, and has not sold, or otherwise disposed of the property obtained in the exchange.

If it is money that has been converted, assumpsit will lie. McDonald v. Brown, 16 Ill. 31. And see Western Assurance Co. v. Towle, 65 Wis. 247; Brown v. Brown, 40 Hun (N. Y.) 418.

In Jones v. Hoar, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 290, Parker, C. J., thus sums up the doctrine: "The whole extent of the doctrine, as gathered from the books, seems to be, that one whose goods have been taken from him, or detained unlawfully, whereby he has a right to an action of trespass or trover, may, if the wrongdoer sells the goods and receives the money, waive the tort, affirm the sale, and have an action for money had and received for the proceeds."

A postmaster, if through his carelessness a letter containing money is lost, is not liable to an action for money had and received, unless he puts it to his own use. Danforth v. Grant, 14 Vt. 283; 39 Am. Dec. 224.

In Bennett v. Francis, 2 Bos. & P. 555, Lord Alvanley says: "All that can be collected from the case is this, that if the goods be converted into money, the court will allow the plaintiff to waive the tort and bring an action in which he can recover nothing more than the sum actually received; but if it were competent for the plaintiff, in a case like this, to waive the tort and convert the transaction into a contract, it might involve the defendant in great difficulties. The goods are demanded of a person who claims them as his own and insists on keeping them. Now, if the party demanding the goods be at liberty to convert this into an action for goods sold and delivered, the consequence would be that on proving his property in the goods, the other party would be obliged to pay the value of them, possibly to his utter ruin; whereas, if the former had declared in trover, nominal damages only would probably be given and the goods would be restored."

The proceeds of the sale of stolen goods may be recovered. Boston, etc., R. Co. v. Dana, 1 Gray (Mass.) 83; Shaw v. Coffin, 58 Me. 254; 9 Am. Rep. 290; Howe v. Clancey, 53 Me. 130. But see Foster v. Tucker, 3 Me. 458; 14 Am. Dec. 243. So where bills of exchange, see Buchanan v. Findlay, 9 B. & C. 738; 17 E. C. L. 486; Arnold v. Cheque Bank, L. R., 1 C. P. 578; or stock of the Bank of England, see Stone v. Marsh, 6 B. & C. 551; 13 E. C. L. 249; Marsh v. Keating, 1 Bing. N. Cas. 198; 27 E. C. L. 354, or where post-office orders have been wrongfully converted into money, the owner may claim the proceeds, as money had and received, to his use. Fine Arts Soc. v. Union Bank, 17 Q. B. Div. 705.

If an action is brought for goods sold and delivered, the defendant, by paying money into court, will be considered as consenting to have the transaction treated as a contract of sale. Bennett v. Francis, 2 Bos. & P. 550; Yate v. Willan, 2 East 128.

Recovery by Tenant in Common.—One tenant in common may bring assumpsit against his co-tenant who has sold the common property and received all the money. Gardiner Mfg. Co. v. Heald, 5 Me. 381; Miller v. Miller, 7 Pick. (Mass.) 133; 19 Am. Dec. 264.

In Loomis v. O'Neal, 73 Mich. 582, it was held that the refusal of a tenant in common of crops to recognize the rights of his co-tenant amounted to a conversion, and that the co-tenant could waive the tort and sue in assumpsit, a distinction being drawn between such case and a case of tenants in common of a chattel, where one has as good a right to the possession as the other. And see to the same effect, McLaughlin v. Salley, 46 Mich. 219; Coe v. Wager, 42 Mich. 49; Fiquet v. Allison, 12 Mich. 328; 86 Am. Dec. 54.

Recovery for Use of Chattel.—Assumpsit will not lie where the defendant has neither sold the chattel nor had any benefit from it, save in its use. Balch v. Patten, 45 Me. 41; 71 Am. Dec. 526.

In Crow v. Boyd, 17 Ala. 51, it was held that the owner of the slave could not maintain assumpsit for the value of its services against one who had converted it, but who had neither sold it nor received money for its labor.

But in Stockett v. Watkins, 2 Gill & J. (Md.) 326; 20 Am. Dec. 438, an administrator was held liable for the hire received for certain negroes during the time that he had them. And see Ford v. Caldwell, 3 Hill (S. Car.) 248, where Richardson, J., said: "The admission that if the trespasser should have hired out the negro and received money for his services, then you may recover such money, yields the whole principle. Money received and money's worth afford the same cause of action. The amount of money received of the hirer serves no other purpose but as a measure of the benefit which springs to the trespasser by employing the negro; and whether the benefit accrued from the services of the negro to the trespasser personally, or came to him indirectly in the sum of his wages, still, money is the measure of the loss to the owner and of the benefit to the trespasser. He has received in the one case a spe-

the amount actually received by the defendant.¹ The count should be for money had and received.² There are two exceptions to the above rule: first, where, by the death of the wrongdoer, the right to sue in trover is lost, assumpsit will lie against his executor or administrator;³ and second, where the goods were obtained fraudulently under color of sale, the defendant may be sued in assumpsit for goods sold and delivered.⁴

cific benefit measured by wages received in money; in the other he has received equal benefit in money's worth, but which the jury must assess because the case affords not the same specific measure as the money would." And see James v. Buzzard, Hempst. (U. S.) 240.

Proof of Amount Received for the Goods.—Whether or not the defendant received money for the goods need not be proved beyond doubt, and it is sufficient if the testimony presents a reasonable presumption that the defendant did receive the proceeds, and, like all other facts, must be determined on the weight of the evidence. Declercq v. Mungin, 46 Ill. 112. There need be no positive proof as to the amount received. Smith v. Jernigan, 83 Ala. 256.

Effect of Judgment.—Where assumpsit is brought for the value of goods where the action should have been in tort, and no objection is made, the judgment will determine the matter at issue as conclusively as though the proper action had been brought. Jennings v. Sheldon, 44 Mich. 92.

The plaintiff waives all torts and special damages, and can recover only the money received; and in most cases he so far confirms the defendant's acts that he cannot deny his right to receive them. Wilder v. Aldrich, 2 R. I. 518.

Where there is no positive proof as to the amount received, the jury usually gives as damages such sum as they are reasonably satisfied that the defendant received, and no more. Smith v. Jernigan, 83 Ala. 256.

2. The action should be for money had and received, and not for goods sold and delivered. Brown v. Holbrook, 4 Gray (Mass.) 103; Berkshire Glass Co. v. Wolcott, 2 Allen (Mass.)

227; 79 Am. Dec. 787; Gray v. Griffith, 10 Watts (Pa.) 431.

3. Hambly v. Trott, Cowp. 375; Hill v. Davis, 3 N. H. 385; Ford v. Caldwell, 3 Hill (S. Car.) 248. And see Stockett v. Watkins, 2 Gill & J. (Md.) 343; 20 Am. Dec. 438; Osborn v. Bell, 5 Den. (N. Y.) 374; 49 Am. Dec. 275; Cravath v. Plympton, 13 Mass. 454; Wilbur v. Gilmore, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 254; Powell v. Reese, 7 Ad. & El. 426; 34 E. C. L. 136; Foster v. Stewart, 3 M. & S. 191.

In Jones v. Hoar, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 290, Parker, C. J., said: "No case can be shown where assumpsit for goods sold lay in such case, except it be against an executor of the wrongdoer, the tort being extinguished by the death, and no other remedy but assumpsit against the executor remaining."

4. Hill v. Perrott, 3 Taunt. 274; Edmeads v. Newman, 1 B. & C. 418; 8 E. C. L. 178; Clarke v. Shee, Cowp. 334; Wigand v. Sichel, 3 Keyes (N. Y.) 120. And see Hambly v. Trott, Cowp. 375; Allen v. Ford, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 219.

In Hill v. Perrott, 3 Taunt. 274, it was held that assumpsit would lie for goods sold and delivered which the defendant had, by fraud, procured the plaintiff to sell to an insolvent person, and which the defendant had afterward gotten into his possession, the reason being that the defendant could not be permitted to set up a sale procured by his own fraud, and that his mere possession of the goods unaccounted for, raised an implied promise to pay. See to the same effect, Abbotts v. Barry, 2 Brod. & Bing. 369, a case similar in its facts to Hill v. Perrott, 3 Taunt. 274, except that the goods had been sold by the third person and the proceeds handed over to the defendant.

"It is not to be understood that an action of trover can be converted into an action for goods sold and delivered at the option of the plaintiff; the rule seems to be principally applicable to cases where the plaintiff has been induced, by an act on the part of the defendant, to make a contract with a nominal person, of which the defendant derived the whole benefit." 2 Phillips on Evidence (7th ed.) 111.

In Tuttle v. Campbell, 74 Mich. 652, Champlin, J., said: "The general rule is that before a party can waive a tort for the conversion of personal property and bring assumpsit, the property in the hands of the tort-feasor must have been sold and converted into money, upon the theory that the money has been received for the plaintiff's use. There is, however, another class of cases, where the property has been converted, but not sold, where the tort may be waived and assumpsit brought for the value of the goods converted. This class belongs to those relations where a contract may exist and at the same time a duty is superimposed or arises out of the circumstances surrounding or attending the transaction, the violation of which duty would constitute a tort. In such cases the tort may be waived and assumpsit be maintained, for the reason that the relation of the parties out of which the duty violated grew, had its inception in contract. These relations are usually those of trust and confidence, such as those of agent and principal, attorney and client, or bailee and bailor. When an owner in common of personalty has the exclusive possession of the property he is a bailee of his co-owner's share. In such case there is a contract of bailment implied between the parties, the law implying a delivery from the nature of the case and the peculiar rights which one owner in common has to such property when reduced to his possession. He takes it and holds it upon the trust and confidence that he will care for it, and use it, if he uses it, in an ordinarily careful manner, and will not sell or convert his co-owner's share to his own use. If he violates this trust and confidence by converting the property to his own use, his co-owner may bring trover for the conversion, or, waiving the tort, may sue in assumpsit to recover its value."

In Russell v. Bell, 10 M. & W. 340, the assignees of a bankrupt recovered on a count for goods sold and delivered, for goods fraudulently sold by the bankrupt to the defendants. Lord Abinger, C. B., said: "Here the bankrupt is selling goods under false colors, in order to cover up transactions he knew he could not otherwise cover; and he has no right to set up his own fraudulent contract. But the action being brought for goods sold and delivered by the assignees, and not by the bankrupt, the assignees have a right to waive the tort and bring an action of assumpsit for goods sold and delivered."

Sales on Credit Induced by Fraud.—Where the plaintiff has sold goods to the defendant on credit, but claimed the right to sue on a count for goods sold and delivered before the maturity of the credit, on the ground that the defendant had obtained the goods with the preconceived design of not paying for them, it was held that the action would not lie, on the ground that, while he might have brought trover and treated the contract as a nullity, by bringing assumpsit he had affirmed the contract, which was a sale on credit. Ferguson v. Carrington, 9 B. & C. 59; 17 E. C. L. 330. And see Read v. Hutchinson, 3 Camp. 352; Strutt v. Smith, 1 C. M. & R. 312; Allen v. Ford, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 217. But see, contra, Dietz v. Sutcliffe, 80 Ky. 650. See also FRAUDULENT SALES, vol. 8, pp. 845, 850.

So, it has been held that one who has been induced to enter into a contract to perform certain work at a certain price, by false representations as to the amount of work to be done, cannot recover on a count for work and labor for the value of the work performed, irrespective of the contract price, on the ground that, having chosen to treat the defendant as a party who has contracted with him, he must be bound by the only contract made between the parties. Selway v. Fogg, 5 M. & W. 83.

The opinion of Pryor, J., in Dietz v. Sutcliffe, 80 Ky. 650, is worthy of quotation as a statement of what would seem to be the correct principle of law upon this point. "Can a vendor, from whom goods have been purchased on a credit by means of fraudulent representations, upon discovering the fraud, and before the expiration of the time of credit, sue in contract for either the stipulated price or the reasonable value of the goods? It is well settled that where the vendor has been defrauded by his vendee, the former may elect to treat the contract as a nullity and bring his actions for the recovery of the specific property, or trover for their value, and this doctrine proceeds upon the idea that the contract of sale having been rescinded at the election of the vendor, he is still vested with the title.

The above rule is not without conflict, however, a number of cases, especially among the earlier decisions, holding that, even where the defendant has not disposed of the property, he may be sued in assumpsit for goods sold and delivered; but the rule as stated in the text seems to be supported by the decided weight of authority.¹

Nor do we see how, after the repeated adjudications of this court on the question, it is possible to say that the plaintiffs, on repudiating the contract for fraud, had not their election between contract and tort as to the form of action. The remaining question is, what is the effect of a waiver of the tort? Does it restore the express contract which has been repudiated for the fraud, or does it leave the parties in the same condition as if no express contract had been made—to such relations as result by implication of law from the delivery of goods by the plaintiff and their possession by the defendant? On this subject the decisions are conflicting, but I think the weight of authority, as well as the true and logical effect of the acts of the parties, is to leave the parties to stand upon the rights and obligations resulting from the delivery and possession of the goods. If the express contract is void, and can be treated as such by the appellees, how is it that the fraudulent vendee or his assignee can rely upon its terms to defeat the action for goods sold and delivered? The vendee will not be allowed to set up his own fraudulent act to defeat a recovery by his vendor. The assignee of this fraudulent vendee is relying on the special contract as a bar to the recovery, because by its terms the debts were not due at the time the several actions were instituted. In order to avoid this defense, a state of fact is presented in the reply that, if true, renders that contract, as to the appellees, a nullity, and if void, it is no obstacle in the way of the action for goods sold and delivered."

1. See, as supporting the proposition that the defendant may be sued for goods sold and delivered, where he has not disposed of the property, Gordon v. Bruner, 49 Mo. 570; Floyd v. Wiley, 1 Mo. 430; Johnson v. Strader, 3 Mo. 251; Barker v. Cory, 15 Ohio 9; Norden v. Jones, 33 Wis. 604, opinion of Dixon, C. J.; Stockett v. Watkins, 2 Gill & J. (Md.) 342; 20 Am. Dec. 438; Ford v. Caldwell, 3 Hill (S. Car.) 248 (Evans, J., dissenting); Eversole v. Moore, 3 Bush (Ky.) 49; Alsbrook v. Hathaway, 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 454;

Janes v. Buzzard, Hempst. (U. S.) 240; Tightmeyer v. Mongold, 20 Kan. 90 (dicta). And see Osborn v. Bell, 5 Den. (N. Y.) 374; 49 Am. Dec. 275; Chambers v. Lewis, 2 Hilt. (N. Y.) 591; Cummings v. Vorce, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 282; Butts v. Collins, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 154 (opinion of Mason, Senator); Russell v. Bell, 10 M. & W. 340; Lee v. Shore, 1 B. & C. 94; 8 E. C. L. 41; Hull v. Long, 6 Price 159.

In McGoldrick v. Willits, 52 N. Y. 612, Peckham, J., said: "The plaintiff may waive the tort and have assumpsit where the party has appropriated the property," but in this case the defendant had sold the goods. And see Goodenow v. Snyder, 3 Greene (Iowa) 599; Fratt v. Clark, 12 Cal. 89; Berly v. Taylor, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 577. In Hawk v. Thorn, 54 Barb. (N. Y.) 164, where similar language was used, the property had been converted into money. Terry v. Munger, 121 N. Y. 161, however, seems to settle the rule in New York as agreeing with the dictum of Peckham, J., above. Hill v. Davis, 3 N. H. 384, and Cummings v. Noyes, 10 Mass. 433, which seem to support the rule that an action for goods sold and delivered will lie, have been very much qualified by later decisions in those states.

In Johnson v. Reed, 8 Ark. 202, where the goods came into the defendant's possession peaceably, and he converted them to his own use, it was held that assumpsit would lie, the court distinguishing the case from Jones v. Hoar, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 285, on the ground that in the latter case a trespass had been committed.

In Evans v. Miller, 58 Miss. 120; 38 Am. Rep. 313, it is said that so long as the trespasser retains the property taken in its original shape, he may legally deny that he holds it under a contract; but when he has parted with it, either for money or other property, or where he has mingled it with his own, or consumed it in its use, or changed its form, he should not be permitted to deny the assumpsit to pay its value, which the law imputes from its method of dealing with it.

It is unnecessary to allege in the declaration that the plaintiff waives the tort.¹

2. Choice Between Trover and Assumpsit.—The plaintiff, by waiving the tort and suing in assumpsit, subjects himself to a set-off or counterclaim, or to the law of mutual credits in the case of bankruptcy, all of which would be avoided by suing in trover.² But, on the other hand, it may be advisable to proceed upon the implied contract in order to use it as a counterclaim in an action,³ or to avoid the effect of the Statute of Limitations.⁴ As we have seen, the plaintiff, where assumpsit is brought, can recover only the amount actually received for the goods.⁵

3. Infancy No Defense.—Where the plaintiff waives the tort and sues in assumpsit, the plea of infancy is no defense.⁶

And in Abbott v. Blossom, 66 Barb. (N. Y.) 353, it was held that where the defendant had used the property for his own use, changing its condition and character, the plaintiff could waive the tort and sue in assumpsit for goods sold and delivered; and the court was of the opinion that he could do so in any event, but this last was a mere dictum.

So in Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Chew, 67 Ill. 378, where the railroad company had taken cross ties and used them in laying its track, and in Walker v. Duncan, 68 Wis. 624, where saw logs had been converted into lumber and used by the defendant, it was held that assumpsit would lie.

1. McDonald v. McDonald, 67 Mich. 122; Elwell v. Martin, 32 Vt. 220.

2. Smith v. Hodgson, 4 T. R. 211; 1 Chitt. Pl. 112. And see Hunter v. Prinsep, 10 East 378. A counterclaim founded on contract cannot be interposed as a defense to an action of trover. Chambers v. Lewis, 2 Hilt. (N. Y.) 591. Where assumpsit is brought, the defendant is entitled to an allowance for a note taken in part payment which turned out to be worthless. Budd v. Hiler, 27 N. J. L. 43.

3. City Nat. Bank v. National Park Bank, 32 Hun (N. Y.) 105.

4. In the case of Lamb v. Clark, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 193, the defendant obtained possession of divers promissory notes without a legal transfer from the owner, and received payment of some of them more than six years, and of others within six years, next before the commencement of the action, and it was held that he was liable in assumpsit for the sums received within the six years, and that he was estopped to show that the notes were obtained by fraud and that therefore, an action of trover would have been barred by the statute. Parker, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court said: "And if he choose the latter mode of redress—that is, to bring assumpsit—the tortfeasor cannot, we think, allege his own wrong for the purpose of carrying back the injury to a time which let in the Statute of Limitations."

5. See supra, this title, When Tort May Be Waived.

6. Elwell v. Martin, 32 Vt. 217; Shaw v. Coffin, 58 Me. 254; 4 Am. Rep. 290; Bristow v. Eastman, 1 Esp. 172. And see Peigne v. Sutcliffe, 4 McCord (S. Car.) 387; Munger v. Hess, 28 Barb. (N. Y.) 75; Oliver v. McClellan, 21 Ala. 675; 2 Greenl. on Ev., § 368. In Bristow v. Eastman, 1 Esp. 172, it was held that an action for money had and received, would lie against an infant to recover money which he had embezzled. Lord Kenyon said, that though the action was in its form an action ex contractu, yet it was an action ex delicto in substance; that if the assignees had brought an action of trover for any part of the property embezzled, or an action grounded on fraud, infancy would unquestionably have been no defense, and as the object of the action of assumpsit was precisely the same, his opinion was that the same rule of law would apply, and that infancy was no bar. In Shaw v. Coffin, 58 Me. 254; 4 Am. Rep. 290, Appleton, C. J., said: "If the minor is liable for his torts, it is immaterial to him in what form of action recompense is sought. If, for the purposes of justice, the tort may be waived in the case of the adult, and assumpsit maintained, it can, to accomplish the same great purpose, be equally well waived

4. Tenants in Common Must Join.—Tenants in common must join where they waive the tort and sue in assumpsit for any entire injury done to the common property,¹ and joint trespassers may also be sued jointly in assumpsit where the tort is waived.²

5. Effect of Election.—Where the plaintiff, with knowledge of the facts, has elected to waive the tort and sue in assumpsit, he cannot afterward discontinue his action and sue in tort, and vice versa; an election once made, is final.³ But a mere demand of

as to the minor." And see Walker v. Davis, 1 Gray (Mass.) 506.

2. Gilmore v. Wilbur, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 120; 22 Am. Rep. 410; or jointly or severally, City Nat. Bank v. National Park Bank, 32 Hun (N. Y.) 105.

But where the conversion is a joint act of husband and wife, assumpsit against them jointly will not lie, for as to the wife, the promise is void. Carleton v. Haywood, 49 N. H. 314.

3. Fireman's Ins. Co. v. Cochran, 27 Ala. 228; Moller v. Tuska, 87 N. Y. 166; Boots v. Ferguson, 46 Hun (N. Y.) 129; Kinney v. Kiernan, 49 N. Y. 164; Rodermund v. Clark, 46 N. Y. 354; Lloyd v. Brewster, 4 Paige (N. Y.) 537; Sanger v. Wood, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 416; Bulkley v. Morgan, 46 Conn. 393; Dibble v. Sheldon, 10 Blatchf. (U. S.) 178. And see Thompson v. Howard, 31 Mich. 309; Farwell v. Myers, 59 Mich. 179; Acer v. Hotchkiss, 97 N. Y. 395; O'Donald v. Constant, 82 Ind. 212. See also ELECTION, vol. 6, p. 250.

If an action is commenced for the money, or a proceeding taken in bankruptcy, an election is made and the tort waived, and trover cannot be afterwards brought. Smith v. Baker, L. R., 8 C. P. 350. In this case, Bovill, C. J., said: "If an action for money had and received is brought, that is, in point of law, conclusive election to waive the tort; and so the commencement of an action of trespass or trover is a conclusive election the other way." So, where the action is in tort for the wrongful taking and conversion of property, the plaintiff cannot, upon a failure of proof that the taking was wrongful or tortious and at the close of the case, waive the tort and recover as upon a contract. Ransom v. Wetmore, 39 Barb. (N. Y.) 104. And in Buckland v. Johnson, 15 C. B. 145; 80 E. C. L. 145; 23 L. J. C.

P. 204, it was held that the plaintiff, having sued one of two joint tort-feasors in tort, could not afterwards sue the other for money had and received. And see, to the same effect, Brinsmead v. Harrison, L. R., 6 C. P. 589.

Where an assignee of an insolvent debtor, knowing that the latter made the sale of goods for the purpose of delaying or defrauding his creditor, brings an action against the vendee on a note given by him for the purchase price, and secures the demand by an attachment of his property, he thereby so far affirms the sale and waives his right to disaffirm it, that he cannot, by discontinuing the action and demanding the goods, entitle himself to maintain an action of trover against the vendee on his refusal to return them. Butler v. Hildreth, 5 Met. (Mass.) 49. Shaw, C. J., said: "We are then brought to the question, what act on the part of the assignee is to be taken as proof of his election. It would, we think, be going too far to say that the mere demand of the price should be admitted as a waiver of his right to avoid the sale and claim the goods, because, in many cases, if the price can be obtained it would be equally beneficial to the creditors, and he would have no further occasion to pursue the harsher remedy of impeaching the sale. But we think that if the assignee commences an action against the purchaser for the price, and causes his property to be attached to secure it, this is a significant act, an unequivocal assertion that he does not impeach the sale, but by necessary implication affirms it. It is an act, too, deeply affecting the rights of the purchaser, whilst it is an assertion of his own; and if done with a knowledge of all the facts which ought to influence him in its election, it is conclusive."

A judgment in trover or trespass, whether for or against the defendant, is a bar to a subsequent action of assumpsit. Agnew v. McElroy, 10 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 552; 48 Am. Dec. 772; payment, unassented to, is not an election,¹ though it is other-

Floyd v. Browne, 1 Rawle (Pa.) 121; 18 Am. Dec. 602; Rice v. King, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 20; Kitchen v. Campbell, 3 Wils. 304.

And a judgment in assumpsit is a bar to an action for conversion. Fields v. Bland, 81 N. Y. 239; Walsh v. Chesapeake, etc., Canal Co., 59 Md. 423.

Where the owner of the goods waives the tort and recovers in an action ex contractu against some of the joint tortfeasors, he is estopped by his election from maintaining trover against the others. Terry v. Munger, 2 N. Y. Supp. 348; 49 Hun (N. Y.) 560; aff'd in 21 N. Y. 161, where it was said that the election, when made, is final and cannot be reconsidered, even where no injury has been done by the choice or would result from setting it aside.

If the action of assumpsit fails for want of jurisdiction, the plaintiff cannot afterward bring trover against the assignee of the wrongdoer, for after electing to treat the property as belonging to the wrongdoer and suing him for its price, he is estopped from asserting title against the latter's vendees. Hield v. Burton, 49 Mich. 53.

Even though the judgment in trover produces no fruits, it is a bar to another action against the defendant for money had and received. Per Jarvis, C. J., in Buckland v. Johnson, 15 C. B. 145; 80 E. C. L. 145.

But in order to be bound to his election to sue in contract, it must appear that the plaintiff knew of the tort at the time the action was brought. Equitable, etc., Foundry Co. v. Hersee, 103 N. Y. 25; Hays v. Midas, 104 N. Y. 602; Bach v. Tuch, 47 Hun (N. Y.) 536.

Shaw, C. J., in Butler v. Hildreth, 5 Met. (Mass.) 49, said: "But this determination will not extend to a case where facts subsequently come to the knowledge of the assignee, which, if he had known them before, would have led him to a different election—whether these facts relate to the character of the sale, and bear upon the question whether it was fraudulent or not, or whether they relate to the remedy. As if the assignee, on commencing his action for the price, believes that he has secured the amount due, by a valid attachment of the defendant's property, and afterward discovers that it is not the property of the defendant, and that his supposed remedy has failed. Or if he should discover that the defendant had an offset, which would be good against an action of assumpsit for the price, but not good against the action of trover. If, on any of these grounds, it should appear that he had received his election under a mistake of facts, and more especially if he had been led into such mistake by the adverse party, it might present the question in a different view." But this was merely dicta, and it is very much to be doubted if a plaintiff, after commencing an action of assumpsit with knowledge of the tort, would be allowed, upon subsequently discovering that the defendant had a valid set-off, to discontinue his action and bring trover.

Evidence of Election.—The judgment roll in the former action is receivable in evidence, not by way of estoppel, but as showing an election to treat the taking as a sale; and it seems that proof of the commencement of the former action, with full knowledge of the facts, would be just as conclusive upon the question of election as the judgment. Terry v. Munger, 121 N. Y. 161.

1. Valpy v. Sanders, 5 C. B. 886; 57 E. C. L. 886. In Morris v. Robinson, 3 B. & C. 196; 5 D. & R. 34; 10 E. C. L. 49, where a quantity of indigo had been shipped from Calcutta by freight, and had been improperly sold under an order of the court of vice-admiralty, the owner of the indigo was held entitled to maintain trover against the defendant, who had purchased and received thirty-two chests of it, notwithstanding his agent, under a power of attorney, had made an unsuccessful application to the vice-admiralty court to obtain the proceeds of certain other of the chests of indigo sold under the same circumstances.

In Burn v. Morris, 4 Tyr. 485, where trover was brought for a twenty-pound bank note, which the plaintiff had lost, and which the defendant had received from a woman who had found it, and exchanged it at the bank, notwithstanding the plaintiff had received from the woman seven pounds, being part of the proceeds obtained by the defendant by the exchange of the note, it was held that the action might be maintained, the seven pounds being allowed only in the reduction of damages, the court saying that Brewer v. Sparrow, 7 B. & C. 310; 14 E. C. L. 50, was distinguishwise where it is assented to, even though payment is never made;¹ or where the defendant accounts to the plaintiff and pays over the proceeds.²

VII. PROCEDURE — 1. Declaration or Complaint.—The material averments in an action of trover are ownership or possession of the property in the plaintiff,³ and its wrongful taking and conver-able by the fact that the assignees had there received a sum as the whole balance due to them upon the footing of the account.

In Hurst v. Gwennap, 2 Stark. 306, where goods had been delivered by a bankrupt to the defendant, upon sale or return, after an act of bankruptcy, but without notice, the assignees, after their appointment, required the defendant to say whether he would keep the goods or not, and he elected to keep them; whereupon the assignees delivered a bill of parcels as upon sale by the bankrupt, and demanded payment of the amount; the defendant refused to pay, claiming a set-off, whereupon the assignees, without further demand, brought trover and were held entitled to recover.

1. Lythgoe v. Vernon, 5 H. & N. 180.

2. Brewer v. Sparrow, 7 B. & C. 310; 14 E. C. L. 50.

If the owner, with knowledge of the facts, accepts a receipt from the wrongdoer and afterward claims credit for the amount, it amounts to a waiver. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Greenleaf (Ala. 1893), 14 So. Rep. 109.

3. Nance v. Georgia, etc., R. Co., 35 S. Car. 307; Wharton v. Georgia, etc., R. Co., 35 S. Car. 608; Wright v. Field, 64 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 117; Womble v. Leach, 83 N. Car. 84; Humpfner v. Osborne (S. Dak. 1891), 50 N. W. Rep. 88. And see Redpath v. Lawrence, 42 Mo. App. 191; Lyen v. Bond, 3 Wash. Ter. 407; First Nat. Bank v. Gibbins (Ind. App. 1893), 35 N. E. Rep. 31.

The material averments in an action of trover are that the plaintiff is the owner of the property, describing it with reasonable certainty, and that the defendant wrongfully took and converted it to his own use; or that the defendant, being in the lawful possession, wrongfully converted it to his own use, and that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession at the time of such conversion. Robinson v. Peru Plow, etc., Co., 1 Okla. 140.

An allegation that the property belonged to the plaintiff is not an aver-ment that he is the absolute owner, but only such as makes admissible any evidence showing that he stands in such relation to the property as to enable him to maintain trover. Duggan v. Wright, 157 Mass. 228.

A complaint averring possession in the plaintiff is sufficient to support a judgment in favor of the possessor against a trespasser without a direct averment of ownership or title. Rosenthal v. McMann, 93 Cal. 505.

In an action by a mortgagee for a conversion by a subsequent mortgagee of the same property, who has sold and bought it in under his mortgage, a complaint which fails to allege possession, right of possession, or demand of possession, is insufficient, since in Washington a chattel mortgage vests no title or right of possession in the mortgagee. Binnian v. Baker, 6 Wash. 50.

The complaint must show that the plaintiff was the owner of the property or entitled to the possession at the time of the taking and conversion. Smith v. Force, 31 Minn. 119; Mount v. Cumberly, 19 N. J. L. 124; and where it was alleged that on May 8th the plaintiff "was and is now" the owner of the property, and that "on or about the twelfth of May" the defendant took and converted it, the complaint was held insufficient, for he may not have been the owner on the twelfth of May. Sawyer v. Robertson, 11 Mont. 416.

An allegation that the defendant wrongfully took into his possession property, of which the plaintiff was the owner, sufficiently alleges a right of possession. Kerner v. Boardman (C. Pl.), 14 N. Y. Supp. 787. But in an action by a receiver, an averment that he was directed by the court to take the property into his possession, is insufficient, in not alleging that he ever actually had possession of the property. Kehr v. Hall, 117 Ind. 405.

An allegation that A died, leaving the plaintiffs under the law of the domicile, owners of the property, is a sufficient allegation of ownership. Berney v. Drexel, 33 Hun (N. Y.) 34. But an sion by the defendant.¹ But the declaration need not show the averment that the defendants "wrongfully took from the plaintiff, and carried away and converted to their own use," certain goods, is bad in not alleging property in the goods. Day v. Watts, 92 Ind. 442.

The use of the term "assignee," etc., after the name of the plaintiff in the declaration, is to be treated as mere descriptio personæ, and does not of itself authorize the conclusion that the declaration purports to be for a cause of action that had accrued to the assignors by a conversion prior to the assignment, and claimed to have passed by the assignment to the plaintiff. Bloom v. Sexton, 33 Mich. 181.

An allegation that the defendant "without leave, forcibly and wrongfully drove away certain stock belonging to the plaintiff, and has not returned the same," is sufficient both as to the title, right of possession, and conversion. Warnick v. Baker, 42 Mo. App. 439.

Under Iowa Code, § 3225, providing that "the facts constituting the plaintiff's right to the present possession and the extent of his interest in the property, whether it be full or qualified ownership," must be set out, it was held that evidence of a chattel mortgage to the plaintiffs was not admissible to prove their ownership under a petition alleging that they were the "absolute and unqualified owners," and "that they acquired said ownership by purchase." Kern v. Wilson, 73 Iowa 490.

Where the complaint alleges the ownership of the property converted in the plaintiff, but fails to allege that he was at the time in possession or entitled to the possession, it will be held sufficient where there is no demurrer and its sufficiency is questioned for the first time at the trial by an objection to the evidence. Brickley v. Walker, 68 Wis. 563.

A statement in a complaint that the plaintiff "has been at great trouble and expense in tracing and searching for his said property," is an insufficient allegation of the plaintiff's ownership, or right of possession. Johnson v. Oregon, etc., Nav. Co., 8 Oregon 35.

In Baals v. Stewart, 109 Ind. 371, it was held that where possession of the property is not sought in an action to recover damages for its wrongful conversion, the complaint need not aver that the plaintiff is entitled to possession.

A count in trover which is defective in failing to allege that the plaintiff is possessed of the goods in controversy, as of his own property, is not cured by verdict. Sevier v. Holliday, Hempst. (U. S.) 160. But see Good v. Harnish, 13 S. & R. (Pa.) 99.

Action by Guardian.—A declaration in an action of trover by a guardian which fails to show that he is entitled to the possession, but only alleges possession in his ward, is bad on demurrer. Dearman v. Dearman, 5 Ala. 202.

Replication.—Where the answer alleged that the only interest the plaintiff ever had in the goods was as administrator, and that after his removal as such, the defendant lawfully bought them from his successor, a replication alleging that, while the plaintiff was administrator, the goods were in the possession of third persons who claimed them as their own, that the plaintiff, under the belief that they belonged to the estate, brought an action of replevin therefor, on the trial of which, the property was awarded to such third persons, and that by reason of the defendant's conversion he was unable to return them to the adjudged owners, who, thereupon, brought suit on his replevin bond and recovered judgment against him and his sureties for the value of the goods with the cost, by the payment of which judgment he had become the owner of the goods, was held sufficient. McFadden v. Schroeder (Ind. 1892), 29 N. E. Rep. 491.

1. See cases cited above. See also Davis v. Davis, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 394.

A complaint alleging that the defendant railroad unlawfully took, converted, and appropriated the property in controversy to its own use, by hauling it away and using it in its road, sufficiently charges a conversion. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Balch, 105 Ind. 93.

An allegation of conversion which cannot be rejected as surplusage, may convert a count which, without such allegation, would not be a count in trover, into such a count. Wells v. Connable, 138 Mass. 513.

The petition is not insufficient for failing to allege that the defendant took possession of or sold the property, where it is alleged that he fraudulently advised and instigated the sale. Cone

v. Ivinson (Wyoming, 1893), 33 Pac. Rep. 31.

Where the complaint shows facts to the effect that a deposit in a bank by the defendant in his own name, of money delivered to him by the plaintiff, was a wrongful appropriation thereof, and alleges a conversion by the wrongful withdrawal and use of the money, the action is one for conversion, although the complaint does not characterize the deposit as a conversion. Thompson v. Vroman, 66 Hun (N. Y.) 245. See Hoowe v. Kreling, 93 Cal. 136, where the complaint was treated as one for a conversion and not for the enforcement of a trust.

An allegation "that the defendants converted to their own use, or wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of his goods; to wit, four barrels of whisky," was held to be good, the alternate form in which the tort was alleged being equivalent, and together importing a single injury. Meizel v. Carr, 25 Md. 46.

A tax was raised in a town composed of two congressional townships, but none of it had been expended when the plaintiff township was detached from the town. In an action by it against the town for the conversion of the money so received, the complaint alleged that, "The defendant has unlawfully and wrongfully kept the money in its treasury and converted the same to its own use," and it was held that, as it did not appear from the complaint when the money was converted, nor that it was in the treasury at the time of the separation of the two townships, it stated no cause of action, since if the conversion occurred prior to the severance of the townships there was no remedy by the one town against the other. Clayton v. Bennington, 24 Minn. 14.

Possession in Defendant.—It is sufficient to aver that the defendant, being in the lawful possession of the property, wrongfully detained or converted it to his own use. Robinson v. Peru Plow, etc., Co., 1 Okla. 140; Humpfner v. Osborne (S. Dak. 1891), 50 N. W. Rep. 88; Sheldon v. Hoy, 11 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 11.

A complaint alleging property in the plaintiff, possession by the defendant as bailee, the value of the property and defendant's refusal to deliver it on demand, states sufficient cause to support an action for conversion. Gregory v. Fichtner (C. Pl.), 14 N. Y. Supp. 891; 27 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 86.

Allegation of a Legal Conclusion.—Where the property was rightfully levied upon by the direction of the creditors, and in an action against them for its conversion, the petition alleged that "by and through the officer," they had converted it to their own use, it was held that this was but the allegation of a legal conclusion, and that in the absence of any statement as to what the defendants did after directing the levy, the petition was properly held bad on demurrer. Burt v. Decker, 64 Iowa 106.

But an allegation that the defendant "unlawfully took possession of the said cross-ties, and converted them to his own use," is not made an allegation of a conclusion of law by the use of the word "unlawfully." Nance v. Georgia, etc., R. Co., 35 S. Car. 307.

Execution Against the Person.—A complaint alleging the receipt by the plaintiff of the defendant's money in a fiduciary capacity and the conversion of it to his own use, charges conversion within the provision of New York Code Civ. Proc., § 549, for the purpose of sustaining an execution against the person. Bullen v. Murphy, 16 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 474.

Where the action is for damages, and not to recover specific property, an order of arrest of the defendant obtained under § 179, sub. 3, of the New York Code, cannot be upheld. Seymour v. Van Curen, 18 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 94.

Conversion by Partners.—An averment that the defendants were partners is immaterial, and need not be proven. Head v. Goodwin, 37 Me. 181.

Joint Conversion.—A complaint charging separately a conversion of personal property by one defendant by his sale thereof to the other, and the conversion by the latter by his purchase from the former, states in effect a joint conversion and but one cause of action. Smith v. Briggs, 64 Wis. 497.

Amendment.—Where, in an action of trover, a second petition was filed charging that the defendant maliciously sued out a writ of attachment and caused the property to be seized and sold at a sacrifice, it was held to state a new and distinct cause of action, and not allowable as an amendment. Scovill v. Glasner, 79 Mo. 449.

Trover or Replevin.—A complaint alleging a wrongful taking, a wrongful possession, and an unlawful conversion, is a complaint in replevin and not in trover. Enos v. Bemis, 61 Wis. 656; and where the averment was that the defendant "wrongfully took and converted to his own use" the property, it nature or evidence of the plaintiff's title,¹ nor is it necessary to set forth how, or in what way, or by what means, the conversion was accomplished,² though the fact of conversion should be directly alleged.³ The property should be described with reasonable certainty, though a very general description is sufficient.⁴

was held to be an action of replevin, and that the allegation of conversion was surplusage. Vogel v. Badcock, 1 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 176.

1. Warren v. Dwyer, 91 Mich. 414; Williams v. Raper, 67 Mich. 427; Harvey v. McAdams, 32 Mich. 472; Heine v. Anderson, 2 Duer (N. Y.) 318.

It is unnecessary to state in what manner the plaintiff became the owner, because it is a matter of evidence. Malcolm v. O'Reilly, 46 N. Y. Super. Ct. 222. But if the plaintiff attempts to set out the facts by which he claims to have acquired title and they are insufficient to sustain his claim, the pleading is bad. First Nat. Bank v. St. Croix Boom Co., 41 Minn. 141.

Where the complaint, after alleging a mortgage of the goods to the plaintiff and default thereon, also alleges delivery of them to the plaintiff by the mortgagor in satisfaction of the mortgage debt, there is no error in permitting the plaintiff to make proof of his title simply as the mortgagee. Smith v. Konst, 50 Wis. 360.

Though the plaintiff, instead of pleading title in himself, pleads the evidence of his title, it will be held sufficient. Swift v. James, 50 Wis. 540.

2. Decker v. Mathews, 12 N. Y. 313; Richardson v. Hall, 21 Md. 399; Smith v. Thompson, 94 Mich. 381. In this last case it was held that in an action of trover for the conversion of stock, the declaration need not allege that the shares had been indorsed so as to enable the defendant to transfer them; and in Beebe v. Knapp, 28 Mich. 53, it was held that the declaration need not set forth the false representations by which the plaintiff was induced to part with his property.

The usual declaration in trover is sufficient to enable the plaintiff to show the facts essential to a recovery. Hutchinson v. Whitmore, 90 Mich. 255; Duggan v. Wright, 157 Mass. 228; Paalzow v. North Carolina Estate Co., 104 N. Car. 437; First Nat. Bank v. St. Croix Boom Co., 41 Minn. 141; Hawkins v. Pearce, 11 Humph. (Tenn.) 44.

A statement of the attendant circumstances is redundant and irrelevant, and should be stricken out. Green v. Palmer, 15 Cal. 411; 76 Am. Rep. 492.

In an action for the conversion of bank checks, under an allegation that they were obtained without the plaintiff's authority, evidence is admissible to show that the possession of them was obtained through the forgery of the plaintiff's indorsement by a third person. Schmidt v. Garfield Nat. Bank, 64 Hun (N. Y.) 298.

Where the plaintiff avers a demand for the property and a refusal to deliver, he need not set forth the specific facts, showing the detention to have been wrongful. Chapin v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 31 Hun (N. Y.) 529.

Where the plaintiff states facts which, if true, entitle him to the relief asked, the technical rules of pleading formerly applicable to the action of trover, cannot be applied, under the Missouri Statute, to defeat the action. Knipper v. Blumenthal, 107 Mo. 665.

In an action against a carrier, it is unnecessary to allege his duty as such, if his business is set forth together with his negligence and the loss resulting therefrom. Wright v. McKee, 37 Vt. 161.

3. It is not sufficient to allege the fact of conversion inferentially, or to merely state facts which constitute the evidence of conversion. Perry v. Musser, 68 Mo. 477.

Thus, if the plaintiff alleges a demand and refusal, but omits to aver a conversion, the declaration is ill, the demand and refusal being only evidence of a conversion. Watress v. Pierce, 36 N. H. 240.

An averment that the defendant unlawfully, fraudulently, willfully, and maliciously took the property, is not an averment of a conversion. Triscony v. Orr, 49 Cal. 612.

4. A general description of the property in actions of trover is sufficient. Stinchfield v. Twaddle, 81 Me. 273; Colebrook v. Merrill, 46 N. H. 160; Taylor v. Wells, 2 Saund. 74.

If the goods are described according to common acceptance, it is sufficient; thus, a declaration in trover for 400

"ends" was held sufficient as being a particular term, well understood, and the proper denomination of all short pieces of boards. Knight v. Barker, 2 Ld. Raym. 1219; 11 Mod. 66. So, it has been held that trover for "old iron" is good after verdict. Talbot v. Spear, Willes Rep. 70; and also for two "packs" of flax and two "packs" of hemp, without setting out the weight or quantity of a pack, is good after verdict, and it seems even upon special demurrer. Thornton v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 991. So, also, where the description of so many ounces of cloves, mace, and nutmegs, without stating the quantity of each. Hartford v. Jones, 1 Ld. Raym. 588; so as to "a parcel of diamonds." White v. Graham, 2 Str. 827; and "a parcel of pack cloths, wrappers and cords." Bottomley v. Harrison, 2 Stra. 809; also for three "ricks or stacks" of hay, without alleging the quantity each rick contained. Wood v. Davis, 1 Mod. 189; 1 Lev. 301; so for six parcels of lead. Green v. Green, cited in Jenny v. Norris, 1 Vent. 106; or for a "library of books," without expressing what they are. Emery's Cas., cited in Elpicke v. Acton, 1 Vent. 114; or two pieces of cloth, Isles v. Windsor, Sty. 419. Trover for a "suit" of knots was held sufficiently certain. Parkhurst v. Shefton, 2 Show. 315; or for a parcel of thread, without mentioning the quantity or quality. Jenny v. Norris, 1 Lev. 303; for it is certain enough in trover, where damages only are to be recovered, and not the thing itself. Copleston v. Piper, 1 Ld. Raym. 191, per Powell, J. Trover for ten weights was held good, if the jury can understand the case, and damages only are to be recovered. Hook v. Gallaway, 12 Mod. 3. See also Chamberlain v. Cooke, 2 Vent. 78. So, also, in trover for a "piece" of tepee, without saying how many yards it contained. Radley v. Rudge, 2 Str. 738; and for fifty pieces of square timber wood. Halsegrave v. Thompson, cited 2 Str. 810; and in trover for divers quantities of chinaware, earthenware, and linen, without setting forth particulars, the description was held good after judgment by default. Hobbs v. Green, Barnes 276.

In the infancy of this action, however, it was held necessary in the declaration in trover to ascertain the goods which were the subject of dispute with as much certainty and accuracy as was required in an action of detinue or replevin. Taylor v. Wells,

2 Saund. 74, note; thus, where the declaration was for a "parcel" of lings, without specifying the quantity contained, the verdict and judgment for the plaintiff was reversed. Gramvel v. Rhobotham, Cro. Eliz. 865; and trover for 200 weights of lead and 200 of brass, without showing the quantity, was held too uncertain after verdict. Powell v. Hopkins, Sty. 247.

Where the declaration was to recover the value of numerous articles of various kinds of household furniture, agricultural implements, robes, harnesses, etc., the description of the property referred to as "the goods and chattels in the schedule hereunto annexed, and of the value therein mentioned," was held by long usage to be sufficient. Stinchfield v. Twaddle, 81 Me. 273. Such was the form used in New Hampshire, though it was said to be "somewhat untechnical to do it." Hilton v. Burley, 2 N. H. 193; and the court in that state refused to sustain the objection after the verdict. Edgerly v. Emerson, 23 N. H. 572; 55 Am. Dec. 207.

In Kinder v. Shaw, 2 Mass. 398, note, the chief justice observed that in trover, a schedule annexed to the writ is no part of the declaration, and that it was a very improper practice. And see opinion of Parker, C. J., to the same effect in Rider v. Robbins, 13 Mass. 284.

In an action of trover, a description of the goods as "certain goods; to wit, a lot of goods in a certain store in A," was held insufficient. Edgerly v. Emerson, 23 N. H. 555; 55 Am. Dec. 207; and a declaration for a "tool chest containing divers, tools and working utensils" and "a trunk containing clothes" is sufficiently certain. Ball v. Patterson, 1 Cranch (U. S. Cir. Ct.) 607. So, also, where the property was described as "a certain black mare, of the value of one hundred dollars," Heddy v. Fullen, 1 Blackf. (Ind.) 51; or a "pair of oxen of the value of one hundred dollars." Vananken v. Wickham, 5 N. J. L. 509.

The plaintiff, under a declaration for the conversion of "one grindstone," may recover the value of the frame in which it was placed, if the jury find the frame was essential to its use and taken away with it. Patterson v. Dudley, 12 Gray (Mass.) 375.

The same strictness in the description of the property is not required upon a motion of arrest as upon a demurrer to the declaration. Henry v. Sowles, 28 Fed. Rep. 521.

Neither the time when the conversion took place,¹ nor the value of the property, is a material allegation,² but there should be a claim for damages;³ and where special damages are sought to be

Where, in an action of trover, the timber was described in the declaration as "being that hewn timber and those round logs which were cut on the land of petitioner and from the land of C. by one R., and were by such R. left and deposited in the waters of the O. river at a point not far from the bridge of the M. & A. railroad, and being that timber and logs referred to in the contract between petitioner and said R., dated 15th of April, 1891, and recorded in Book L, folio 169, in the office of the clerk of the supreme court of B. county, said state, July 7th, 1891, to which logs and timber petitioner claims title," it was held sufficiently certain. Leitner v. Strickland, 89 Ga. 363.

Description of Bank Bills.—In trover for bank bills, a description of them as "certain current bank bills representing in all one hundred and fifty dollars in money, and of the value of one hundred and fifty dollars," is good after the verdict. Colebrook v. Merrill, 46 N. H. 160.

In Iasigi v. Shea, 148 Mass. 538, a declaration that the defendant converted "large sums of money, the property of the plaintiff," was held good on general demurrer. Little v. Gibbs, 4 N. J. L. 240.

Where they were described as "bank notes, commonly so called, issued by certain incorporated banks," the name of the banks and number or denomination of the notes being given, it was held to sufficiently state the parties to, and the legal effect and substance of the notes, as to be sufficient. Dows v. Bignall, Hill & D. Supp. (N. Y.) 407.

Description of the Bond or Note.—Where the action is for a bond in the possession of the defendant, the latter will not be compelled by the court to deliver a copy to the plaintiff in order that he may declare with accuracy. Denslow v. Fowler, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 592.

The plaintiff will have to prove the value as alleged, and if he cannot state the precise amount, he may state that it was of great value, to wit: of the value of a certain sum. Bissel v. Drake, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 66. He need not state the dates or times for payment, it being presumed that they are not in his possession. Bank of New Brunswick v. Neilson, 15 N. J. L. 337; 29 Am. Dec. 691. He need not recite any part of it or give its date.

Pierson v. Townsend, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 550. Certainty in the description to a common intent is all that is required. Taylor v. Morgan, 3 Watts (Pa.) 333. But see Fry v. Baxter, 10 Mo. 302, where it is said that an omission to allege the value of a note can only be reached by special demurrer.

Amendment.—Where trover is brought for a mare in foal, a recovery may be had for the colt after birth, and declaration may be amended as to the description of the colt. King v. Wright, 77 Ga. 581.

1. Hixon v. Pixley, 15 Nev. 475; Richardson v. Hall, 21 Md. 399.

2. An allegation of value is not material, and the omission of the defendant to deny it does not operate as an admission of the value averred in the complaint. The action of trover can be maintained, although no value is averred or proved; the conversion being shown, the plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages. Connoss v. Meir, 2 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 314; Starr v. Cragin, 24 Hun (N. Y.) 177; Richardson v. Hall, 21 Md. 399; Pearpoint v. Henry, 2 Wash. (Va.) 192. And see Kuhland v. Sedgwick, 17 Cal. 123. But see contra, Hixon v. Pixley, 15 Nev. 475; Carlyon v. Lannan, 4 Nev. 156. The complaint should aver either that the property converted is of some value, or that the plaintiff sustained damages by reason of the conversion. Ryan v. Hurley, 119 Ind. 115.

In an action for the conversion of mining stock, where the complaint alleged that on a specified time, the defendant bought for the account of the plaintiff "six hundred dollars' worth" of stock, and at two subsequent times bought "fifteen hundred dollars' worth" of other stock, the allegations of the value of the stock were held sufficient to support a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. Herrlich v. McDonald, 80 Cal. 460.

3. Stirling v. Garritee, 18 Md. 468; Ryan v. Hurley, 119 Ind. 115.

It is not necessary that the damages be specifically alleged, but only that they be claimed as part of the relief demanded. Levi v. Legg, 23 S. Car. 282.

Nor is it necessary to state the amount of the damage. Mattingly v. Darwin, 23 Ill. 567.

recovered, they should be specially laid.¹ The omission of a material averment in the complaint may be cured by its express admission in the answer.²

Where there is an allegation of a refusal to account, or of an actual conversion, it is unnecessary to allege a demand and refusal,³ and it is improper to charge the defendant with making a malicious use of the property.⁴ The declaration may contain a count in trover and one in trespass vi et armis,⁵ and a recovery may be had on a single count for several articles taken and converted at different times and places.⁶

Trover is a transitory action and the venue may be laid in any county, though the conversion took place out of the jurisdiction of the state courts;⁷ but the place where the cause of action arose is prima facie the place where the venue ought to be laid.⁸

1. See infra, this title, Measure of Damages.

2. Where the complaint failed to allege the delivery of the property to the defendant, together with the object of the delivery, and the refusal of the defendant to return it, the omission was held to be cured by the express admission of those facts in the answer. Ferrera v. Parke, 19 Oregon 141.

In Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Lawson, 88 Ky. 496, it was held that if the petition was defective in not positively averring a conversion, the defect was cured by the answer which denied that the defendant had "converted said goods." And see Ramsey v. Hurley (Tex. 1888), 12 S. W. Rep. 56.

3. Sloan v. Lick Creek, etc., Gravel Road Co., 6 Ind. App. 584; Knowlton v. Logansport, 75 Ind. 103; Snyder v. Barber, 74 Ind. 47; Bunger v. Roddy, 70 Ind. 26; Proctor v. Cole, 66 Ind. 576; Nelson v. Corwin, 59 Ind. 489; Jeffersonville, etc., R. Co. v. Gent, 35 Ind. 39; Ferguson v. Dunn, 28 Ind. 58; Robinson v. Skipworth, 23 Ind. 311; Reish v. Reynolds, 68 Ind. 561; Schmidt v. Garfield Nat. Bank, 64 Hun (N. Y.) 298; Saratoga Gas, etc., Co. v. Hazard, 55 Hun (N. Y.) 251; Pease v. Smith, 61 N. Y. 481; LaFayette County Bank v. Metcalf, 40 Mo. App. 502; Holdridge v. Lee (S. Dak. 1892), 52 N. W. Rep. 265.

An allegation that the defendant collected a certain sum of money belonging to the plaintiff which he failed and refused to account for, necessarily implies a demand, for there can be no refusal without a demand. Sloan v. Lick Creek, etc., Gravel Road Co., 6 Ind. App. 584; Snyder v. Barber, 74 Ind. 47.

An allegation of a wrongful taking of the property is sufficient without averring a demand. Norman v. Horn, 36 Mo. App. 419.

But where the goods came properly into the hands of the defendant, a demand and refusal should be alleged. Baker v. Fuller, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 318.

4. He is only liable for its value. Moffatt v. Pratt, 12 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 48.

5. And the declaration is not demurrable because the two appeared to be for the same cause of action. Lippman v. Myers, 53 N. J. L. 21.

6. Barron v. Davis, 4 N. H. 338.

7. Robinson v. Armstrong, 34 Me. 145; 1 Chitt. Pl. 282. Trover will lie in England for a conversion in Ireland. Brown v. Hedges, 1 Salk. 290. And see Barker v. Warren, 2 Mod. 270.

It is a transitory action and the trial might be transferred to a distant county, or even to a distant state, if the defendant should happen to be found there. Mather v. Ministers of Trinity Church, 3 S. & R. (Pa.) 511; 8 Am. Dec. 663.

Jurisdiction.—The action may be brought before a justice of the peace. Smith v. Grove, 12 Mo. 51; Anonymous, 3 N. J. L. 487.

Postmaster Detaining Mail.—A postmaster is liable to an action of trover in the state courts, for improperly detaining mail matter, though the detention is under color of a regulation of the post office department. Teall v. Felton, 1 N. Y. 537; 49 Am. Dec. 352.

8. If the defendant shows by affidavit where the cause of action arose, exclusively, and that he has witness material to his defense residing in that county, he has a right to have the venue there. The plaintiff can only divest him of this right by stipulating to give evidence arising in the county where he has laid the venue, and in addition to that, stating, by affidavit, that he has witness material to his cause residing in that county. Duryee v. Orcott, 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 248.

2. Bond.—Under the South Carolina Act of 1827, the action of trover was made a proceeding in rem; ¹ the plaintiff could be required to give a bond to be answerable for all damages sustained by the defendant through his illegal conduct in commencing the action, ² and the defendant to give a bond for the forthcoming of the property, the subject-matter of the action. ³

Where the venue is not laid within the county where the act complained of was done, the plaintiff cannot, after the evidence is given on the trial, submit to a non-suit, and the defendant is entitled to the verdict. Hull v. Southworth, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 265.

1. The act of 1827 makes the action of trover commenced under its provisions, a proceeding in rem, and when a writ is issued and served, the chattel is in the custody of the law and cannot be distrained for rent. Seigling v. Main, 1 McMull. (S. Car.) 252.

A writ in trover cannot be served under the provisions of this act in any other district than that to which it is returnable. Nesbit v. McDaniel, Cheves (S. Car.) 12.

2. In an action on a bond given by the plaintiff in trover, in pursuance of the act of 1827, "to be answerable for all damages which the defendants might sustain by any illegal conduct in commencing and conducting the said action of trover," the mere fact that the defendant had a verdict does not constitute a breach of the condition of the bond. "Illegal conduct" means something which the law prohibits, and the plaintiff's conduct is not illegal because he failed to establish his right of action. Brown v. Spann, 3 Hill (S. Car.) 324.

3. Ricks v. Richardson, Dudley (S. Car.) 57; Haile v. Miller, 12 Rich. (S. Car.) 163; Bowen v. Coker, 3 Rich. (S. Car.) 142.

Whenever the law requires the defendant to give security, and makes it the duty of the sheriff to obtain that security from him, it implies a power of arrest. Under an order conformable to the Trover Act of 1827, requiring the defendant to give security for the forthcoming of the property, the sheriff has a right to take the body of the defendant and keep him in custody until he gives the security. Poole v. Vernon, 2 Hill (S. Car.) 667. But where the sheriff has taken security for the production of the property, under the act of 1827, he cannot afterwards retake the defendant on account of the alleged insufficiency of such security. Ricks v. Richardson, Dudley (S. Car.) 57.

The defendant might even be required to give a bond under the Trover Act of 1827 for the production of the property, and to give bail also. Vose v. Hannahan, 6 Rich. (S. Car.) 225.

It is a necessary legal consequence that if the chattel sued for, is not delivered to satisfy the plaintiff's judgment, the trover bond is forfeited, unless the defendant, or his security when sued, can show something which will in law save his bond; and where the sheriff levied on, and offered for sale, a chattel which was the subject of a pending action of trover, and either from there having been no sale effected or from the defendant himself having been the bidder, the right of property remains unchanged, the sheriff will not be considered as having put it out of the power of the defendant to produce the chattel, according to the condition of his trover bond. Floyd v. Ervin, 1 Strobb. (S. Car.) 437.

The bond taken by the sheriff for the production of the chattel may be discharged by the plaintiff, or the chattels for which the action is brought may be delivered up to the sheriff by the defendant, and the bond canceled, in order to discharge the sureties, and make them competent witnesses. Brown v. Spann, 3 Hill (S. Car.) 324; Bowen v. Coker, 3 Rich. (S. Car.) 142.

A trover bond conditioned for the production of the chattel is not void because it contains a further bad condition for the appearance of the defendant. Haile v. Miller, 12 Rich. (S. Car.) 163.

The defendant has a right to use a chattel pending the action, and is not liable for any natural deterioration arising from the ordinary use of it. Floyd v. Ervin, 1 Strobb. (S. Car.) 437.

3. Plea or Answer.—The general issue, in trover, is not guilty. There is some conflict of authority as to the right of the defendant to show, under such plea, that the plaintiff had no such interest in the property as would authorize him to sue in trover. It is generally held in the United States that he can,¹ and this was

Continuance.—It has been held in South Carolina that the defendant in trover may be ordered to give bail to the action as the condition of a continuance of the cause granted at his instance. Stanley v. Miers, 1 Brev. (S. Car.) 24.

1. Coffin v. Anderson, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 395; Swope v. Paul, 4 Ind. App. 463; Eureka Iron Works v. Bresnahan, 66 Mich. 493; Ribble v. Lawrence, 51 Mich. 569; Jones v. Rahilly, 16 Minn. 320; Kenny v. Georgen, 36 Minn. 190; Johnson v. Oswald, 38 Minn. 550. And see Gerard v. Jones, 78 Ind. 378; Ford v. Griffin, 100 Ind. 85; Brevoort v. Brevoort, 40 N. Y. Super Ct. 211; Kennedy v. Strong, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 289; Fenlason v. Rackliff, 50 Me. 362; O'Connell v. Kilpatrick, 64 Md. 122; Rotan v. Fletcher, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 207. Defendant may show a paramount title in a stranger. Schermerhorn v. Van Volkenburgh, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 529; Kennedy v. Strong, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 130; Cook v. Howard, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 284; Aikin v. Buck, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 466; Davis v. Hoppock, 6 Duer (N. Y.) 254. But where it appears that the plaintiff was in the actual possession of the goods at the time of the taking, the defendant should connect himself in some way with such stranger owner. Wheeler v. Lawson, 103 N. Y. 40; Earl v. Camp, 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 562; Duncan v. Spear, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 54; Eureka Iron Works v. Bresnahan, 66 Mich. 494; Harker v. Dement, 9 Gill (Md.) 7; 52 Am. Dec. 670.

Where the action is based solely on a wrongful detention, the defendant may, under the general denial, show title in a stranger, although he does not connect himself with such title. Griffin v. Long Island R. Co., 101 N. Y. 348.

The defendant may prove property in himself at the date of the alleged conversion. See McClelland v. Nichols, 24 Minn. 176; or that he had a mortgage on the property, Schoenrock v. Farley, 49 N. Y. Super. Ct. 302; and where the action is for the conversion of hoops, may show title to the land from which they were cut. Hart v. Hart, 48 Mich. 175. And see Swift

v. James, 50 Wis. 540; Tyson v. McGuineas, 25 Wis. 656; Vanness v. Nafie, 5 N. J. L. 683. But the plaintiff may dispute such title. Parks v. Loomis, 6 Gray (Mass.) 467.

The plaintiff's admission that the property is in a third person may be proved at the trial. See Glenn v. Garrison, 17 N. J. L. 1; or the defendant may give any evidence showing a right of property or right of possession in another, Robinson v. Peru Plow, etc., Co., 1 Okla. 140; for the general denial denies not only the conversion, but also the plaintiff's title. Robinson v. Frost, 14 Barb. (N. Y.) 536.

The defendant can offer anything in evidence tending to show that the plaintiff had no title in the matter in controversy at the institution of the action, or that the ownership was in a third person, or that the alleged cause of action never existed, or that he had no right to the alleged cause of action, as fraud in the acquisition of the plaintiff's title, Thomas v. Ramsey, 47 Mo. App. 84; for the plaintiff upon the general issue must recover upon the strength of his own title and right of possession, and not on the want of title in his adversary. Bricker v. Hughes, 4 Ind. 146. But the defendant cannot, under the general denial, show that the promise supporting the bill of sale under which plaintiff claims, was unfilled, or that the bill was an unlawful preference under the laws of the state relating to general assignments for the benefit of creditors, Boyle v. Williams, 1 Misc. (N. Y.) 112; nor is evidence that the plaintiff has had dealings with the defendant in which he became indebted to the latter, and for which judgment is pending in the defendant's favor, admissible under the general denial. National S. S. Co. v. Tugman, 143 U. S. 28.

Under the Michigan practice, a plea containing in substance the general issue, and notice that special matters of defense will be introduced, is sufficient, Adams v. Kellogg, 63 Mich. 105; and where the goods were taken in attachment against a third person, the officer must give notice of his attachment in order to admit evidence of justification formerly the rule in England;¹ but since the adoption of the pleading rules of Hilary Term, the general issue of not guilty is there held to operate only as a denial of the conversion, and not of the plaintiff's title to the goods,² and this is the rule adopted thereunder. Eureka Iron Works v. Bresnahan, 66 Mich. 489; Frankel v. Coots, 41 Mich. 75; Fry v. Soper, 39 Mich. 727. And see McLaughlin v. Smith, 45 Mich. 277.

In Daggett v. Adams, 1 Me. 201, Mellen, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "When a debtor, from whom property has been taken by an officer on mesne process or execution, sues such officer for such taking, a mere general issue would not be sufficient, because proof of property in the plaintiff, and of a taking by the defendant would maintain the action. If, therefore, in such case the defendant claims a right to take away and dispose of the property, he must either set forth that right, in the form of a special plea of justification, or accompany the general issue with a brief statement which must contain, though in a less formal manner, the nature of his authority, and the manner in which he has exercised it."

In Pemberton v. Smith, 3 Head (Tenn.) 18, it was held that all matters of defense might be given in evidence under the general issue, save a release and the Statute of Limitations, and that a plea of justification was unnecessary on the part of an officer selling the property under an execution.

In Blakey v. Douglas (Pa. 1886), 6 Atl. Rep. 398, it was held that under the general issue, the plaintiff must prove his title, general or special, coupled with the right of immediate possession and the wrongful conversion by the defendant, and that the latter might rebut either of the allegations of fact on which the plaintiff's right of action depends; for example, he might show an outstanding paramount title to the property in controversy, or that he had not wrongfully converted it to his own use.

In Sylvester v. Girard, 4 Rawle (Pa.) 185, it was held that under the plea of not guilty, the defendant can defeat the plaintiff by showing title in himself or a third person, and that either will equally defeat the plaintiff's recovery.

In Miller v. Knapp (Pa. 1890), 19 Atl. Rep. 555; 26 W. N. C. (Pa.) 29, it was held that under the plea of not guilty, the defendant could give in evidence the record of proceedings before a justice of the peace, showing that the swine for which the action of trover was brought were taken and condemned according to law, for being suffered to be at large without rings in their noses.

1. Leake v. Loveday, 4 M. & G. 972; 43 E. C. L. 500; 1 Chitt. Pl. 489; Gilb. C. P. 64, 65. A special plea in trover, though admitted, was censured by Lord Kenyon, in Webb v. Fox, 7 T. R. 391. And see Lynner v. Wood, Cro. Car. 157.

2. White v. Teal, 12 Ad. & El. 106; 40 E. C. L. 33; Reg. Gen. Hil. T., 4 W. 4; Reg. Gen. Hil. T., 16 Vict., 1 El. & Bl.; 1 Chitt. Pl. 530; 3 Steph. N. P. 2668; 1 Add. Torts, § 529. The plaintiff is entitled to a verdict on the plea of not guilty if a conversion in form is shown, although it appears that he had parted with his property in the goods at the time of the conversion. Vernon v. Shipton, 2 M. & W. 9, 2 Gale 195. Nor can the defendant, under such plea, set up an absolute property in the goods in himself by sale from the plaintiff, although the only evidence of a conversion is a demand and refusal. Barton v. Brown, 5 M. & W. 298. But the plea of not guilty only admits the plaintiff's property or right of possession to the extent necessary to maintain the action of trover, and the defendant may therefore show that he was a tenant in common with the plaintiff, Stancliffe v. Hardwick, 2 C. M. & R. 1; Higgins v. Thomas, 8 Q. B. 908; 55 E. C. L. 908; or that he has some qualified right in the property and has only dealt with it in the manner in which he was entitled to in the exercise of such right. Young v. Cooper, 6 Exch. 259; Wilkinson v. Whalley, 5 M. & G. 590; 44 E. C. L. 311; Verrall v. Robinson, 2 C. M. & R. 495; Kynaston v. Crouch, 14 M. & W. 266; per Parke, B. Evidence of a lien is not admissible under the general issue, for the plea denies only the conversion and admits a title in the plaintiff, which includes the right of possession, and a lien is inconsistent with such right. White v. Teal, 4 P. & D. 43; 12 Ad. & El. 106; 40 E. C. L. 33. Nor can it be shown that the goods were given to the plaintiff by the defendant in some states.¹ Under those rules, if the defendant wishes to put in issue the plaintiff's right to the possession of the goods, he should traverse that he was possessed of them as of his own property, in the manner and form as alleged in the declaration.² All matters in confession and avoidance should be specially pleaded,³ and no special plea in bar can be good unless it upon a condition and retaken by the latter upon its non-performance. Jones v. Davies, 2 L. M. & P. 483; 6 Exch. 663; 20 L. J. Exch. 483.

Under the general denial, however, the defendant may show that there was not a wrongful conversion. See Mayhew v. Herrick, 7 C. B. 229; 18 L. J. C. P. 179; 62 E. C. L. 229; such plea putting in issue the legality of the conversion and not the mere fact of conversion. Young v. Cooper, 6 Exch. 259. And see Kynaston v. Crouch, 14 M. & W. 266.

1. In Florida, under the rules governing the practice of the circuit court, which were copied from the rules of court of Hilary Term, 4 Wm. IV., the plea of not guilty operates as a denial only of the conversion, and not of the facts stated in the inducement, and the defendant cannot, under such plea, introduce evidence in denial of all property or right of possession in the plaintiff. Robinson v. Hartridge, 13 Fla. 501. And see Skinner v. Pinney, 19 Fla. 42; 45 Am. Rep. 1.

Under Massachusetts Pub. St., ch. 167, § 20, the defendant is required to set forth in his answer, in clear and precise terms, each fact intended to be relied upon in the avoidance of the action. Savage v. Darling, 151 Mass. 5.

In an action of trover by the purchaser of goods, the defendant cannot avail himself of his equitable right under New York Code of Civ. Proc., § 507, to have the contract rescinded, where the answer does not ask for rescission, or offer to repay the money paid therein. McLeod v. Maloney, 3 N. Y. Supp. 617; 51 Hun (N. Y.) 636. Under New York Code, § 508, where the facts stated in the answer are intended only as a partial defense, or in mitigation of damages, the answer must so state and give notice, and if no such statement is made, it will be assumed that they were pleaded as a complete defense, and if demurred to, must be tested as such. Thompson v. Halbert, 109 N. Y. 329.

Where the goods were sold under execution, it was held that the defendant might show, under such plea, that the plaintiff authorized the sale. Pickard v. Sears, 6 Ad. & El. 469; 33 E. C. L. 115.

It is held that this plea, denying the plaintiff's right of possession, is equivalent to the general issue under the former practice, and under it the defendant may show that the goods belonged to a third person. Leake v. Loveday, 4 M. & G. 972; 2 Dowl. N. S. 624.

Such plea means that the plaintiff has no property in the goods as against the defendant. Nicolls v. Bastard, 2 C. M. & R. 659.

In trover by the assignee of a bankrupt, a plea that the plaintiff is not the assignee puts in issue the petitioning creditor's debt and the act of bankruptcy. Butler v. Hobson, 4 Bing. N. Cas. 290; 33 E. C. L. 358.

In Samuel v. Duke, 6 Dowl. P. C. 544, it is said that in trover against a sheriff who has levied under feri facias, if the act of conversion be seizure of goods, a justification under the writ must be specially pleaded; but if the conversion be the sale of goods, the justification may be given in evidence under a plea denying the plaintiff's right of possession.

Where a sheriff justifies under an attachment and order of sale therein issued, an averment that of the "proceedings under said order of sale, said defendant made due return to said confesses and avoids the facts set forth in the declaration as constituting the conversion.¹

4. Pleading and Proof Must Correspond.—The proof must correspond with the allegations in the pleadings.²

court, according to the mandate thereof," is not a sufficient allegation of the return of the attachment or order of sale. Young v. Davis, 30 Ala. 213.

A plea of former recovery in an action based on a wrongful sale of the property, is demurrable, unless it shows that the conversion and sale were identical. Hopkinson v. Shelton, 37 Ala. 306.

A plea justifying the conversion under a judgment of a justice of the peace, which fails to allege that the proceedings were had within the territorial jurisdiction of the justice, is defective. Vaden v. Ellis, 18 Ark. 355. A plea of former recovery in assumpsit for the non-performance of the same promises mentioned in the declaration, is bad. Smith v. Scantling, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 443.

The defendant may plead in bar a valid release to his co-trespassers. Montgomery v. Erwin, 24 Ark. 540.

An answer alleging a purchase of the property from the plaintiff, with a detailed statement of the facts leading to the purchase, states a good defense. Mynatt v. Hudson, 66 Tex. 66.

In an action for conversion for failure to return a horse left with defendant to be pastured, an answer to the effect that by the terms of the contract, the defendant was not to be responsible on account of any injury caused by a railroad passing over his farm, or loss or casualties resulting from insufficient fences to confine the horse, but failing to show that the failure to return was caused by the railroad, or insufficient fences, is bad on demurrer. Glenn v. Dailey, 96 Ind. 472.

In an action for the conversion of money, an allegation in the answer that the money had been paid to the plaintiff, is not inconsistent with a general denial of the allegations in the complaint, showing the plaintiff's right to receive the money. First Nat. Bank v. Lincoln, 36 Minn. 132.

Proof of a mortgaged title in the plaintiff supports an allegation that the property converted was hers, and is not a variance. Duggan v. Wright, 157 Mass. 228.

In an action by the assignee of a corporation, the defendant may, under the averment that he bought the goods from the company, show a purchase from its general manager. Hamm v. Drew, 83 Tex. 77.

Where an action is brought for the conversion of a slave called John, the plaintiff cannot recover upon proof of the conversion of a slave where there was no proof that his name was John. Ward v. Smith, 8 Ired. (N. Car.) 296.

Joint Conversion.—Where the complaint charges a joint conversion, the plaintiff is not bound to prove a joint conversion or fail; he may recover against one while the others are acquitted. Ray v. Light, 34 Ark. 421. But this does not allow a joint action against defendants for several trespasses. Dahms v. Sears, 13 Oregon 47.

Where the conversion was alleged to have been made by the defendant and another, on whom the writ had not been served, it was held that the action was sustained by proof of the conversion by defendant alone. Barron v. Davis, 4 N. H. 338.

An allegation as to place is immaterial, and it is not a material variance, therefore, where the evidence shows a different place from that alleged. First Nat. Bank v. Brown (Tex. 1892), 23 S. W. Rep. 862.

3. See EVIDENCE, vol. 7, p. 42.

The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show conversion.¹ An original tortious taking is presumptive evidence of conversion against anyone in whose possession the property may be found, and the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show that he came honestly by the property.² It is not necessary that the guilt of the defendant be shown beyond a reasonable doubt, but the verdict should be given according to the weight of evidence, as in other civil cases.³ If the defendant admits the act of conversion, but claims title to the goods, he must prove it.⁴

b. PROOF OF TITLE OR POSSESSION.—The plaintiff must show property and prove the title he has chosen to allege in the declaration.⁵ If he relies upon written evidence to establish the Evidence that a man fetched goods away, saying that he was ordered by the defendant so to do, and that his name was painted on a cart in which they were taken, is not sufficient to connect the defendant with the taking. Everest v. Wood, 1 C. & P. 75; 11 E. C. L. 320.

Conditional Sale.—Delivery upon a sale is presumed absolute, and the plaintiff, the vendor, reclaiming the goods, must show the condition on which he relies. Furniss v. Hone, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 256.

Quantity and Quality of Goods.—In an action to recover a stock of goods, it appeared that only a part of the stock was converted. Upon failure to show the quantity and character of the converted articles, or the value of any of them, it was held that the direction of a verdict for the defendant was proper. First Nat. Bank v. Montgomery, 70 Miss. 550.

It is competent for the plaintiff, in an action by a consignee against the carrier for the conversion of a part of a carload of grain in bulk, to prove that he has paid for the entire load. Peebles v. Boston R. Co., 112 Mass. 498.

In an action for the conversion of ice, the testimony of a railway agent as to the number of carloads shipped by the defendant at the time of the alleged conversion, and the amount in each car, although it does not purport to give the exact quantity shipped, is admissible. Gregory v. Rosenkrans, 78 Wis. 451.

The plaintiff's testimony as to the quantity of logs converted was not objectionable as a mere guess, when based upon a careful estimate made on the premises. Clink v. Gunn, 90 Mich. 135.

Confusion of Goods.—Where property has been mingled with the goods of the defendant, without his fault, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show what portion of the goods he is entitled to. Wilson v. Wilson, 37 Md. 1; 11 Am. Rep. 518.

When the jury has been charged, in an action for conversion, that plaintiff must prove his ownership, it is not error to refuse to charge that he must prove that the sale under which he claims has actually occurred. Jacobs v. Totty, 76 Tex. 343.

The plaintiff sued the defendant for the conversion of oil placed in his possession for storage by W, and to establish his title, introduced in evidence a judgment roll in an action brought by W against him, in which the title to the oil was in issue, and in which it was decided that he was the owner, and it was held that the judgment conclusively property, which he fails in doing, he cannot recur to, and rely on, a mere possessory title.¹ Where title is acquired by bill of sale, or other like written instrument, it should be produced, or its absence accounted for;² but where it has been acquired by oral sale, the writings pertaining thereto, subsequently accepted, need not be produced.³ If the plaintiff relies upon a mortgage for his title, it must be produced.⁴ An oral agreement cannot be produced to control the effect or construction of such mortgage.⁵

To show title to severed portions of the realty, evidence of the ownership of the lands may be introduced.⁶

The plaintiff may testify directly as to his possession,⁷ and declarations of a party in possession are admissible to explain the nature of the possession, as that he holds subordinate to another.⁸

Bill of Lading—Evidence of Title in Consignee.—In Halliday v. Hamilton, 11 Wall. (U. S.) 560, it was held that where goods are put in charge of a carrier by a purchaser, to be transported to consignees in pursuance of a special agreement that they shall sell the goods to pay a draft made against the goods, the bill of lading being attached to and sent with the draft, the legal title of the goods passes to the consignees on delivery to the carrier.

Parol evidence is not admissible to prove that a contract produced in writing for the sale of goods was intended to embrace property not mentioned in the writing, nor that other property was to pass on the same consideration which the writing has limited to the property specified in it. Ripley v. Paige, 12 Vt. 353.

The declarations of a person in possession are admissible as a part of the

Such declarations or admissions are not only competent to rebut a title set up by the party who made it, but are affirmative evidence of title in the party for whom the person in possession declares that he holds.¹ Acts and declarations of the defendant with respect to the property converted, are admissible in an action of trover.²

6. Effect of Judgment for Plaintiff.—A recovery by the plaintiff in trover operates to divest him of his property in the chattels converted, and to transfer his title to the defendant.³ There has been not a little conflict of authority, both in the United States and in England, as to whether this transfer of title is effectuated by the mere rendition of the judgment in favor of the plaintiff,⁴ or

The declarations of one in the occupancy of land, that he is in as the servant of the plaintiff, are sufficient evidence to prove the possession and title of such plaintiff. Woods v. Blodgett, 18 N. H. 249; Rand v. Dodge, 17 N. H. 343.

Declarations of one in possession of personal property, that it is owned by another, are competent evidence in favor of a person declared to be the owner, as against an officer who has attached it as the property of the party in possession. Putnam v. Osgood, 52 N. H. 148.

The declaration of a person in the possession of goods, ad ante litem motam, that he made over the property to a third person, is competent evidence in favor of such third person against a creditor of the declarant, who has subsequently attached the property. Wolcott v. Keith, 22 N. H. 196.

The testimony as to statements made by an attaching debtor, in his action in regard to the property, may be introduced in favor of the plaintiff, claiming as his vendee in an action against the sheriff, to recover the attached property. Adams v. Kellogg, 63 Mich. 105; Caldwell v. Wilson, 2 Spears (S. Car.) 63.

In Adams v. Broughton, 2 Str. 1078, it is maintained that the judgment, and not the payment of the money recovered, changes the property, and that the true rule is as laid down by Parke, B., in King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 495, "that that which is uncertain is made certain by the judgment, and then the whether the judgment must be actually satisfied, to accomplish this result. The weight of modern authority in both countries seems to sustain this latter proposition.¹ Satisfaction of a judgment for the full value of the property converted is a bar to any judgment affords a higher remedy and the right of action for trover is merged in it."

"A judgment in trover," says the court in Bogan v. Wilburn, 1 Spears (S. Car.) 179, "is an acknowledgment by the plaintiff in the most solemn form that his property has become the property of the defendant by conversion. And as the plaintiff, by commencing and continuing the action, has shown his confidence in the personal credit of defendant, and the verdict gives him damages commensurate with the price of the chattel and its hire, from the conversion to the verdict, the recovery is a discharge of all right of action touching the use of the chattel, subsequent to the conversion complained of." And in Norris v. Beckley, 2 Mill (S. Car.) 228, it is resolved that "by bringing an action of trover, the plaintiff trusts to the personal credit of the defendant in the same manner as by taking a note or bond in payment of property sold. The property is changed, even though the money should never be recovered."

By obtaining the judgment, the plaintiff in trover acquires a right to demand and receive from the defendant a specific sum of money, in lieu and in satisfaction of his right to the property. Fox v. Northern Liberties, 3 W. & S. (Pa.) 103.

Brinsmead v. Harrison, L. R., 6 C. P. 584, is an oft-quoted authority to the effect that the mere rendition of a judgment in trover without satisfaction thereof does not vest the title to the property in the defendant. "The only way," says Willes, J., in this case, "that the judgment in trover can have the effect of vesting the property in the defendant, is by treating the judgment as being (that which in truth it ordinarily is), an assessment of the value of the goods, and treating the satisfaction of the damages as payment of the price, as upon a sale of the goods."

Lovejoy v. Murray, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 1, was an action of trespass in which the defendant pleaded in bar a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in a former action against a joint trespasser, and the court resolved that, "Nothing short of satisfaction, or its equivalent, can make good the plea of former judgment in trespass offered as a bar in an action against another joint trespasser, who was not a party to the first judgment." Judge Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court, reaches this subsequent action by the plaintiff for the same property, against the same defendant, or one standing in privity with him.¹ A partial recovery does not have this effect.² The general rule is that the title thus transferred to the defendant has relation back to the time of the conversion.³ However, this relation back will not operate to render a third person a trespasser for any act done conclusion very satisfactorily. He says: "In reference to the doctrine that the judgment alone vests the title of the property converted in the defendant, we have seen that it is not sustained by the weight of authority in this country. It is equally incapable of being maintained on principle. The property which was mine has been taken from me by fraud or violence. In order to procure redress I must sue the wrongdoer in a court of law. But, instead of getting justice or remedy, I am told that by the very act of obtaining the judgment—a decision that I am entitled to the relief I ask—the property which before was mine has become that of the man who did me wrong; in other words, the law, without giving me satisfaction for my wrong, takes from me that which was mine and gives it to the wrongdoer. It is sufficient to state the proposition to show its injustice. It is said that the judgment represents the price of the property, and as the plaintiff has the judgment, the defendant should have the property. But if the judgment does represent the price of the goods, does it follow that the defendant should have the property before he has paid that price? The payment of the price, and the transfer of the property are, in the ordinary contract of sale, current acts."

"It is clear from these authorities," says O'Neil, J., in Jones v. McNeil, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 466, "that even in trover, to constitute a bar to a second action for the value of the chattel, the verdict must have found a sum intended to cover the value of the chattel; and in trespass the force of this rule is enhanced, and its application is the more immediate inasmuch as in this form of action the injury done to the possession, and not right of property, is the gravamen of the action."

A judgment in trover for permanent conversion changes the property; but it seems to be competent for the plaintiff in that action to show that the damages were given for temporary conversion, and not as the value of the chattel. 3 Starkie on Ev., pt. 4, 1508.

In the same book and page, note Z., a reference is made to Gilbert's Law Ev. 265 (2d ed.), and Trials per Pais, 224, where it is said to be laid down, "that if a jury give but three pounds damages for a horse whose real value is fifteen pounds, a new action lies for damages for the horse, where evidence may be given that the first action was only for the conversion, and not for the damages for the horse itself."

In trover by A against B for a bedstead, B pleaded a former recovery by A in trover for the same identical bedstead against C, averring that the conversion by C for which that action was brought was a conversion not later in point of time than the conversion mentioned in the declaration against B, and that before the conversion in that declaration mentioned, C, being possessed of the bedstead, sold it to B, who paid him for the same and received it under such sale, and that the taking under such sale was the conversion complained of in the declaration against B. In Cooper v. Shepherd, 3 C. B. 266; 54 E. C. L. 265, it was held that this plea was a good answer to the action.

2. See authorities cited in note 1, supra.

In Holmes v. Wilson, 10 Ad. & El. 503; 37 E. C. L. 161, it appears: "By a recovery in trespass for taking, or trover for converting, personal chattels, followed by satisfaction, the property is altered and vests in the defendant; but it is otherwise, where the damages were not estimated on the footing of the full value."

by him between the time of the conversion, and the rendition of the judgment.¹

VIII. MEASURE OF DAMAGES—1. General Rule.—In trover, the plaintiff does not seek to recover the property in specie, nor property of a like kind or value, but he seeks the equivalent in money of that of which he has been deprived, and, consequently, as a general rule, the measure of the damages is the value of the property at the time of the conversion, with legal interest thereon, from the date of the conversion to the entry of judgment,²

Carpenter, J., in Atwater v. Tupper, 45 Conn. 144; 29 Am. Rep. 674, seems to combat the theory that the title changes by relation back to the time of the conversion. "There is no substantial reason," says he, "for holding that the change of the title, whenever it occurs, takes effect by relation at the time of the conversion. The only reason that occurs to us is that the plaintiff recovers interest from the time of conversion. But that argument fails, when we consider, as we may, that the interest is an equivalent for the use of the property in the meantime. . . . We are satisfied that the better rule is that the title changes when the judgment is satisfied." His position does not seem supported by authority.

2. Where Plaintiff Has Limited Interest.—The owner of a limited interest, who is liable over to the general owner, may, in an action of trover against a stranger, recover, not merely the extent of his interest, but the entire value of the goods at the time of the conversion;³ but, in the absence of this responsibility over, the owner

Where one bought cotton from a warehouseman, and subsequently sold it, but left the cotton in the warehouse, and when he went to make delivery to his vendee discovered that the warehouseman had, before the first sale, sold a portion of it to a third party and could not deliver it, and was thereby compelled to account to the second vendee for the deficit and the advance of price, it was held that the damages to be allowed should be measured by what he was compelled to pay his vendee, and not for what he originally paid for the cotton. *Beall v. In Hayden v. Smith's Case, 13 Cook 489, the rule is thus stated: "He who hath a special property of the goods at a certain time shall have a general action of trespass against him who hath a general property, and upon evidence, damages shall be mitigated; but clearly the bailee or he who hath the special property, shall have a general action of trespass against a stranger, and shall recover all damages with which he is chargeable over." See St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co. v. Biggs, 50 Ark. 173.

One who has received goods belonging to another from a sheriff, and has given a receipt promising to redeliver when required, may recover full damages in trover for their conversion. Poole v. Symonds, 1 N. H. 289; 8 Am. Dec. 71.

In Turner v. Hardcastle, 11 C. B. N. S. 683; 10 E. C. L. 683, in trover for the goods, by assignees of a bankrupt, the goods having been purchased by him under an agreement by which the money was to be paid by installments, and an assignment of the property was to be executed by the vendor, and the whole purchase-money had been paid with power to the vendor to re-enter, in case of default of payment of the installment, it was held that the assignees were entitled to recover the full value of such goods against the stranger, notwithstanding default had been made in payment of some of the installments, and the vendor had, to that extent, an interest in the goods.

Bailee.—A bailee who is answerable over to the bailor for the safe keeping of property, is entitled to recover against a stranger the full value of the property bailed. Caswell v. Howard, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 562; Pomeroy v. Smith, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 85.

Sheriff.—An officer who holds goods under attachment may recover the full value of the goods in an action of trover against one who wrongfully converts them. An officer who attaches and sells on execution, goods held by another officer on a prior attachment, and afterwards again attached by that officer, and pays off the debt to pay which the first attachment was made, is liable in an action to the first officer for the full value of the goods. So in an action for the conversion of a ship, evidence that the plaintiff was the owner of but one-sixteenth part thereof, will go in the reduction of damages. Dockwray v. Dickenson, Skin. 640.

The plaintiff's debtor transferred a note to the defendant for collection and handed the receipt for it to the plaintiff as collateral security. The defendant, not being able to collect it, allowed it to go into the possession of the plaintiff's debtor, who collected it and paid the plaintiff a portion of his debt. In trover, it was held that the measure of damages was the unpaid portion of the plaintiff's debt, and not the entire value of the note, since the plaintiff would not be liable over to his debtor for the difference between the amount of his debt and the full value. Sheldon v. Southern Express Co., 48 Ga. 625.

In Haverly v. Elliott (Neb. 1894), 57 N. W. Rep. 1010, where the plaintiff owned and conducted a confectionery store, the defendant, having a lien against the property, brought suit in equity to foreclose it, and obtained the appointment of a receiver, who took possession of the property and place of business, and sold the property to pay the lien; in an action of trover for the conversion, it having been decided that the order appointing the receiver was wrongful, it was held that the measure of the plaintiff's damages was the value of her interest in the property sold by the receiver, at the time he took possession of the same, and the actual loss sustained by the suspension of her business during the time she was prevented from carrying it on.

entitled to the possession, may, as against a stranger, recover the full value of the property converted;¹ so may, also, a lessee,² or pledgee.³

But as against the general owner, or one claiming under him, the owner of a limited interest can recover only the value of such interest.⁴ As against his debtor, a creditor who has wrongfully corn to the defendant for transportation, subject to plaintiff's directions. The plaintiff had previously sold to a third person, who had paid part of the consideration. Without authority from the plaintiff, the defendant delivered it to the purchaser. It was held that the measure of damages was the full value with interest, but that the plaintiff was entitled to prove in mitigation of damages that the purchaser had paid for the corn.

Recovery by Partner.—In an action of trover for the conversion of the interest of one partner in partnership property, the measure of damages is the value of his undivided share in the property converted, irrespective of the question whether or not the partnership was solvent, and without regard to the state of the partnership accounts. Carrie v. Cloverdale Banking, etc., Co., 90 Cal. 84.

2. In Harker v. Dement, 9 Gill (Md.) 7; 52 Am. Dec. 670, it was held that in an action of trespass by a termor against his reversor for an unauthorized interruption of his possession during the term, the measure of damages is the actual loss sustained by the lessee. But in such an action against a stranger and wrongdoer, the termor is treated as the absolute owner of the property and is entitled to recover its full value. The termor, being bound to restore the property to him from whom he has obtained it, or to stand responsible in damages for its full value, has the right to recover its full value from a stranger who has wrongfully deprived him of it.

In Baker v. Hart, 52 Hun (N. Y.) 363, the plaintiffs were lessees of certain lands, with the right to quarry for a term of ten years only. The defendant dug and carried away a quantity of stone. In an action of trover, it was held that the plaintiffs could recover, although the lease gave them no title to the stone which they did not dig out; but only gave the right to the stone which they quarried themselves.

Where goods were deposited with a pawnbroker, in the way of his trade, being privileged from distress, in an action of trover by the pawnbroker, the measure of damages was held to be the full value of the goods, and not merely the plaintiff's interest therein. Swire v. Leech, 18 C. B. N. S. 479; 114 E. C. L. 477.

In Johnson v. Stear, 15 C. B. N. S. 330; 109 E. C. L. 330, where the pledgee had, by illegal dealing with the pledge, determined the bailment, and the pledgor had brought an action for the conversion of the goods, it was held that the proper measure of damages was the actual damage the pledgor had sustained by the conversion, and in this case, as there was no intention on his part to redeem, the pledge was merely nominal.

In Chamberlin v. Shaw, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 278, Shaw, C. J., said: "In an action of trover, though the plaintiff's possession of the property has been violated, he waives all claims to damages on account of that violation, and seeks an indemnity only for the loss of his property. Hence it is, that the value of the property at the time of the conversion is prima facie the measure of damages. Now, if the case is so situated, that the plaintiff can be indemnified by a sum of money less than the full value, there seems to be no reason why it should not be done, as where the plaintiff has a special property, subject to which the defendant is entitled to the goods. For instance, a factor has a lien on goods to half their value. The principal becomes bankrupt, and the property vests in his assignees, subject, of course, to all legal liens. The assignees denying and intending to contest the factor's lien, get possession of the goods and convert them. The factor brings trover, establishes his lien and recovers. How shall damages be assessed? If he recover the full value of the goods, he will be responsible directly back to the defendants themselves for a moiety of the value. To avoid circuity of action, why should not damages be assessed to the amount of his lien? He is fully indemnified, the balance of the value is in the hands of those entitled to it, and the whole controversy is settled in one suit. If the plaintiff is responsible over to a third person, or if, for any cause, the defendant is not entitled to the balance of the value, a very different rule should prevail, and justice would require that the whole value of the property should be assessed to the plaintiff."

In an action for the conversion of a watch, where it appeared that it was obtained by a third person from the plaintiff, falsely representing that it was for another person, but before the fraud was discovered the alleged purchaser paid several installments, it was held that as against the innocent pledgee, the plaintiff could recover only the market value of the watch, less the amount of the installments paid. Meeks

v. Simon (C. Pl.), 21 N. Y. Supp. 1004.

In White v. Allen, 133 Mass. 423, A delivered a quantity of hides to B, to be by him tanned and sold, and out of the proceeds of the sale, B was to pay A a certain sum at which the hides were charged to B, and was to retain the balance of the proceeds of the sale for his labor and services, but, until tanned and paid for, the title of the hides was to remain in the possession of A; where, before the process of tanning was complete, B died, and A took possession of the hides, completed the process, and sold them for a sum which was their value at the time A took possession, it was held that B's administrator might maintain an action of trover against A and might recover the difference between the amount at which the hides were charged to B and the amount realized from the sale by A.

Bailee of Co-Tenant.—In Benjamin v. Strempel, 13 Ill. 466, it was held that a bailee of goods of several tenants in common, might maintain an action of trover against a stranger and recover the full value to the owners, but that, as against a part owner, he could recover only the interest of the others; the value of the interest of the parties sued should be excluded in the assessment of damages. See also Dockway v. Dickinson, Skin. 640.

Sheriffs.—Where the conversion is by an officer acting under a legal writ against the general owner, the owner of the special interest may be entitled to the same measure of damages against him as against the general owner. See Baldwin v. Bradley, 69 Ill. 32; and Penland v. Leatherwood, 101 N. Car. 509. On the other hand, an officer holding under an attachment or execution in favor of the owner of the special interest, may recover the value of the interest only, that is, the amount of the execution, and not the full value of the goods taken. Linville v. Black, 5 Dana (Ky.) 176. See also Clark v. Dearborn, 103 Mass. 335; Booth v. Ableman, 20 Mich. 21; 88 Am. Dec. 730.

Where a sheriff levied an attachment on and sold property pledged to a third person to secure a debt which equalled the value of the property, the pledgee was entitled to recover of the sheriff the value of such property less prior liens thereon, and was not limited to the amount it sold for less such liens. Grabfilder v. Lockett (Tex. 1894), 26 S. W. Rep. 168.

converted the security and is sued therefor, may recoup the amount of his debt.¹ So may the innocent pledgee of such creditor or pawnee.² The mortgagee, as against the mortgagor, can recover only the extent of his mortgage debt.³ On the other hand, in the absence of proof of special damages, the mortgagor, as against the mortgagee, or those claiming under him, is entitled to recover only the value of the property converted, less the mortgage debt.⁴ As against a common carrier, who has a lien upon

Common Carrier.—In an action against a common carrier for the conversion of goods delivered to a person not authorized to receive them, who pays the freight upon them, the measure of damages is the market value of the goods less the freight, with interest from the date of the conversion. Forbes v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 133 Mass. 154.

Dalrymple*, 25 Md. 271; Johnson v. Stear, 15 C. B. N. S. 330; 109 E. C. L. 330.

In an action against a pledgee of a note given as collateral security, the measure of the plaintiff's damages is the difference between the collateral note and his indebtedness to the defendant at the time of the conversion. Hallack Lumber, etc., Co. v. Gray (Colo. 1893), 34 Pac. Rep. 1000.

2. In Ludden v. Buffalo, etc., Co., 22 Ill. App. 415, in an action of trover against the pledgee of certain goods pledged to him by the factor, it was held that, inasmuch as the form of action was equitable, the plaintiff could recover damages only to the extent of the injury actually sustained; and the pledgee might recoup from the value of the goods pledged, the amount of the factor's advances thereon. See also Belden v. Perkins, 78 Ill. 449.

In First Nat. Bank v. Boyce, 78 Ky. 42; 39 Am. Rep. 198, a lot of bagging was shipped by a manufacturer to a firm of commission merchants to be sold on his account. The factors advanced upon the goods, and, having placed some of them in a warehouse, took receipts, which they pledged as their own, to secure a loan. An action was brought by the principals to recover the value of the bagging, and the answer of the defendant, setting up the insolvency of the factors and claiming, as a set-off, the amount that the factors had advanced on them to the owner, was demurred to and the demurrer sustained in the lower court; but on appeal, the supreme court reversed the case on the ground that "Equitable defense, by way of recoupment or equitable set-off, has been entertained and made effectual in actions of trover. While saying that the factor had no right to pledge the goods of his principal, the courts have, with great unanimity, allowed the amount sought to be recovered of the innocent pledgee of the factor to be reduced by the sums justly due from the principal to his factor."

In Becker v. Dunham, 27 Minn. 32, where goods in the hands of the mortgagee are seized, upon writs of attachment against the mortgagor, in an action against the levying officer, the mortgagee can recover only the value of his interest in the goods. So in Straw v. Jenks, 6 Dak. 414.

Butterfield*, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 300; Washburn v. Corlis (B'klyn City Ct.), 21 N. Y. Supp. 422; Craig v. McHenry, 35 Pa. St. 120.

Where plaintiff admits that the defendant has a lien on the property to a certain amount, that amount may be deducted by the jury in assessing the goods which he has wrongfully converted, the measure of damages is the market value, less the amount of his lien.¹

It would seem that the vendor in a conditional sale would be allowed to recover, as against the vendee in an action of trover, only the balance of the unpaid purchase-money as a just compensation for his interest, and it has been so held;² but it also has been held in some jurisdictions that the vendor, upon default, may recover in an action of trover for the conversion, the full value of the property, without any deduction for payments made by the vendee or those claiming under him,³ on the ground that they have acquired no rights in the property.

3. Value—a. WHEN ESTIMATED.—As a general rule, the value at the time and place of conversion is the basis of the measure of damages, except where the property converted is of fluctuating value;⁴ and this rule is not altered where there has been a subse-damages. Fowler v. Gilman, 13 Met. (Mass.) 267.

In an action of trover against a mortgagee of chattels who, on default of an installment due, seized and sold the mortgaged property for the extinguishment of the entire debt, it was held that the measure of damages for the wrongful conversion, was the value of the property less the amount of the debt secured by it, and any special damages. Brink v. Freoff, 40 Mich. 610.

1. Briggs v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 6 Allen (Mass.) 246; 83 Am. Dec. 626; Peebles v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 112 Mass. 498; Ingledeu v. Northern R. Co., 7 Gray (Mass.) 86.

Inn-Keepers.—But in Mulliner v. Florence, 3 Q. B. Div. 485, the case of a pledge is distinguished from that of a lien with the right of detainer. In this case, where an inn-keeper having a lien upon goods tortiously sold them, it was held that his lien was thereby destroyed, and that in an action for the conversion, the plaintiff was entitled to the full value of the goods, and the defendant was not entitled to deduct the amount which was due in respect to the lien.

2. Johnston v. Whittemore, 27 Mich. 463; Guilford v. McKinley, 61 Ga. 230; Ross v. McDuffie (Ga. 1893), 16 S. E. Rep. 648.

So in Pennsylvania, it was held that where the time of the seizure and sale of a chattel as the property of a vendee, where the sale to him was conditional, and where the vendor retained either the exclusive or joint possession of it, and had been paid a part of the price and the vendor had the legal title to the chattel, and the vendee had but an equity in it equal to the amount of money paid by him on the contract, the measure of damages to which the vendor would be entitled, as against the sheriff's vendee, would not be the value of the chattel itself, but the amount of the purchase-money unpaid. Rose v. Story, 1 Pa. St. 190; 44 Am. Dec. 171.

McDonald*, 128 Mass. 470; or an attaching creditor of the vendee. See also Buckmaster v. Smith, 22 Vt. 201. The measure of damages is the value of the property at the time of the conversion without deduction for payments by the vendee. Smith v. Foster, 18 Vt. 182.

quent decline in the value of the goods;¹ nor, on the other hand, where the defendant has sold the property at a greater price.²

Where a demand and refusal either constitute the conversion or afford presumptive evidence of it, it is no infringement of the rule to regard that event as the time as of which the value is to be estimated.³

Am. Rep. 175, in an action of trover against an innocent purchaser of logs from a willful trespasser, it was held that the measure of damages was their value when first taken under the control of the defendant.

In Hepburn v. Sewell, 5 Har. & J. (Md.) 211; 9 Am. Dec. 512, it was said that, "It must be borne in mind that the plaintiff in an action of trover compels the defendant to become a purchaser against his will; and from what period does he elect to consider the defendant as a purchaser or as answerable to him for the value of the thing converted? He selects the date of the conversion as the epoch of the defendant's responsibility, and claims from him the value of the property at that period, with interest to the time of taking the verdict."

In Cassin v. Marshall, 18 Cal. 689, it was held in a charge to the jury that, "In estimating the value of property, you will take as the basis of your verdict the cash value of the articles in the market at the time they were taken out of the possession of the plaintiff by the defendant," was not error.

A purchaser bought champagne, lying at a wharf, at fourteen shillings per dozen, and re-sold it at twenty-four shillings to the captain of a ship about to leave England. The wharfinger refused to deliver the wine and the plaintiff was unable to fulfil his contract. In an action for the conversion, it was held that the purchaser was entitled, as damages, to the price at which he had sold the champagne, that being the real value of the goods at the time of the conversion. France v. Gaudet, L. R., 6 Q. B. 199; 40 L. J. Q. B. 121.

Where a shipmaster sailed away with a cargo of salt against the consent of the owner, the value was estimated at the time of the sailing. Falk v. Fletcher, 18 C. B. N. S. 405; 114 E. C. L. 404.

Conversion by Wrongful Execution or Attachment.—In an action for the wrongful attachment of personal property which was subsequently sold, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the property at the time of the seizure. Henshaw v. Bank, 10 Gray (Mass.) 568. See also Newman v. Kane, 9 Nev. 234. But in Sprague v. Brown, 40 Wis. 612, where the property of a third person was seized and sold under an execution, and was afterward bought by the third person at the execution sale, it was held that the measure of damages against the officer who seized and sold the property was the amount paid by the third person to the purchaser at the execution sale, not including its actual value, together with any special damages caused by the wrongful taking.

Retail Price.—The measure of damages in an action for the conversion of a stock of liquors, is their value when seized, and not the price obtained by retailing them in small quantities. Tucker v. Hamlin, 60 Tex. 171. See also Miller v. Jannett, 63 Tex. 82.

In Block v. Coombs, 63 Tex. 419, an instruction to the jury that they should find as actual damages a sum not less than that for which the goods actually sold, was held erroneous.

3. Sturges v. Keith, 57 Ill. 451; 11 Am. Rep. 28; First Nat. Bank v. Strong, 28 Ill. App. 525; Northern Transp. Co. v. Sellick, 52 Ill. 249; Garrard v. Dawson, 49 Ga. 434.

So where a common carrier refuses to deliver goods until a certain sum is paid for freight, it is not error to regard this time of refusal as the date from which to estimate the value. Northern Transp. Co. v. Sellick, 52 Ill. 249. And in Hendricks v. Evans, 46 Mo. App. 313, where the defendant purchased a team of horses from the plaintiff's bailee, and when the plaintiff demanded the same, put the horses out of his possession, it was held that

b. WHERE ESTIMATED.—The value should be estimated according to the market value at the place of conversion.¹ But the plaintiff, in estimating the value of the property, is not limited absolutely to the value at the precise spot of the conversion,² for, where there is no market, there the measure of damages may be determined by the market value of the goods at some convenient market, less the cost of transportation to that place.³ And in the case of goods converted at an intermediate point, when in a state of transportation, it is held that the value at the place of delivery should afford the measure of damages.⁴

c. HOW ESTIMATED—EVIDENCE OF VALUE.—The price at the measure of damages was the value at the time of the demand, although the condition of the horses had improved since the purchase.

In Selkirk v. Cobb, 13 Gray (Mass.) 317, it was said: "The rule is perfectly well established that in actions of tort for the conversion of personal property, the measure of damages is its value at the time of the conversion. This was so stated by the court in its directions to the jury, which were therefore in that particular entirely correct. The additional qualification asked for by the defendant, that the market value of the property at the place where it was converted should be taken into consideration, was properly refused. 'Place,' as used in this connection, was indefinite and uncertain. If adopted it might have misled the jury by its being supposed to limit them in ascertaining the value of the property to inquirers as to sales made on the precise spot where the conversion took place or its immediate vicinity. Within such a circumscribed range it may have been impossible to find that the property had there acquired any marketable value."

3. Hallett v. Novion, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 273.

In Boylston Ins. Co. v. Davis, 70 N. Car. 485, where certain iron was wrongfully seized, converted, and left on Core Beach, it was held that the measure of damages might be the price of the iron in any other Atlantic port where there was a market for it at the time of the conversion, less the cost of getting it there.

So in Burne v. Ashley, 1 Low. (U.

S.) 27, in an action of trover for the conversion of a whale in the Okhotsk Sea, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the whale at the time of the conversion, which was to be found by taking the value of the oil and bone at New Bedford, which was the ruling market of the country at that time, and the home port of both vessels, less the expense of preparing it, freight, and insurance, with interest to be added. See also Bartlett v. Budd, 1 Low. (U. S.) 223.

In Hodson v. Goodale, 22 Oregon 68, it was held that in trover for logs, converted in a river some distance from a market, the measure of damages was the value at the nearest convenient market, less the cost of moving them.

4. See Gillingham v. Dempsey, 12 S. & R. (Pa.) 183; Bailey v. Shaw, 24 N. H. 297; 55 Am. Dec. 241; The Joshua Barker, 1 Abbott Adm. R. 218.

So in Farwell v. Price, 30 Mo. 587, where goods shipped from St. Louis, consigned to a party in Boston, were converted at New Orleans by the forwarding agent, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the flour at the place of destination. In this case it was said that, "In actions against carriers for the wrongful conversion of property intrusted to them, damages have been usually given according to the value of the goods at the place of destination. We do not see how the forwarding merchant occupies any better position in respect to this than the carrier; he is an agent of the consignor, and if he fails to discharge his duty to his principals and converts the goods to his own use, the principal or the party standing in his place, ought to be recompensed to the extent of his injury, having reference to proximate and natural results." See CARRIERS OF GOODS, vol. 2, p. 905.

which the goods have been disposed of at public sale is evidence of the market value.¹ And evidence as to the price at which the goods sold at auction is properly admissible to show the value.² In general, all evidence tending to show the actual value of the property at the time and place of the conversion, may be considered in estimating the measure of damages.³ Evidence of the value of the goods at a time prior or subsequent to the time of conversion, where there are no more direct means of reaching the

In Parmenter v. Fitzpatrick, 135 N. Y. 190, it was held that the price obtained at an actual bona fide sale of the property, fairly conducted and not forced, whether at an auction or private sale, was competent upon the question of the market value.

In Steiner v. Trnum (Ala. 1893), 13 So. Rep. 365, it was held that the price at which a horse sold at a forced public sale at a market, in accordance with the terms described by the other parties, with which a plaintiff had no connection, was no legal criterion of value as against the plaintiff.

2. Auction Sales.—Hutchinson v. Poyer, 78 Mich. 337; Dyer v. Rosenthal, 45 Mich. 590; Davis v. Zimmerman, 40 Mich. 28; Smith v. Mitchell, 12 Mich. 180; Whitehouse v. Atkinson, 3 C. & P. 344; 14 E. C. L. 339.

Evidence of what the goods sold for at auction should be received for the consideration of the jury, to be compared with the other evidence of value that may be offered, and be allowed such weight as the circumstances of the sale and the degree of competition actually exhibited should entitle it to. *Campbell v. In an action by attaching creditors, it was proper to allow one who appraised the goods to testify as to their value. Dalton v. Stiles, 74 Mich. 726.

So, in an action for the value of a stock of goods seized by an officer, one who was engaged in the same line of business, and had assisted in making out the inventory, was allowed to testify as to its value, although he said that he could not give any opinion as to the exact value. Hutchinson v. Poyer, 78 Mich. 337.

In an action for the conversion of certain railroad stock, the plaintiff was allowed to give evidence tending to show that the railroad company was about to, and did increase the stock, and that the owners of the stock were by the regulations of the company to have certain portions pro rata of the new stock at reduced rates, not to enable the plaintiff to recover the value of the new stock as special damages, but as being a circumstance which would legitimately bear upon the questions of the value of the property converted. Sturges v. Keith, 57 Ill. 451; 11 Am. Rep. 28.

So in Merchant v. Jordan (Supreme Ct.), 3 N. Y. Supp. 468, in an action for the recovery of receiver's certificates, evidence relating to a contemplated reorganization of the road was admitted as affecting the value of the stock.

In Simpson v. Cincinnati, etc., R. Co., 81 Ga. 495, it was held that the value of four bales of cotton at Rome, Georgia, could not be inferred from the value of six, including these four, at Cincinnati, nor from the value of the other two at Rome, as it did not appear that the two were of as light weight and quality as the four in question.

In an action for the conversion of a large number of watches, testimony as to their average value is competent. Illingworth v. Greenleaf, 11 Minn. 235.

Custom-House Valuation.—In Caffe v. Bartrand, 1 How. Cas. (N. Y.) 224, it was held that where foreign goods had been passed through the custom house, the valuation put upon them there could be introduced as evidence.

Comparison with Similar Property.—The market value may be ascertained from the value of the same quantity of like property. Lawton v. Chase, 108 Mass. 238.

Bill of Sale.—A bill of sale executed by the plaintiff to a third person may value, may be considered.¹ Expert testimony of witnesses, acquainted with the value of similar property, is admissible, although they have never seen the property in question.²

If the defendant has, by his act, prevented the plaintiff from ascertaining the true value of the goods converted, it may be presumed that they were of the best quality and highest value.³

In an action for the conversion of a steam-engine boiler, evidence of the value of the property a year after the suit was brought was held to be inadmissible, in the absence of any assurance that there was no more direct method of ascertaining its value. Yater v. Mullen, 23 Ind. 562.

Moore*, 41 N. H. 131.

In Vandime v. Burpee, 13 Met. (Mass.) 288, Durey, J., said: "It seems to us that it would be impracticable to dispense with this species of testimony, in many actions of trover for personal property, where no detailed facts could adequately inform the jury of the value of the article. The opinion of the witness as to the value of a horse, is much more satisfactory evidence than a detailed statement of the size, color, age, etc., to give the jury requisite information to enable them to assess damages for the conversion of such a horse."

3. Presumption of Value.—The principle is settled, that a person who has acquired the possession of goods, and has put it out of the power of the owner to show the quality and value of the property by any artifice or concealment, may be held liable to the value of the best quality of such goods. Bailey v. Shaw, 24 N. H. 297; 55 Am. Dec. 241; Clark v. Miller, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 628; Amory v. McGregor, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 24. See also Harris v. Rosen- berg, 43 Conn. 227; Hart v. Ten Eyck, 2 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 62.

In Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Str. 504; 1 H. L. Cas. 151, where the plaintiff found a jewel, and upon presenting it to a goldsmith to know what it was worth, the smith's apprentice removed the stone from the socket and refused to surrender it, it was held that the plaintiff might prove what a jewel of the finest water which would fit the socket from which the stone was removed would be worth, and the jury was instructed that, unless the defendant produced the jewel and showed it not to be of the finest water, they should presume everything against him and make the value of the best jewel the measure of damages.

In Tea v. Gates, 10 Ind. 164, where the property converted, although not shown to be in the possession of the defendant, was traced to him, and was of a kind that would not, probably, remain very long in his possession, yet in taking it he could have ascertained the precise quantity; having failed to do so, it was held that the instructions to the jury that they should solve all doubts in relation to the amount and value against the defendant, were properly given.

So, in Kavanaugh v. Taylor, 2 Ind. App. 502, an action of trover for the conversion of a carload of potatoes, it was held that since the seller had no opportunity to inspect the potatoes when they were converted by the defendant, the jury was justified in finding from him the highest price and the largest quantity proved, and where the defendant plead that the potatoes were damaged when converted, the burden rested heavily upon him to prove it.

But in Clumes v. Pezzy, 1 Campb. 8, where the only evidence respecting the property was that of the plaintiff's servants, who declared that they delivered certain bottles at the defendant's house, but as to the contents thereof they were ignorant, Lord Ellenborough directed the jury to presume that the bottles were filled with the cheapest owner,¹ or the cost of replacing it,² may afford the true measure of damages.

4. Value as Affected by Accession or Act of Wrongdoer.—In accordance with the general rule, as to the measure of damages, the plaintiff is not entitled to an increase after the time of conversion.³

The plaintiff is not entitled to the value of the goods at the time of conversion, where, prior to that time, the value of the goods had been increased by the defendant's labor;⁴ and, by the weight of authority, the plaintiff is not entitled to any increase in the value of the goods, arising by the act of the defendant subsequent to the conversion,⁵ unless the defendant has acted liquor in which the plaintiff dealt. And in Beecher v. Denniston, 13 Gray (Mass.) 354, where the defendant concealed the chattel until a late stage of the trial, the instructions to the jury were that the plaintiff ought not to be prejudiced by an intentional withholding of the chattel, calculated and intended to prevent him from showing its actual value as the measure of damages, and that they ought to give the full value, no more or no less, with no ground of exception.

In Heald v. McGowan (C. Pl.), 5 N. Y. Supp. 450, where an action was to recover certain electrotype plates, it was held that in estimating their value at the time of the conversion, the cost of replacing them, and the fact that they had a use which was valuable for the plaintiff, and that they could be used in reprinting the work for which they were made if another edition should be demanded, were relevant and material facts, there being no market value for the conversion. See also Lovell v. Shea (Super. Ct.), 18 N. Y. Supp. 193.

In an action against a railroad for the loss of a case containing a portrait of the plaintiff's father, the measure of damages was the actual value of the portrait to the plaintiff, and not the market value; and evidence that the plaintiff had no other portrait of his father was admissible. Green v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 128 Mass. 221; 35 Am. Rep. 370.

In Doyle v. Eccles, 17 U. C. C. P. 644, in an action for the conversion of a solicitor's docket and papers showing entries of evidence of certain bills and costs, it was held that the measure of damages was not the value of the book as a mere book, but what it was worth to the plaintiff irrespective of its value.

2. Stickney v. Allen, 10 Gray (Mass.) 352.

3. In Arkansas Valley, etc., Co. v. Mann, 130 U. S. 69, in an action of trover for the recovery of cattle, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to the value of the animals up to the time of the demand, but not to the commencement of the suit. See also Scott v. McAlpin, 6 U. C. C. P. 302, where it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to the animals bred from the mares subsequent to the conversion.

In Lee v. Mathews, 10 Ala. 682; 44 Am. Dec. 498, it was held that an agent purchasing female slaves, who was ignorant at the time that the title was not in the vendor, was not liable for the value of children of the female, born after delivering to his principal.

So, in an action of trover for the conversion of an unfinished vessel which the defendant, subsequent to the conversion, completed, the measure of damages was the value at the time of the conversion, and not the enhanced value at the time of its completion. Reid v. Fairbanks, 13 C. B. 692; 76 E. C. L. 692.

In Aborn v. Mason, 14 Blatchf. (U. S.) 405, where a quantity of wool and yarn were delivered to the manufacturer to be made into cloth, and while in the process of manufacture were maliciously or in bad faith.¹ Where goods are taken at one place and transported by the defendant to another, thereby increasing their value, it is held that the expense of transportation should be allowed the defendant.²

Although there is considerable conflict upon the question, it may be said that according to the weight of authority, both in *England*³ attached, and while under attachment the unfinished goods were completed, the measure of damages in trover for the wrongful attachment was held to be the value of the unfinished goods at the time of the conversion, that is, the value of the goods in their manufactured state less the expense of manufacturing.

In Dresser Mfg. Co. v. Waterston, 3 Met. (Mass.) 9, where cloths were sent to a printing company and were subsequently converted by them, it was held that the plaintiff could recover in damages only the value of the goods at the time they were delivered, and not their value after they were printed.

Co-Owners—Goods Manufactured Upon Shares.—Where one party furnishes raw material to another to be manufactured upon shares, they become co-tenants, and if the manufacturer converts the finished article to his use, the co-tenant may recover full damages for his share. Rightmyer v. Raymond, 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 51.

But, where goods are delivered to a manufacturer to be put in a marketable state upon contract that they shall be delivered after deducting all expenses of manufacturing, with commissions, it was held that, in an action of trover against one claiming the property under an assignment from the manufacturer, the measure of damages is the plaintiff's interest in the raw material, and not the enhanced value when manufactured. Hyde v. Cookson, 21 Barb. (N. Y.) 92.

But in Pierce v. Schenck, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 28, where logs were delivered to a miller to be sawed, who, after sawing a part of them into boards within the time, failed to perform as to the rest and converted both the boards and logs to his own use, it was held that the bailor might maintain trover and recover for the whole without any declaration on account of what had been actually sawed. In this case, however, two judges held that the point as to the right of the plaintiff to recover for the full value of the logs sawed, was not made at the trial. Cowen, J., said that, "When a manufacturer receives goods for the purpose of being wrought in the course of his trade, the contract is entire, and without a stipulation to the contrary, he has no right to demand payment until the work is complete, and fortiori, he has no right to carve out payment for himself without consulting his bailor. A miller is entitled to take toll from your grist on grinding, but if he chooses to grind only a part and then sell the whole, he is not entitled to toll for what he actually grinds."

In Silsbury v. McCoon, 3 N. Y. 381; 53 Am. Dec. 307, which was trover for the conversion of an amount of corn into whisky, it was held that the animus with which the corn was converted was an important element in the measure of damages; although in the same case in the lower court, as reported in 6 Hill (N. Y.) 425, and 4 Denio (N. Y.) 332, the idea that the rights of the party depended on the motive or intention, was repudiated.

In Tilden v. Johnson, 52 Vt. 628; 36 Am. Rep. 769, in an action of trover for a quantity of logs, the measure of damages was the value of the logs when taken, and not at the mill where they were taken to be sawed.

Formerly, the technical rule prevailed in the English court, which was, that when a part of the realty is severed from the whole and converted and the United States,¹ is, that the measure of damages for the

into a chattel, then, instantly on its becoming a chattel, it becomes the property of the person who had been the owner of the fee in the land; and that in estimating the damages against the wrongdoer, the owners of the fee should be paid the value of the chattel at the time when it was converted. See Martin v. Porter, 5 M. & W. 352, and Morgan v. Powell, 3 Q. B. 278; 43 E. C. L. 734. This rule, however, has been qualified, as stated in the text. Wood v. Morewood, 32 B. 440; 43 E. C. L. 810; Livingston v. Rawyards Coal Co., L. R., 5 App. Cas. 25; Templemore v. Moore, 15 Ir. C. L. Rep. 14.

Chancery, after some hesitation, adopted the common-law rule. In Llynoi Coal, etc., Co. v. Brogren, L. R., 11 Eq. 188, and Hilton v. Woods, L. R., 4 Eq. 432, the principle was recognized that where the plaintiff and defendant were adjoining mine owners, and the defendant crossed his boundary and took coal from his neighbor's mines, the value was to be measured by the selling price of the coal at the pit's mouth, with just allowance for the cost of raising, but not for getting or severing.

These cases were overruled in Jegon v. Vivian, L. R., 6 Ch. 742, where Lord Hatherly remarked: "It strikes me as a strong measure to give a man, instead of the value of his coal, the great advantage of having it worked without any expense for getting and hewing. Suppose the issue worked out, then what he has lost is the coal, but this rule would give him besides all the cost of getting and hewing. It seems a rough and ready mode of doing justice, though the remark that a willful trespasser ought to be punished is worthy of observation; and further, as was said by one of the judges, when you deprive a man of his property in this way, you deprive him of the management and control of his own property and he might have made a better bargain. All that, however, is of course speculative, and it seems to me the judges have founded their decision upon the ground of willful trespass. . . ."

In Livingston v. Rawyards Coal Co., L. R., 5 App. Cas. 25, the rule is well stated by Lord Hatherly. He said: "There is no doubt that if a man furtively and in bad faith robs his neighbor of his property, and, because it is underground is probably not for some time detected, the court of equity in this country will struggle, or I would rather say will assert its authority, to punish fraud by fixing the person with the value of the whole of the property which he has so furtively taken, and, making him no allowance with respect of what he has so done as would have been justly made to him if the parties had been working by agreement. . . . But when once we arrive at the fact that an inadvertence has been the cause of the misfortune, then the simplest course is to make every just allowance for outlay on the part of the person who has so acquired the property, and to give back to the owner, so far as is possible under the circumstances of the case, the full value of that which cannot be restored to him in specie."

In this case the plaintiff was the owner of a small feu of about an acre and a half in extent. The surface of the ground was occupied by miners' cottages, and underneath was coal. When the plaintiff purchased the feu, he was under the impression that all the minerals under the feu, as under all the ground surrounding it, had been reserved to the superior; but that was a mistake, for in the deed granting the feu there was no reservation of coal. The superior granted the whole property in the coals in all the surrounding land to R. and C. They, under the impression that they had the whole of the coal, including the coal under the acre and a half, worked out and disposed of the coal under the plaintiff's acre and a half, and in doing so damaged the surface. The plaintiff could not have worked the coal to a profit himself; there was no person to whom he could dispose of it but to R. and C.; and the element of willful trespass and of special and exceptional need of support to the surface were absent. In a claim by the plaintiff for the value of the coal taken underneath the feu, it was held by the House of Lords that the measure of damages was the value of the coal to the plaintiff at the time it was taken, and that the best evidence under the peculiar circumstances of the case of that value, was the royalty paid by R. and C. for the surrounding coal field.

conversion of severed portions of realty, where the wrongful act has been through ignorance, and not willful, as where there has been an honest dispute as to title, is the value at the time of the wrongful act, that is, at the same rate as if the property taken had been purchased in situ by the defendant at a fair market value of the district. But where the wrongdoer has acted willfully or in bad faith, he will not be allowed the benefit of his labor or expense.¹

In Waters v. Stevenson, 13 Nev. 157; 29 Am. Dec. 293, the court, after a careful review of the principal cases, said: "A careful examination of the authorities has convinced us that there is a growing inclination among all courts, where it can be done, to apply a just and safe rule in actions for damages, whether ex contractu or ex delicto, and that is, to give the injured party as near compensation as the imperfections of human tribunals will permit. That is the whole idea of the law, and it is the duty of the courts to come as near it as possible in practice; and, although the courts differ as to the method of ascertaining the actual loss, still there is a refreshing unanimity of opinion that such loss, only when ascertained, ought to be compensated, in the absence of fraud, malice, or culpable negligence."

In Ross v. Scott, 15 Lea (Tenn.) 479, where the defendant, in good faith and an honest belief of title, mined coal on land only valuable for coal, and cut timber for the purpose of erecting houses on the land, and making props for the mine, he was held liable for the value of the coal in situ, and for the timber as trees.

In Bly v. U. S., 4 Dill. (U. S.) 464, following decisions of the supreme court of Minnesota, it was held that where timber was cut upon public lands, willfully, fraudulently, or negligently, and without authority made into sawlogs, the government might sue in trover for the value and recover without a deduction arising from labor of the wrongdoer. Dillon, J., said: "Where timber has been cut into logs on public lands by a person who knows the lands belong to the government, or who on no reasonable grounds believes that it belongs to him, or by someone under whom he claims, and such logs are by him hauled to the watercourse and rafted, and taken to a distant boom, by means of which labor of the wrongdoer their value is much enhanced beyond their value when first severed from the freehold, the government may replevy such logs in the boom, or may maintain an action in the nature of trover for their value; and, in either case, may recover without deduction for the enhanced value which may have been given the logs after severance from the freehold by the labor of the wrongdoer. In such case, the government is not confined to what is called 'stumpage' value, but may recover the value of the logs in the boom." See also Schulenburg v. Harriman, 2 Dill. (U. S.) 398.

Conversion by Co-Tenant. — It being by statute unlawful for the owner of an undivided interest in timber to cut down or remove trees from the land without having first obtained the consent of his co-tenants, in an action of trover against the vendee of such a co-tenant

So, the measure of damages for logs cut has been held to be the value of the timber standing;¹ and for coal or ore mined, the value in place.² But in some cases the technical rule prevails by a non-consenting part-owner, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the value of his interest in the lumber at the date of the conversion, with no allowance for the expense or labor of the trespassing vendor. Duff v. Bindley, 16 Fed. Rep. 178.

In Herdic v. Young, 55 Pa. St. 176, which was an action of replevin of logs cut by the defendant by mistake on the plaintiff's land, the court said: "Our natural sense of justice furnishes the ground and measure of compensation for injuries done by one man to the property of another, from the man's adequate remedy to obtain it. Upon the principle of analogy, it is unjust to give to the plaintiff the advantage of the labor and expense of the defendant's cutting and hauling the logs and driving them to the boom. In a case of inadvertent trespass, one done in bona fide but mistaken belief of right, the true standard of damages would generally be the value of the logs at the boom (the place of replevin), less the cost of cutting, hauling and driving to the boom."

In U. S. v. Magoon, 3 McLean (U. S.) 171, the jury was instructed, "that the value of the ore after its separation from the mine was not the measure of damages, and the digging and carrying away by the same person was presumed to be a continuous act, and the ore removed must be considered an aggravation of the trespass upon the soil."

So in Stockbridge Iron Co. v. Cone Iron Works, 102 Mass. 86, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the value of the ore, to be estimated as it lay in the bed, and not as it was after defendant had increased its value by removing it.

In Forsyth v. Wells, 41 Pa. St. 291, where parties were owners of adjoining tracts of coal lands, and the defendant opened a mine upon his own land, and the plaintiff claimed that the defendant had dug coal over the dividing line, it was plain that the measure of damages was the value of the coal when dug on the bank, or what was called "knocked down." It was held that the measure of damages was the value of the coal when in place. Lowrie, C. J., said: "Where there is no wrongful purpose or wrongful negligence by the defendant, compensation for the injury done is the purpose of all remedies, and so long as we bear this in mind we shall have but little difficulty in managing the forms of action so as to secure a fair result; but if the defendant was guilty of no intentional wrong, he ought not to have been charged for the value of the coal after he had been at the expense of mining it, but only its value in place, with such other damage to the land as its mining may have caused."

In Re United Merthyr, etc., Co., L. R., 15 Eq. 46, where coal had been wrongfully taken by working into the mine of an adjoining owner, the trespasser was treated as a purchaser at the pit's mouth, and required to pay the market value of the coal there, less the actual disbursement of severing and driving to bank, so as to place the owner in the same position as if he, himself, severed and raised the coal.

In Missouri, it was held that the proper measure of damages for wrongfully entering the land and taking away soil, was the value of the land removed. Mueller v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 31 Mo. 262.

In Wisconsin, the rule was that the measure of damages in an action to recover damages for the cutting and carrying away of timber, was not the value of such timber at the place where the same was at the time of the commencement of the action, or its value as enhanced by the labor of the trespasser and the value taken is that of the property immediately after severance, when it becomes chattel property.¹

or other, at the time of the wrongful conversion, but its value upon the lands at the time and place where the same was cut. See Tuttle v. Wilson, 52 Wis. 643; Single v. Schneider, 30 Wis. 570; Hungerford v. Redford, 29 Wis. 345; but at present, by Wisconsin Rev. Stat., § 462, it is provided that the measure of damages is to be the highest market value of such logs, timber, or lumber, in whatsoever place, shape, or condition the same shall be at any time before the trial while in the possession of the trespasser, or any purchaser from him with notice. This provision does not apply to innocent purchasers. Wright v. Wooden-Ware Co., 50 Wis. 167.

In Michigan, there is an apparent conflict in the cases relating to the true measure of damages, in an action of trover for the conversion of timber. In Grant v. Smith, 26 Mich. 201, which was an action against one claiming under a tax title, who wrongfully cut timber on the lands of the plaintiff and removed the logs to the mill for manufacture, the measure of damages was said to be the value of the logs at the mill into which the defendant removed them, no allowance being made for his labor or expense. In this case, evidence that the defendant purchased the lands of one who claimed to have a tax title to show good faith, was held to be irrelevant.

In Winchester v. Craig, 33 Mich. 205, in an action of trover for the conversion of timber cut by the defendant on the plaintiff's land by mistake, Marston, J., with reference to the above case, said: "This deed having been rejected, there was nothing in the case tending to show that the defendant had acted other than as a willful trespasser, and such being the case, the plaintiff was clearly entitled to recover the value of the logs at the place to which he removed them." And the exclusion of the tax deed was justified on the ground that it would not have tended to show that the defendant acted honestly and in good faith. It is a fact that tax deeds are, almost universally, upon examination, found to be invalid, on account of defects appearing upon the face of the deed.

In Tuttle v. White, 46 Mich. 485; 41 Am. Rep. 175, the defendant was a willful trespasser and was not allowed compensation for his labor.

In Thompson v. Moiles, 46 Mich. 42, which was an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, where a person cut timber in good faith, it was held that the measure of damages was the difference between the value of the land with the timber standing, and its value with the timber removed.

In the recent case of Ayres v. Hubbard, 71 Mich. 594, it was held that in trover to recover the value of timber cut on the plaintiff's land, if it appears that the trespass was neither willful nor negligent, the measure of damages is the value of the timber on the land. See also Ayres v. Hubbard, 57 Mich. 322; 58 Am. Rep. 361.

But in Gates v. Rifle Boom Co., 70 Mich. 309, it was said that the trespasser, however innocent, cannot maintain an action of trover to recover his labor and expense from one whose timber he has wrongfully cut. It was so held where cord wood was cut on the lands of another, was hauled to a landing and piled up, and was then seized and sold by the owner of the land. See Wetherbee v. Green, 22 Mich. 311.

Gonder*, 22 Ga. 353, in an action of trespass, it was said that the measure of damages was at least the value of the trees as they lay felled.

Maryland.—The value of the coal, when first taken from its native bed, and before it is put upon the mine cars, without deducting the expense of severing, is the measure of damages, and if the defendant, at the time of mining and recovering said coal, knew that the lands were not his own, such further damages may be awarded the plaintiffs as the facts and circumstances accompanying such mining and removing of the coal may warrant. Franklin Coal Co. v. McMillan, 49 Md. 549; 33 Am. Rep. 280; Blaen Avon Coal Co. v. McCulloh, 59 Md. 403.

In New Hampshire, it seems that the measure of damages varies with the form of action; that is, in an action of trespass, breaking into and entering the plaintiff's close and carrying away trees, the measure of damages should be the trees at the instant after they are severed. See Adams v. Blodgett, 47 N. H. 219; 90 Am. Dec. 569; Foot v. Merrill, 54 N. H. 490; 20 Am. Rep. 151.

In a case of the confusion of goods, where the defendant has acted wrongfully and the goods mingled are not of equal value, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the value of the whole in trover, as against the wrongdoer or his consignee.¹

Where the defendant is a purchaser, without notice of wrong, from a willful trespasser, the measure of damages is the value at the time of the purchase.²

Illinois.—Where coal was taken from the land of the plaintiff and converted, the true measure of damages was held to be the value of the coal at the mouth of the pit or shaft, less the cost of conveying it there from the place where it was dug or mined, allowing nothing for the digging or the labor in separating the stone, sulphur, slate and earth from the coal first broken loose, or in breaking up the large masses. The tort-feasor is allowed nothing for the mining or any other act necessary for the production of the coal as an article of commerce. *McLean County Coal Co. v. In Indiana, the defendant is not allowed anything for the value of his labor or expense. In Ellis v. Wire, 33 Ind. 127; 5 Am. Rep. 189, in an action for taking and converting the plaintiff's wheat as it stood in the field, and selling it, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the wheat at the time of its sale; and in Everson v. Seller, 105 Ind. 266, in an action for an unlawful conversion of logs which the defendant cut on the premises of the plaintiff and hauled to a mill, the measure of damages was held to be the value of the lumber at the mill. See also Yates v. Mullen, 24 Ind. 277. See also Peters, etc., Lumber Co. v. Lesh, 119 Ind. 102, where a different rule was followed in an action of replevin.

So in Iowa. In Stuart v. Phelps, 39 Iowa 18, where the defendant wrongfully levied upon a crop of corn and caused it to be husked and cribbed, whereby its value was greatly increased, it was held that the defendant was not entitled to compensation for his labor and expense. But see Chamberlain v. Collinson, 45 Iowa 429.

So where the mortgagor of goods, who was intrusted with the possession, either purposely or through want of proper care so mingled the goods with his own that they could not be distinguished, and consigned them for sale to a third person, the mortgagee was entitled to recover the value of the whole from the consignee. Willard v. Rice, 11 Met. (Mass.) 493; 45 Am. Dec. 226. A person who has property of another, and has fraudulently mingled it with his own, has the right to take possession of the whole mass for the purpose of separating and securing or disposing of the portion belonging to himself, and if it cannot be separated and he advertises and sells his interest in the whole, he does not thereby render himself liable to the other for the conversion of his property. Stephenson v. Little, 10 Mich. 433.

In Weymouth v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 17 Wis. 550; 84 Am. Dec. 763, where the plaintiff had cut a cord of wood and piled it up on the land of which he was in possession, and the defendant by mistake carried the wood to a distant market, and there mingled it with other wood so that it could not be identified, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the value of the wood at the place from which it was taken, and not the price at the market whither it was carried, which was a greatly improved price.

5. Property of Fluctuating Value—a. ENGLISH RULE.—The measure of damages in the case of property of uncertain or fluctuating value, whether the action sounds in contract or tort, is held to be the value at the time of the trial, or at the time of the conversion, if the property has depreciated.¹ But in some cases, under peculiar circumstances, the plaintiff has been allowed the highest intermediate value from the time of the conversion to the time of the trial.² A distinction, however, is to be denoted in cases where trover for the conversion of logs purchased in good faith from a willful trespasser, it was held that the measure of damages was their value when first taken under the defendants' control. Marston, C. J., said: "The defendants purchased from the trespassers, and if they acted in good faith in so doing, all they could ask would be protection in what they should expend in money or labor thereon thereafter. A person, however, in purchasing personal property runs his risk as to the title he is acquiring, and if he is unfortunate enough to purchase from a trespasser, or one who has no title and can give none, he must suffer the loss or look to his vendor. To hold otherwise would be to give the trespassers the benefit of their own wrong, contrary to all authorities. If these defendants had only made a partial payment for the logs under their contract of purchase, and the plaintiff herein was limited in his recovery to the value of the logs when first severed from the land, then the defendants would be the gainers; they would have the benefit of the trespasser's labor, and yet the latter could not maintain an action to recover the amount thereof, or the balance of the contract price. The conversion by these defendants took place when they first took charge or control over these logs in Black creek, and they should respond in damages according to the value at that time. There are very many cases where the value of the timber standing, or when first severed from the soil, would be but nominal, and to give willful trespassers, or those to whom they may sell, the benefit of any increased value put upon it by the original wrongdoer, and confine the owner to the nominal value, would but encourage the commission of acts of trespass, and tend to make purchasers at least careless as to the title they were acquiring. It is easy for any one to claim that he has purchased property in entire good faith, and very difficult in many cases to establish the contrary, and if one claiming to be such, is protected to the extent of the increased value he may have in good faith added to the property, this is all he can fairly claim under the law."

Purchaser with Knowledge.—In Smith v. Baechler, 18 Ont. 293, in an action for the conversion of certain logs which had been cut without permission from the plaintiff's land, and purchased by the defendant and hauled to his mill, and there cut into lumber, it appearing that the defendant knew that he was buying logs taken from the plaintiff's land, or that at least he suspected that such was the fact, and willfully abstained from inquiry, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the logs as they were in defendant's yard at the time they were demanded, without any deduction for cutting and hauling.

the plaintiff has not paid the consideration, when it is said that the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time of the breach.¹

b. AMERICAN RULE.—In view of the very great conflict of authorities in the several states, no general rule can be laid down as to the measure of damages for the conversion of property of fluctuating value, such as bonds, stocks, etc. In a greater number of the states, the general rule as to the measure of damages, that it shall be at the time and place of the conversion, is adhered to,² worth 6d. per pound and at the time of trial it was worth 10½ d., Abbott, C. J., ruled that the jury were not limited to the full value. He said: "The jury may give the value at the time of the conversion or at any subsequent time at their discretion, because the plaintiff might have had a good opportunity of selling the goods if they had been detained."

In Shaw v. Holland, 15 M. & W. 136, which was an action for the non-delivery of shares on a given day, Parke, B., said: "With respect to the amount of damages, I was at first disposed to think that this was like the case of an action for not replacing stock, in which the measure of damages is, the difference of price on the day on which it ought to have been replaced, and on the day of the trial; but, upon consideration, I think it more resembles the case of an action for the non-delivery of goods. In the case of Gainsford v. Carroll, 2 B. & C. 624; 9 E. C. L. 204, which was an action for not delivering goods on a given day, the court held that it was not like the case of a loan of stock, where the borrower holds in his hands the money of the lender, and thereby prevents him from using it altogether; for, that the plaintiff having his money in his possession, might purchase the like goods the very day after the contract was broken; and therefore that the true measure of damages was, the difference between the price agreed upon and the market price of the goods at the time the contract was broken. Here, the plaintiff had his money in his own possession, and might have gone into the market and bought other shares as soon as the contract was broken."

In Pinkerton v. Manchester, etc., R. Co., 42 N. H. 424, Bellows, J., said: "There being much conflict in the authorities, the question is to be settled upon principle; and it may be assumed that the plaintiff is entitled to such damages as will be full indemnity for withholding the stock. The general rule is, undoubtedly, that he shall have the value of the property at the time of the breach; and this is a plain and just rule and easy of application, and we are unable to yield to the reasons assigned for the exception which has been sanctioned in New York and elsewhere. It is true that, in some cases, the plaintiff may have been injured to the extent of the value of the property at the highest market price between the breach and the time of trial. But it is equally true that, in a large number of cases, and, perhaps, generally, it would not be

while in others, the strict rule of the highest intermediate value between the time of conversion and of trial is declared upon so. . . . In the case of stocks, in regard to which the rule in England originated, there are, doubtless, cases, and a great many, where they are purchased as a permanent investment, and to be held without regard to fluctuations; and to hold that the damages should be the highest price between the breach and trial, when there is no reason to suppose that a sale would have been made at that precise time, would also be unjust. But it may be fairly assumed that a very large portion of the stocks purchased are purchased to be sold soon; and to give the purchaser, in case of a failure to deliver such stock, the right to elect their value at any time before the trial, which might often be several years, would be giving him, not indemnity merely, but a power, in many instances, of unjust extortion, which no court could contemplate without pain."

In Fisher v. Brown, 104 Mass. 259; 6 Am. Rep. 235, which was an action to recover damages for the conversion of stock held as collateral security, the measure of damages was held to be the value of the stock on the day of demand and refusal. See also Sturges v. Heith, 57 Ill. 451; 11 Am. Rep. 28; Fosdick v. Greene, 27 Ohio St. 484; 22 Am. Rep. 328. So in Freeman v. Harwood, 49 Me. 195, where an action of trover was maintained against a purchaser at a sale of the stock for taxes, the measure of damages was held to be the value of the stock at the day of sale. See also McKenney v. Haines, 63 Me. 74.

In Arkansas, the rule is stated to be that where the defendants have wrongfully held possession of property, and there has been an increase in value, after the taking, but before the demand, suit, or actual conversion, the plaintiff is entitled to the highest market value during such time. But when the property is actually converted and passes beyond the possible reach of the plaintiff, then its value and interest is the fixed measure of damages. Peterson v. Gresham, 25 Ark. 380.

So in Maryland. Baltimore Marine Ins. Co. v. Dalrymple, 25 Md. 269; Third Nat. Bank v. Boyd, 44 Md. 47; 22 Am. Rep. 55. Where a pledgee of stock refused to surrender on the demand and tender of the debt, it was held that the value of the stock on the day that the tender and demand were made, less the amount tendered, was the true measure of damages. Franklin Bank v. Harris (Md. 1893), 26 Atl. Rep. 523.

In Illinois, no distinction is recognized where the property converted is stocks, but the measure of damages is the market value of the property at the time of the conversion. Sturges v. Keith, 57 Ill. 452; 11 Am. Rep. 28; First Nat. Bank v. Strang, 28 Ill. App. 325.

The rule of damages is the same whether the action be for conversion or, in form, in assumpsit. Brewster v. Van Liew, 119 Ill. 554; 59 Am. Dec. 823. See also Smith v. Dunlap, 12 Ill. 184; Galena, etc., R. Co. v. Ennor, 123 Ill. 505.

In Iowa, the measure of damages is the market value at the time of the conversion. Gravel v. Clough, 81 Iowa 272; Brown v. Allen, 35 Iowa 306. But in case of an action on a contract, where the property contracted to be delivered has been paid for prior to delivery, the plaintiff may recover the highest market price between the day fixed for delivery and the day of bringing suit, if the action has not been unnecessarily delayed. Stapleton v. King, 40 Iowa 278; Cannon v. Folsom, 2 Iowa 102; 63 Am. Dec. 474; Davenport v. Wells, 3 Iowa 232.

In Texas, the highest immediate value with modifications prevails. Calvit v. McFadden, 13 Tex. 324.

In Stephenson v. Price, 30 Tex. 715, where cotton was delivered to a party as bailee to be redelivered on demand, and the bailee converted the property to his own use, the measure of damages was held to be the highest price between the time of the demand and the day of trial. So, also, in Brasher v. Davidson, 31 Tex. 190; 98 Am. Dec. 525, the strict rule was allowed. But in Randon v. Barton, 4 Tex. 289, it was said, we doubt the propriety of giving the vendee in all cases, as a measure of damages, the highest price of the article when it should have been delivered, on the day of trial. And in Hatcher v. Pelham, 31 Tex. 201, where cotton was delivered to a bailee to sell at a limited price in confederate money, and the bailee, failing to get the price, converted it to his own use, it was held that, under principle,¹ or is provided for by statute.² In Alabama, Mississippi, and Florida, the allowance of the highest intermediate value the peculiar circumstances, the measure of damages was the value of the cotton at the time of the conversion, with interest until trial.

In Heilbronner v. Douglas, 45 Tex. 402, which was an action upon a contract for failure to deliver, the rule was thus qualified: it was held that, where money, or other consideration for an article contracted for, has not been paid in advance of the time when the article was to have been delivered, or where extraordinary circumstances have occurred to produce extreme prices in the article during a long period of time, over which the suit has been protracted without any fault of the defendants, or where there are other circumstances attending the transaction, not in the ordinary course of trade, which would render it inequitable to allow as a measure of damages the highest price of the article after default in delivery, the measure of damages should be the value of the article at the time agreed on for delivery, with interest on that amount.

In Gresham v. Island City Sav. Bank, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 52, which was an action of trover for the conversion of stock, the measure of damages was held to be the value of the stock at the time of the conversion, with interest to the time of trial. No reference was made in this case to the previous decisions of the state.

In Virginia, there is no distinction in the recovery of damages between contracts for the delivery of stock and other executory contracts. Enders v. Board of Public Works, 1 Gratt. (Va.) 364. See also Bull v. Douglas, 4 Munf. (Va.) 303; 6 Am. Dec. 518; Orange, etc., R. Co. v. Fulvey, 17 Gratt. (Va.) 366.

In Wisconsin, the market value at the time of conversion, is the measure of damages. In Noonan v. Ilsley, 17 Wis. 314, in an action to recover the value of stock agreed to be delivered on a certain day, the measure of damages was held to be the value of the stock on the day it was to be delivered with interest to the day of trial. See also Ainesworth v. Bowen, 9 Wis. 348, which was an action for the recovery of a school-land certificate. Nudd v. Wells, 11 Wis. 407; Tenney v. State Bank, 20 Wis. 152; Flick v. Wetherbee, 20 Wis. 392; Pick- ering v. Bardwell, 21 Wis. 562; Bigelow v. Doolittle, 36 Wis. 115.

Evidence of Value.—The market value of stocks may be ascertained from reports of prices current at the time of the conversion. Seligman v. Rogers, 113 Mo. 642; Whelan v. Lynch, 60 N. Y. 469; 19 Am. Rep. 202.

In estimating the value of stock, evidence of the value of the corporate property is admissible. Hitchcock v. McElrath, 72 Cal. 565; Freon v. Carriage Co., 42 Ohio St. 30; Simpkins v. Law, 54 N. Y. 179; Smith v. Traders' Nat. Bank, 82 Tex. 368.

In an action for the conversion of stock which had no market value, where there was evidence that about a year before the conversion, the defendant had admitted that he had sold three shares for $200 a share and a third person had sold more shares to the defendant for $55, a verdict for $25 per share was sustained. Brown v. Lawton, 6 N. Y. Supp. 137; 53 Hun (N. Y.) 636.

1. Indiana.—In Ellis v. Wire, 33 Ind. 127; 5 Am. Rep. 189, where it was held that if one forcibly took possession of certain wheat, as it stood in the field, drove the owner away, harvested it, and sold it, the measure of damages was the highest price of the property at any time between the taking and the sale. So in a suit instituted with reasonable diligence, on a breach of contract for the sale and delivery of new corn, which had been paid for in advance, the measure of damages was held to be the highest price of the corn at any time between the contract time of delivery and the rendition of the verdict. Kent v. Sinter, 23 Ind. 1.

In Wyoming, where certain railroad ties were converted and sold by the defendant, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the highest market price of the ties at any time between conversion and judgment. Hilliard Flume, etc., Co. v. Woods, 1 Wyoming 396.

2. California.—In Douglas v. Kraft, 9 Cal. 562, it was held that in case of property of fluctuating value, the plaintiff might recover the highest value at the time of its conversion or any time afterwards. Subsequently, this rule of the measure of damages was affirmed, and it was held that this was not an seems to be left to the discretion of the jury.¹ This rule of the highest intermediate value, however, has in several of the states

open question in this state. Hamer v. Hathaway, 33 Cal. 117. But in Page v. Fowler, 39 Cal. 412; 2 Am. Rep. 462, the rule was modified, and it was held that the correct measure of damages was the highest market value within a reasonable time after the property was taken, with interest from that time. At present, however, the measure of damages is prescribed by California Civil Code, § 3366, which declares that in case of the conversion of personal property, the measure of damages is presumed to be, first, the value of the property at the time of the conversion, with interest from that time, or, where the action has been prosecuted with reasonable diligence, the highest market value of the property at any time between the conversion and the verdict, without interest, at the option of the injured party; and, secondly, a fair compensation for the time and money properly expended in pursuit of the property. See Barrante v. Garratt, 50 Cal. 112; Dent v. Holbrook, 54 Cal. 145; Fromm v. Sierra Nevada Silver Min. Co., 61 Cal. 639. What is a reasonable time within the meaning of the statute, is a question of law for the court, when there is no dispute as to the facts. Fromm v. Sierra Nevada Silver Min. Co., 61 Cal. 639; Himmelmänn v. Hotelling, 40 Cal. 114; 6 Am. Rep. 600.

North Dakota Comp. Laws, § 4603, subd. 2, is identical with the California statute. A delay of eleven months in bringing an action was held fatal to the plaintiff's claim that he had prosecuted his action with reasonable diligence, within the meaning of the statute. Pickert v. Rugg, 1 N. Dak. 230.

Georgia.—The plaintiff may elect to take the value of the property at the time of the conversion with interest, or the highest value proven between the time of the conversion and the trial. Georgia Code, § 3077. If he elects to recover the highest value, he cannot recover interest thereon. Ware v. Simmons, 55 Ga. 94; Tuller v. Carter, 59 Ga. 395; Jaques v. Stewart, 81 Ga. 81; Barnett v. Thompson, 37 Ga. 335; Central, etc., R. Co. v. Atlantic, etc., R. Co., 50 Ga. 444.

So in Georgia, it is provided that the plaintiff may take the value of the property at the time of the conversion and its hire until recovery, or he may take the highest value of the property at any time between the conversion and the trial; but in no case is the plaintiff entitled to recover the highest intermediate value, with interest or hire. See Jaques v. Stewart, 81 Ga. 81.

1. Alabama.—If the value of the chattel is fluctuating, the jury may take the highest value at any time between the conversion and the time of trial, but they are not bound to take the highest value proved. Terry v. Birmingham Nat. Bank, 93 Ala. 599; Tatum v. Manning, 9 Ala. 144; Ewing v. Blount, 20 Ala. 694; Lee v. Mathews, 10 Ala. 682; 44 Am. Dec. 498; Jenkins v. McConico, 26 Ala. 213.

In Mississippi, it is declared that where no fraud, malice, or oppression intervenes, the law limits the relief to compensation, as that term is legally understood, and the rule of the higher intermediate value is expressly rejected after a careful review of the English and New York cases. A compromise is, however, effected by making the damages discretionary with the jury when any of the following elements appear: "First, in all cases where the original act was willful and wrongful; second, where the original act was bona fide, but the subsequent detention, sale, or other disposition of the property, after a knowledge of the plaintiff's claim, was willful and injurious; third, where the original act, and the subsequent disposition of the property for a greater price than its market value, at the time of the original taking, were all in ignorance of the plaintiff's rights, but the defendant seeks to retain the difference, as a speculation resulting from his original, unintentional wrong; fourth, where the property in controversy has some peculiar value to the plaintiff, and is willfully withheld from the rightful owner, or he has been deprived thereof by the willful and wrongful act of the defendant." Whitfield v. Whitfield, 40 Miss. 353; Conard v. Pacific Ins. Co., 6 Pet. (U. S.) 262; Bickell v. Colton, 41 Miss. 368. The above rules are applicable to actions of trover, detinue, trespass, and replevin. Bickell v. Colton, 41 Miss. 368.

Florida.—In Moody v. Caulk, 14 Fla. 50, commenting upon the rule as to the measure of damages in trover, Randall, C. J., said: "We think that in been subject to modification ; so instead of the highest value between the conversion and the time of the trial, that between the conversion and a reasonable time after notice of the conversion within which the plaintiff may replace his property, is declared to be the most equitable indemnity.¹ This rule is adopted in New Jersey,² and, after many apparently conflicting decisions, is recognized in New York.³

actions for conversion where the subject of the action is ordinary merchandise, and like property which is the subject of traffic, or perishable property, the value at the time of the unauthorized act, with interest, is the proper measure of damages. In the case of public stocks held as an investment, such as pictures, jewels, and like articles, held otherwise than for purposes of immediate commerce, it would be equitable and proper that the highest value after conversion should prevail, if the jury should be satisfied from the evidence that the plaintiff would have held the property up to the time of the advance in value; for the defendant should make good the actual loss sustained by reason of his act." This seems to sanction the allowance of the highest intermediate value in the discretion of the jury. So, apparently, in South Carolina. See Kid v. Mitchell, 1 Nott & M. (S. Car.) 334.

1. Federal Courts.—In Galigher v. Jones, 129 U. S. 193, it was held that in stock transactions between a broker and his principal, in which the principal suffers from the neglect of the broker to execute orders, either for the sale of stock which he holds for the principal, or for the purchase of stock which the principal orders, or where the injury is through the conversion of stock, the measure of damages is not the highest intermediate value up to the time of trial, but the highest intermediate value between the time of the conversion and a reasonable time after the owner has received notice of it; in this respect disregarding the rule adopted in England and in several of the United States, and expressly following the rule of the New York court of appeals.

2. In New Jersey, in the case of commercial securities, the rule of the highest intermediate value between the time of the contract and the time of the conversion is held not to be the proper measure of damages; but the true measure of damages is the highest intermediate market value between the time of the conversion and a reasonable time after notice of the conversion, within which to replace the securities. So, where commercial securities, pledged as collateral for the payment of a debt, were sold by the pledgee without authority, it was held that the pledgor might ratify the sale and claim the proceeds, or treat the unauthorized sale as a conversion, and recover the advance in the market price from the time of the sale up to a reasonable time within which to replace the securities; or, third, he might hold the pledgee for a breach of his duty to keep the property pledged until maturity, and claim as damages the market value of the securities at that time. Dimock v. U. S. Nat. Bank (N. J. 1893), 25 Atl. Rep. 926.

3. New York Rule.—After repeated efforts to formulate a rule which would fit all cases, the court of appeals has enunciated, as the most equitable rule, the following: "Whenever the property which forms the subject-matter of the dispute is subject to considerable and frequent fluctuations in price, the plaintiff is to be allowed the highest value attained by the chattel intermediate upon the wrongful act and such reasonable time, within which, by due diligence, he might restore the property of which he has been deprived." Barnes v. Brown, 130 N. Y. 372; Wright v. Bank of Metropolis, 110 N. Y. 237; Baker v. Drake, 66 N. Y. 518; 23 Am. Rep. 80; Colt v. Owens, 90 N. Y. 368; Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 235; Matthews v. Coe, 49 N. Y. 57; Scott v. Rogers, 31 N. Y. 676; Gruman v. Smith, 81 N. Y. 25; Galigher v. Jones, 129 U. S. 193. What is a reasonable time is declared to be a question for the jury in all circumstances of the case. See Scott v. Rogers, 31 N. Y. 676, and Baker v. Drake, 66 N. Y. 518; 23 Am. Rep. 80. This is the recognized rule in this state and is applicable alike to actions on contracts as in tort. Barnes v. Brown, 130 N. Y. 372. Formerly, the rule of the highest intermediate value up to the time of trial prevailed in this state. Romaine v. Van Allen, 26 N. Y. 309; Markham v. Jaudon, 41

N. Y. 245. But the rigid application of this rule was early qualified and its soundness, as a general rule applicable to all cases, was seriously questioned.

In Romaine v. Van Allen, 26 N. Y. 309, an action was brought for the wrongful conversion of shares of bank stock owned by the plaintiff and deposited with the bank as security, with authority to sell only in case the plaintiff on demand should fail to repay the loan. It appeared that the shares were held for investment and not for speculative purposes. The bank sold the shares without any notice or demand of the payment, whereupon the plaintiff promptly refused to ratify and required the bank to replace the shares. The trial was had before a referee and lasted from October 25th, 1861, till July 25th, 1862. In estimating the damages, the value on the 30th of June, 1862, the highest value which the shares obtained, was adopted. The authorities upon which this case was decided were ably reviewed by Rapallo, J., in Baker v. Drake, 66 N. Y. 518; 23 Am. Rep. 80. In Burt v. Dutcher, 34 N. Y. 493, this rule was also adopted, but the question as to the rule of damages was not discussed, but treated as definitely determined.

The earliest case in New York, where the rule of the highest intermediate value was to some extent adopted, and which appears to be the foundation upon which the subsequent law is built, was the case of Cortelyou v. Lansing, 2 Cal. Cas. (N. Y.) 200. The plaintiff had pledged a depreciation note having a face value of $2629.40 for the payment of a loan of $600, and the pledgee subsequently sold it for $625, in 1788. In 1799, eleven years after the conversion of the certificate, a demand was made for the pledge, and subsequently suit was brought. It was held that the only rule of damages applicable to the case was that which gave the plaintiff the value of the certificate in 1799. Kent, J., said: "The plaintiff could be indemnified only by giving him the price of the certificate at the time he called upon the defendant to restore it, and one of the cases even carries the value down to the time of trial." The principle of Cortelyou v. Lansing, 2 Cal. Cas. (N. Y.) 200, was followed without qualification in Wentworth v. West, 3 Cow. (N. Y.) 82; Clark v. Pinney, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 681; Bennett v. Lockwood, 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 223; 32 Am. Dec. 532.

The first case where the question appears to have been discussed on principle, was Suydam v. Jenkins, 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 614. In this case, Duer, J., said: "It seems to us exceedingly clear, that the highest price for which the property could have been sold at any time after the right of action accrued, and before the entry of judgment, cannot, except in special cases, be justly considered as the measure of damages. When the evidence justifies the conclusion that a higher price would have been obtained by the owner had he kept the possession, or has been obtained by the wrongdoer, we have admitted, and shown that it ought to be included in the estimate of damages; in the first case, as a portion of the indemnity to which the owner is entitled, and in the second, as a profit which the wrongdoer cannot be permitted to retain; but we cannot admit that the same rule is to be followed where nothing more is shown than a bare possibility that the highest price would have been realized, and still less where it is proved that it would not have been obtained by the owner, and has not been obtained by the wrongdoer. Its allowance in these cases would in truth impose a penalty upon the wrongdoer and render the damages vindictive, instead of remunerative; and it must be remembered that we are treating exclusively of the cases in which vindictive damages are not claimed, or if claimed, ought not to be given. The calculation of damages according to the value of the property at the time the amount of the judgment is to be settled, is liable to similar objections. As a rule, it is susceptible only of a very partial application." And after a careful and elaborate review of English authorities and the authorities in his own and other states, said: "We must, therefore, adhere to the opinion that whether the action be trover or assumpsit, the highest intermediate value or price ought never to be taken as the measure of damages, unless the evidence justifies the belief, not that it might, but that it would, have been realized by the plaintiff, had he retained the possession of the property, or that it has been, or might still be, realized by the defendant."

In Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 245, the rule, as laid down in Romaine v. Van Allen, 26 N. Y. 309, was followed. In this case it was held that the fact that the plaintiff had not paid for the stocks made no difference in the rule of damages. In Matthews v. Coe, 49 N. Y. 57, Duer, C. J., took occasion to intimate his dissatisfaction as to the correctness of the rule, and said that he did not regard the rule as so firmly settled by authorities as to be beyond the reach of review whenever an action rendered it necessary.

In Baker v. Drake, 53 N. Y. 211; 13 Am. Rep. 507; 66 N. Y. 518; 23 Am. Rep. 80, the following facts are recited in the opinion of Rapallo, J.: "From this account it appears that the plaintiff had, during the whole course of his transactions with the defendants, advanced in the aggregate but $4,240 toward the purchase of shares, which, at the time of the alleged wrongful sale, November 14th, 1868, had cost the defendants upward of $66,300 over and above all the sums so advanced by the plaintiff. By the stock lists in evidence it appears that these shares were then of the market value of less than $67,000, and the surplus arising from the sale, after paying the amount due the defendants, amounted to only $558, which sum represents the value at the time of the plaintiff's interest in the property sold. It so happened, however, that within a few days after the sale the market price of the stock rose, and that at the time of the commencement of this action, November 24th, 1868, the shares would have brought some $5,500 more than the sum for which they had been sold. But after the commencement of the action, and before the trial, the stock underwent alternate elevation and depression, and reached its maximum point in August, 1869, at which time one sale, of thirty shares at 170 per cent., was proved. It afterward declined, and on the day preceding the trial, October 20th, 1869, the price was 143, having, for a month previous to the trial, ranged between 137 and 145. The jury, in obedience to the rule laid down by the court, found a verdict for the plaintiff for $18,000, being just the difference between 134, which was the average price at which the defendants sold, and 170, the highest price touched before the trial; thirty-six per cent. on 500 shares. More than two-thirds of this supposed damage arose after the bringing of the suit. This enormous amount of profit, given under the name of damages, could not have been arrived at except upon the unreasonable supposition, unsupported by any evidence, that the plaintiff would not only have supplied the necessary margin and caused the stock to be carried through its fluctuations until it reached its highest point, but that he would have been so fortunate as to seize upon that precise moment to sell, thus avoiding the subsequent decline, and realizing the highest profit which could have possibly been derived from the transaction by one endowed with the supernatural power of prescience." It was accordingly held that the rule of the higher intermediate value was not an inflexible rule, applicable to all cases. Where the plaintiff has not paid the price, the proper measure of damages is the value at a reasonable time after notice of the defendant's breach, when the plaintiff could have replaced himself in the market. The case of Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 235, was overruled so far as it related to the measure of damages.

Wright v. Bank of Metropolis, 110 N. Y. 237, was the next case where the question came before the court of appeals. The rule of Baker v. Drake, 66 N. Y. 518; 23 Am. Rep. 80, was qualified to the extent that it was declared to be immaterial whether the plaintiff has, or has not, paid the consideration—the measure of damages is the value of the property when the plaintiff might, by due diligence, have replaced the property by going into the market and replacing. The following reasons were given by the court in an opinion by Peckham, J.: "In such a case as this, whether the action sounds in tort or is based altogether upon contract, the rule of damages is the same. . . . There is no material distinction in the fact of ownership of the whole stock which should place the plaintiff outside of any liability to repurchase after notice of sale, and should render the defendant continuously liable for any higher price to which the stock might rise after conversion and before trial. As the same liability on the part of defendant exists in each case to replace the stock, and as he is technically a wrongdoer in both cases, but in one no more than in the other, he should respond in the same measure of damages in both cases, and that measure is the amount which, in the language of Rapallo, J., is the natural, reasonable, and proximate result of the wrongful act complained of, and which a proper degree of prudence on the part of the plaintiff would not have averted. The loss of a sale of the stock at the highest price down to trial, would seem to be a less natural and proximate result of the wrongful act of the defendant in selling it when plaintiff had the stock for an investment, than when he had it for a speculation, for the intent to keep it as an investment is at war with any intent to sell it at any price, even the highest. But in both cases the qualification attaches that the loss shall be only such as a proper degree of prudence on the part of the complainant would not have averted, and a proper degree of prudence on the part of the complainant consists in repurchasing the stock after notice of its sale, and within a reasonable time. If the stock then sells for less than the defendant sold it for, of course the complainant has not been injured, for the difference in the two prices inures to his benefit. If it sells for more, that difference the defendant should pay."

1. Bank of Montgomery v. Reese, 26 Pa. St. 143; Musgrave v. Beckendorff, 53 Pa. St. 310.

In Bank of Montgomery v. Reese, 26 Pa. St. 143, trover was maintained against a trustee. It was held that the trustee should not be allowed to take to himself the profits of the trust estate.

In Wilson v. Whitaker, 49 Pa. St. 117, Read, J., said: "The contention on the part of the plaintiff was that this case was ruled by the Bank of Montgomery v. Reese, 26 Pa. St. 143. That case was rightly decided and whenever a similar case occurs, we shall be governed by it. But this does not include dicta or expressions of opinion, which were not essential to the decision, and which were clearly extrajudicial. 'A corporation,' says Lewis, C. J., 'was trustee for the stockholders, but in disregard of the duties of the trust, in distributing this stock, it deprived Mr. Reese of a number of shares to which he was entitled.' The moment, therefore, that you establish the relation of trustee and cestui que trust between the bank and its stockholder, the latter is entitled either to have the specific article, as of the day on which it should have been delivered to him, or its highest price, with all dividends declared upon it. This is formed upon the ordinary rule in equity that a trustee shall not put into his own pocket any of the profits arising from the trust estate."

In Neiler v. Kelley, 69 Pa. St. 403, which was an action of trover to recover damages for the conversion of railroad stocks, alleged to have been held by the defendants as collateral security for the payment of a debt, the measure of damages was held to be the market value of the stock at the time of the sale, with interest. In this case, Scarswood, J., recognizing the general rule as to the measure of damages and the modifications as established in early decisions, said: "The rule, however, is not changed, but only modified to this extent, that wherever there is a duty or obligation devolved upon a defendant to deliver such stocks or securities at a particular time, and that duty or obligation has not been fulfilled, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover the highest price in the market between that time and the time of trial. . . . but where a plaintiff seeks to fasten a responsibility for more than the usual measure of damages, he must also fasten upon the defendants the duty or obligation to deliver specifically the stock or securities at some particular time, and their refusal to fulfill that duty." In Work v. Bennett, 70 Pa. St. 484, the doctrine as stated in this last case was approved. The plaintiff brought an action for collateral which he had left with the defendant, who wrongfully repledged the security. It was held that the defendant might recoup the balance due as the damages for the conversion of the plaintiff's stock. See also Van Voorhis v. Rea, 153 Pa. St. 19.

A person who fraudulently places in circulation a negotiable instrument of another, whether made by him or by his apparent authority, and thereby renders him liable to pay the same to a bona fide purchaser, is guilty of a tort, and, in the absence of special circumstances diminishing its value, is presumptively liable to the injured party for the face value thereof. Metropolitan El. R. Co. v. Kneeland, 120 N. Y. 124.

In Hynes v. Patterson, 95 N. Y. 1, where the plaintiff's notes were fraudulently converted, and he satisfied the judgment therein in favor of third persons by the surrender of real estate which he had previously transferred to his wife without consideration, the measure of damages for the conversion of the notes was held to be the value of the property.

Where the maker of a note, barred by the Statute of Limitations, deceitfully obtained possession of the note and destroyed it, it was held that the whole amount with interest might be recovered in an action of trover, no presumption being made in favor of the wrongdoer. Outhouse v. Outhouse, 13 Hun (N. Y.) 130.

In Delaware Bank v. Smith, 1 Edm.

Sel. Cas. (N. Y.) 351, in an action of trover by a bank against a carrier for the non-delivery of its own notes, the measure of damages was held to be merely nominal if the bills were destroyed, otherwise, if they had been converted to the defendant's own use.

In an action of trover to recover damages for the conversion of a check which had been lost and paid by a banker under a forged indorsement, it was held that the measure of damages was the full value of the amount for which it was drawn. Survey v. Wells, 5 Cal. 125.

In an action for the conversion of certificates of deposit, evidence that at the time of the alleged conversion payment had been demanded and refused, tends to show the maker's insolvency, and a depreciation in the value of the certificates, and should be admitted. First Nat. Bank v. Dickson, 5 Dakota 286.

In Exeter Bank v. Gordon, 8 N. H. 66, where the bank had received a note as collateral security, and had subsequently, without the consent of the pledgor, compromised it by receiving one-half thereof from the maker, it was held that the bank was bound to credit the pledgor with only the amount received, upon proof that the compromise was advantageous, and that the maker was insolvent and unable to pay the balance. See Griggs v. Day, 136 N. Y. 162.

Interest.—It has been held that the measure of damages is the amount of the note and interest at the time of the conversion, with interest upon the aggregate from that time to the verdict. See St. Johns v. O'Connel, 7 Port. (Ala.) 466. And in Merchants', etc., Nat. Bank v. Masonic Hall, 62 Ga. 271, where bonds with coupons for the interest were converted, a verdict for the value of the bonds and of the mature coupons at the time of the demand, with interest on the aggregate value from the demand, was not excessive. But in Benjamin Wagon, etc., Co. v. Merchants' Exch. Bank, 63 Wis. 470, this was denied, upon the ground that the plaintiff's recovery could not possibly exceed the amount due from the notes at the time the verdict was rendered, inability of the obligee, or any other fact impugning their value.¹ Where, however, the maker has converted it, he cannot set up his own insolvency or inability in mitigation of damages.² Where policies of insurance which have matured, or on which the liability has attached, are converted, the measure of damages is prima and hence only simple interest should have been computed therein till that time.

Nominal Damages Upon Surrender of Note.—In Churchill v. Welsh, 47 Wis. 39, where it appeared clearly in the evidence that the notes of a third person came into the hands of the defendant as an agent for the plaintiff solely, or as custodian for the plaintiff and the maker, and the defendant never claimed to own them, and offered before the suit to surrender them if both parties would agree, and after the suit was brought offered to bring them into court and to be relieved from the responsibility in relation to them, and it did not appear that the plaintiff had suffered any special damages, it was held that the verdict might be reduced to nominal damages and costs upon the surrender of the notes to the plaintiff.

So in Thayer v. Manley, 73 N. Y. 305, in an action for the conversion of several notes made by the plaintiff, where it appeared that after action was commenced, but before trial, one of the notes became due, and that all were still in the possession of the defendant, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover full value, but that the judgment should give the defendant the right to cancel and return the notes as a satisfaction of damages.

In Stone v. Clough, 41 N. H. 290, which was an action of trover against one who wrongfully withheld a note which had been fully paid, upon surrender of the note only nominal damages were allowed.

Audited Account.—In O'Donough v. Corby, 22 Mo. 393, in an action of trover for an audited account, the measure of damages was held to be prima facie the amount the paper called for.

1. Griggs v. Day, 136 N. Y. 152; Thayer v. Manley, 73 N. Y. 305; Western R. Co. v. Bayne, 75 N. Y. 1; Potter v. Merchants', etc., Bank, 40 N. Y. Super. Ct. 405; Ingalls v. Lord, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 240; McPeters v. Phillips, 46 Ala. 496; First Nat. Bank v. Dickson, 5 Dakota 286; Alger v. Merritt, 16 Iowa 121; Callanan v. Brown, 31 Iowa 333.

Evidence of the invalidity of the bill or note may be admitted. Zeigler v. Wells, 23 Cal. 179; 83 Am. Dec. 87.

The insolvency of the maker may be shown by parol evidence. McPeters v. Phillips, 46 Ala. 496.

In the absence of evidence of want of ability, the presumption is, that the maker is solvent and able to pay the note. Potter v. Merchants', etc., Bank, 28 N. Y. 655; 86 Am. Dec. 273; Walrood v. Ball, 9 Barb. (N. Y.) 271.

The defendant must show the facts upon which he relies at the trial; he cannot afterwards object that the verdict was unwarranted, on the ground that the notes may have been worthless. Burrows v. Keays, 37 Mich. 430.

The mere fact that it is proved that the maker has no property from which collection may be enforced by execution, will not be considered in estimating the damages. If the court is satisfied that the note was available for its nominal value to the plaintiff, as would be the case where the holder of such a paper is debtor to the maker, in such case it may be as valuable to him by way of set-off, as if the maker were able to pay and of sound credit. Rose v. Lewis, 10 Mich. 483.

Insolvency Subsequent to a Conversion.—In King v. Ham, 6 Allen (Mass.) 298, where notes were taken, and upon demand possession was refused, and subsequently the maker became insolvent, the measure of damages was held to be the value of the notes at the time of the conversion with interest thereafter.

2. Robbins v. Packard, 31 Vt. 570; 76 Am. Dec. 134; Stephenson v. Thayer, 63 Me. 143; Outhouse v. Outhouse, 13 Hun (N. Y.) 132.

In Stephenson v. Thayer, 63 Me. 143, the case was well stated. Barrows, J., said: "The debtor cannot, after wrongfully depriving his creditors of the evidence of his indebtedment, mitigate the damages to be recovered against him for this act by setting up his own worthlessness. The sum which the defendant himself realizes by the act of conversion must surely be the lowest measure of damages. If a man takes up his own facie their face value with interest.¹ But in the case of the conversion of policies still current, the measure of damages is to be determined by the jury under all the circumstances of the case.²

7. Instruments of Title.—In trover for the conversion of title-deeds the measure of damages is merely nominal,³ unless the paper in that manner, the amount which he would have been legally bound to pay to retire it regularly, is surely the amount which he has realized by its conversion."

1. Policies of Insurance.—An insurance broker, who, without authority, compromised with the insurers for less than the amount recoverable, and gave up the policy, was held liable to the owner for the whole sum and interest. Sharp v. Whipple, 1 Bosw. (N. Y.) 557.

So in Hayes v. Massachusetts, etc., Ins. Co., 125 Ill. 626, an insurance company which brought about a surrender of an insurance policy from a guardian for a less sum than the full amount due, the statute forbidding such action by the guardian without the approbation of the court, was held liable for the conversion of the policy in an action by the ward, and the measure of damages was the balance of the principal sum due upon the policy with interest.

In Watson v. McLean, 96 E. C. L. 75, it appeared that a debtor made an assignment of his property to trustees for the benefit of creditors. He was possessed at the time of a policy of insurance on his life, the existence of which was unknown to the trustees. The executor of the debtor having secured possession and collected the policy as an asset of his estate, it was held that trover would lie by the assignee for the benefit of creditors, and that the measure of damage was the face value of the policy. Cockburn, C. J., said: "The trustees under the assignment were entitled to have the instrument. The defendant wrongly applies it to her own purposes; she thus converts it to her own use. I think, therefore, that the amount which she receives is the measure of damages, because, if the plaintiffs had had the instrument, they would have had no difficulty in obtaining the amount."

See also Kohne v. Insurance Co. of N. A., 1 Wash. C. C. 93.

2. Wheeler v. Pereles, 43 Wis. 333. In Barney v. Dudley, 42 Kan. 212; 16 Am. St. Rep. 476, the rule is enunciated as follows: where the insured is still in good health and his life insurable, the measure of damages would be the present value of the amount named in the policy, less the present value of the cost in premiums it would require to procure another policy of like kind and value on the same life, taking into consideration the probable life according to the expectancy tables; but where the insured is not in good health, and his life not insurable, it would be necessary first, to ascertain from the tables, and from proof of his general condition of health and the testimony of experts, his probable length of life, and then to compute the present value of the amount of the benefit named in the policy, and the present value of the premiums to be paid thereon during such life; and where the present value of the benefit is greater than the present value of the premiums to be paid, the difference between such values would be the measure of damages.

3. In Mowry v. Wood, 12 Wis. 413, Dixon, J., said: "In most cases where the title is unaffected, and the conduct of the defendant has not been fraudulent or oppressive, but where the deed or other written instrument was lost or destroyed through his mistake, negligence, or slight omission, the more just rule of damages would be such sum as would recompense the plaintiff for any actual loss which he may have sustained and for his trouble and expense in going into a court of equity or elsewhere, to establish and perpetuate the evidence of his title, with the costs of the action. . . . If the taking, loss, or destruction, was wanton or malicious, the jury might add such sum by way of punishing the defendant, as in their judgment the circumstances required. . . . If it should appear that the defendant still possessed the deed or writing, and stubbornly or vexatiously refused to surrender or produce it, damages to the full value of the land, and even beyond, might be given, in order to compel a return, and as a penalty of the obstinacy and vexation."

In Towle v. Lovet, 6 Mass. 394, an action was brought by the owner of the land against a stranger for the plaintiff can show that he has sustained some special injury by reason of the conversion.¹

8. Interest.—It is generally accepted that, in trover, in estimating the measure of damages to the value of property at the time of conversion, interest should be added from that time to the entry of judgment, unless it is otherwise provided by statute;² and, in conversion of a title deed, but the measure of damages was agreed upon by the parties, and was not reported.

In England, although the judgment may be for the full value of the land, satisfaction of the damages may be entered on the roll upon the terms of the defendant's delivering up the deeds and paying all the costs, as between attorney and client, incurred by the plaintiff, and submitting to other terms, placing the plaintiff in as good a situation as he was before the cause of action. Coombe v. Sansom, 1 D. & R. 201. See also Loosemore v. Radford, 9 M. & W. 657.

1. In Clowes v. Hanley, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 484, which was an action for a title bond executed by the defendant himself, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the full value of the land to which he was entitled under the bond, the defendant remaining the owner.

In Perry v. Frame, 2 Bos. & P. 451, which was an action for a lease, where it appeared that the defendant had made arrangements with the landlord which amounted to an appropriation of the return, the plaintiff was held entitled to the recovery of full value of such judgment.

Damages for the Conversion of Certificate of Stock.—The measure of damages for the conversion of a mere certificate of stock, unless the ownership of the shares is affected, cannot be placed as the value of the shares which it represents. Daggett v. Davis, 53 Mich. 35; 51 Am. Rep. 91. See also Connor v. Hillier, 11 Rich. (S. Car.) 193; 73 Am. Dec. 105.

In Elkins v. East India Co., 1 P. Wms. 396, where the defendant converted a ship, and sold it, it was said that, "If a man has my money, by way of loan, he ought to answer interest; but if he detains my money from use wrongfully, he ought à fortiori to answer interest; and it is still stronger where one, by wrongful act, takes from me my money or my goods which I am trading with, in order to turn them into money." See also Hatten v. Simpson, 2 Ves. 722; Hodgson v. Ambrose, Dougl. 337.

In McCormack v. Pennsylvania, etc., R. Co., 49 N. Y. 303, Folger, J., said that, "In the action of trover, interest is as necessary a part of a complete indemnity, as the value itself, and in fixing the damages it is not any more in the discretion of the jury than the value."

In Ewart v. Kerr, 2 McMull. (S. Car.) 141, where the property was converted and reduced to money in the hands of the defendant, it was said that the smallest measure of damages of trover, was the amount received from the conversion, with interest from that time."

In England, the allowance of interest is, by 3 & 4 Wm. IV., ch. 42, § 28, in the discretion of the jury.

North Carolina.—Section 573 of the Code makes it discretionary with the jury whether interest is to be allowed or not; yet after the verdict, the judgment for the damages assessed bears interest, and this is so, although the verdict is for a sum without interest. Stephens v. Koonce, 103 N. Car. 266;

the absence of statutory provisions, interest is to be added and not damages for loss of hire.¹

9. Special Damages.—Damages beyond the actual value of the property converted have been allowed the plaintiff when, by reason of the wrongful act of the defendant, he has been subjected to some special loss or injury.² The damage and injury for which compensation is sought in special damages must be such as are proximate,³ that is, resulting immediately from the wrong complained

Patapsco Mfg. Co. v. Magee, 86 N. Car. 350; McRae v. Malloy, 87 N. Car. 196.

California.—The rather anomalous rule prevails in this state that the plaintiff, if he recovers, may elect to take judgment either for the value of the property at the time of the conversion, with interest from that time, or, where he has prosecuted the action with reasonable diligence, for the highest market value of the property at any time between the conversion and the verdict, without interest. If he fails to elect, the court may award the damages under either rule. Barante v. Garratt, 50 Cal. 112.

Montana.—Under Montana Comp. Stat., ch. 73, regulating interest in the territory, no interest can be recovered upon an unliquidated demand until the amount thereof has been ascertained; and this rule is applicable to trover, which has the characteristics of a suit sounding in damages. Palmer v. Murray, 8 Mont. 312; Isaacs v. McAndrew, 1 Mont. 437; Randall v. Greenhood, 3 Mont. 566; Bohm v. Dunphy, 1 Mont. 333.

Bonds.—In Maury v. Coyle, 34 Md. 235, where bonds were converted, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the bonds at the time the demand was made for them, and the value of gold interest thereon, on the day when the same was payable, together with interest on the value of the several installments of such gold interests due semi-annually, and interest on the principal from the time of the conversion. See supra, this title, Choses in Action—Bills and Notes, etc.

In Georgia, it is provided by section 3564 of the Code, "It shall be the option of the plaintiff, in an action to recover personal property, to say upon the trial thereof, whether he will accept an alternative verdict for the property or its value, or whether he will demand a verdict for the property alone and its hire, if any, and it shall be the duty of the court to instruct the jury to render the verdict as the plaintiff may thus elect. . . . In an action of trover the verdict may be in the alternative—that is, it must be for the value of the property sued for, which may be discharged by the return of the property, within a given time specified in the verdict." See also Schley v. Lyon, 6 Ga. 530.

In Tuller v. Carter, 59 Ga. 395, the following interpretation was put on the above enactment: Where the plaintiff is content to recover the value of the property at the time of its conversion, and proves its value at that date only, he will be entitled to interest to the time of trial; but if he introduces testimony to show its highest value between the conversion and the trial, the measure of damages will be such value, without the interest.

In an action for the wrongful seizure and sale of the plaintiff's stock in trade under legal proceedings, it was held that, while the profits that he was making might not be recovered as such, the amount might be proved and considered by the jury in estimating the injury done to the plaintiff. Juchter v. Boehm, 67 Ga. 534.

1. In Farmers' Bank v. McKee, 2 Pa. St. 318, where the plaintiff contracted with A to build a vessel, and made advances from time to time, for which A gave as security a bill of sale of the vessel, where the defendant had converted the debt before the vessel was finished, the plaintiffs were held entitled to recover the value of the vessel at the time of the conversion, and not at a subsequent time, nor as special damage the value of freight which the plaintiffs might have earned if the contractor had completed and delivered the vessel to them. Reid v. Fairbanks, 13 C. B. 692; 76 E. C. L. 692.

In Cushing v. Seymour, 30 Minn. 301, which was an action for the wrongful conversion of a threshing-machine, it was held that the profits which the plaintiff might have made from the performance of particular contracts, if the defendant had not deprived him of the use of the machine, were too conjectural and uncertain to furnish a proper basis of damages for the conversion.

The inconvenience and annoyance to an editor arising from the conversion of a file of newspapers is too speculative and remote. See Leffingwell v. Gilchrist, 40 Iowa 416.

Where a traveling bag containing the plaintiff's clothes was converted, he was not entitled to recover special damages from the fact that in consequence of such conversion he, a workman, was compelled to work in unsuitable clothes which were damaged thereby. Saunders v. Brosius, 52 Mo. 50.

Where the plaintiff complained not only that the defendant took his goods, but that he did so on a false and unfounded claim of right, and that he, the plaintiff, was much annoyed and prejudiced in his business, and believed to be insolvent, it was held that the jury might give vindictive damages for the injury done, over and above the value of the goods seized. Brewer v. Drew, 11 M. & W. 629.

In Hill v. Canfield, 56 Pa. St. 454, it was said that those cases in which more than compensation may be allowed in trover are those for the conversion of heir-looms, family pictures, and the like, and where there is fraud, violence, or outrage.

In Peckham Iron Co. v. Harper, 41 Ohio St. 100, it was held that exemplary damages might be allowed where an agent by false and fraudulent representations to his principal, obtained possession of his principal's goods and converted them to his own use.

In Bates v. Callender, 3 Dakota 256, where from the evidence it appeared that the defendant, an officer of the law, under color of authority was guilty of malice and oppression, it was held that the jury might give exemplary damages.

Evidence that the defendant took possession of goods under a contract with the owner's agent, and not by force, is admissible to defeat a claim for exemplary damages. Slocum v. Putnam (Tex. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 52.

RETURN OF PROPERTY.—In general, the plaintiff cannot be compelled to accept property offered to be returned; and no tender or offer to restore it will defeat the right of action or mitigate the damages;¹ nor will a mere agreement to receive the property when the injured party thinks fit to disregard his agreement and bring suit for the conversion.² But if the plaintiff does receive the property, whether from the original wrongdoer or from anyone into whose hands it may have subsequently come, the acceptance may be shown in mitigation of damages, but will not defeat the right of action.³ The plaintiff, however, is entitled to damages for the injury which he has

The burden of proof is on the defendants to show acceptance or consent to the return. Mears v. Cornwall, 73 Mich. 78.

What Constitutes a Return.—In Hiort v. London, etc., R. Co., 4 Exch. Div. 188, where the defendant, a warehouseman, held corn belonging to the plaintiff which was delivered to G, an agent of the plaintiff, upon his promise to procure the delivery order, and subsequently F obtained the plaintiff's delivery order for himself and indorsed it to G, who forwarded it to the defendants as a delivery order which he had promised to send them, F, being unable to pay, and G never having accounted to the plaintiff for the price of the corn, it was held that, though there had been a technical conversion by the defendant, the plaintiff was entitled only to nominal damages because the property had been technically returned.

In Dalley v. Crowley, 5 Lans. (N. Y.) 301, the defendant having induced the plaintiff's wife to leave him, aided her in carrying away the plaintiff's property. The wife afterwards brought the property to the vicinity of the plaintiff's residence and delivered to him railroad checks for it. It was held that the plaintiff virtually accepted the property, and it was error for the trial judge to allow damages for the full value of the property.

Where the plaintiff proved that the defendant took and used his tools, but returned them, it was held to be a conversion, but one for which the jury ought to give small damages, and not the value of the tools so used. Cook v. Hartle, 8 C. & P. 568; 34 E. C. L. 528.

In Baldwin v. Porter, 12 Conn. 473, where it appeared that the defendant claimed that the plaintiff had regained the property through the agency of another, at an expense much less than the value of the converted property, the refusal to admit evidence to prove it was held an error.

Where goods taken were inclosed in boxes, the mere opening of the box subsequently by the owner to enable a witness to appraise the value of the goods, was not such a resumption of the property as would satisfy the mitigation of damages. Connah v. Hale, 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 462.

In Delano v. Curtis, 7 Allen (Mass.) 470, in an action for the conversion of machinery in a workshop, where it did not appear that the defendant had converted the property to his own use, or moved the same, or had the actual possession thereof, otherwise than by being in the lawful possession of the workshop, and the alleged conversion consisted in the refusal to allow the plaintiff to remove the same upon demand; a subsequent notice to the plaintiff by the defendant that he had relinquished all claim to the machinery, was considered in mitigation of damages.

Where a sheriff held goods taken in execution, delivered them to the assignees of the bankrupt after an action of trover had been commenced by them, and the assignees accepted the goods without condition, it was held that they could not recover more than nominal damages without alleging special damages in the declaration. Moon v. Raphael, 2 Scott 289; 2 Bing. N. Cas. 310; 29 E. C. L. 345.

In Warder v. Baldwin, 51 Wis. 450, it was held that if an officer, as soon as he finds that he has, by mistake, levied upon the wrong property, tenders it back to the person from whose possession he took it, leaves it on the premises, and thereafter asserts no claim to its possession, the damages recovered for the taking should be merely nominal, unless it is shown that the plaintiff has suffered, by reason of the seizure, special damages, apart from the mere value of the property. To the same effect, see also Farr v. Hunt (Wis. 1894), 58 N. W. Rep. 377.

In McCormick v. Pennsylvania Cent. R. Co., 80 N. Y. 353, the plaintiff went to the defendant's depot in Philadelphia with his family and nine trunks to take passage to Chicago. He applied to the baggage-master for checks for his baggage, but was informed that he must first procure tickets; while he was absent for that purpose, the baggage-master caused the baggage to be weighed, checked, and put into the baggage car. Upon the return of the plaintiff with his tickets he was informed that under the rules of the company, the tickets were not sufficient to transfer all his baggage, and for the excess, a charge was made, which the plaintiff refused to pay; he demanded his checks; these were refused unless the extra charge was paid; he then demanded his trunks, but the baggage-master refused to deliver them for the reason that they were covered with other baggage and could not be reached before the time for starting the train. The plaintiff declined to go on the train; his baggage went through to Chicago, and the night after its arrival, the depot was set on fire by lightning, and the baggage, except two trunks and some loose articles, was destroyed. The trial court found that there was no reasonable excuse for the refusal to restore the baggage to plaintiff. In an action for the conversion of the baggage, the facts authorized a finding of a conversion at Philadelphia. It appeared that after the plaintiff had determined not to take the train, he called upon the defendant's president and requested him to have the baggage taken off at Pittsburgh, as he intended to stop there. The president gave the necessary directions and the baggage-master telegraphed to Pittsburgh, but the baggage was not stopped. The baggage-master also gave the plaintiff an order for the delivery of the baggage at Pittsburgh without checks. During and the value when returned, together with any special damages proved.¹ So where the property is accepted at a place other than that where the conversion occurred, the measure of damages is the difference in the value of the property at the time and place where seized and that at the time and place where it was returned to the possession of the plaintiff.² And where the plaintiff has been put to expense and trouble in securing the restoration of his property, he should be allowed a reasonable compensation therefor.³

the same day the plaintiff requested the baggage-master at Philadelphia, to countermand the order to stop the baggage, as he had concluded to go through to Chicago without stopping. It was held that by the plaintiff's acts subsequent to the conversion, he had resumed possession of his property, and that for the original conversion he could receive only nominal damages.

Partial Satisfaction by Joint Tortfeasor.—Satisfaction or payment of partial damages by one tort-feasor in an action of trover inures to the benefit of other joint tort-feasors, not as a matter of defense, but in mitigation of damages. Muser v. Lewis, 50 N. Y. Super. Ct. 431; Heyer v. Flagg, 6 R. I. 45.

Costs.—Upon a return of the property and its acceptance by the plaintiff, although his right of action is not defeated, he is entitled to special damages or compensation for the deterioration of the property; if he fails to recover such special damages, it has been held that he may be compelled to pay costs as the defeated party. Hiort v. London, etc., R. Co., 4 Exch. Div. 188.

In an action for the conversion of a horse, the expense incurred by the plaintiff in traveling to the place where he found the animal, was held not to constitute a part of the injury done by the defendant to the plaintiff, and could not be recovered. Renfro v. Hughes, 60 Ala. 581. So in Williams v. Deen, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 575, it was held that no damages were recoverable for repeated railway journeys made by the plaintiff in an effort to settle the matter.

In Collins v. Lowry, 78 Wis. 329, it was held that the plaintiff therein, having voluntarily accepted a return of the property pending an action to recover damages for the wrongful conversion, could not recover special damages for expenses incurred in obtaining such return. In a later case, Paroski v. Goldberg, 80 Wis. 340, it was held that this case was not in conflict with the proposition of the text, and that the language in the opinion of the court, apparently in conflict therewith, had reference only to that particular case.

Reward for Return of Property.—If the restoration of property is obtained from third persons, by the payment of a reasonable reward by the plaintiff, the amount so paid and interest thereon should be deducted from the estimated value of the goods at the time of the return, in assessing damages. Greenfield Bank v. Leavitt, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 1; 28 Am. Rep. 268.

Expense of Unsuccessful Suit.—A reasonable expense incurred by the plaintiff in the recovery of the goods is held not to include the expenses of an unsuccessful suit. See Wilson v. Matthews, 24 Barb. (N. Y.) 292; Ewing v. Blount, 20 Ala. 694.

In Ross v. Malone (Ala. 1893), 12 So Rep. 182, it was held that the plaintiff could not prove, as items of damages, the expenses incurred in the

An exception to the general rule prevails in England, that is, where the property has come lawfully into the possession of the defendant, and his refusal to surrender was merely technical, without any willful wrong, and the property when offered is in as good condition as when converted, the court will usually order a stay of proceedings upon the payment of the costs up to that time by the defendant.¹ And this rule is adopted in several of the states.²

In Hiort v. London, etc., R. Co., 4 Exch. Div. 188, Bramwell, J., said: "A conversion cannot be purged, and if a defendant is guilty of a conversion he must pay some damages. A return of the goods undoubtedly might be shown to reduce the damages in the case of a conversion where the owner not only received back the goods, but where he took them back against his will; in an action of trover and conversion, the practice was for a defendant to apply to the court for a stay of proceedings on a delivery up of the goods, and on the payment of nominal damages and costs, but where the plaintiff refused to accept delivery and insisted on proceeding with his action for substantial damages, he was made to pay the costs of the action. It is clear, therefore, that on the return of the goods the plaintiff would recover, not their value, but the damages he had sustained by the wrongful act which was called a conversion.

In Fisher v. Prince, 3 Burr. 1363, Lord Mansfield made this distinction: "That where trover is brought for a specific chattel of an ascertained quantity and quality, and unattended with any circumstance that can enhance the damages, the real value must be the sole measure of the damages and the specific thing demanded may be brought into court; but where there is an uncertainty, either as to the quantity or quality of the thing demanded, or if there is any tort accompanying it that may enhance the damage above the real value of the thing, and there is no rule whereby to estimate the additional value, it should have been brought in." See Bigelow Co. v. Heintze, 53 N. J. L. 69.

In Tucker v. Wright, 3 Bing. 601; 13 E. C. L. 64, where the value of the goods converted was not ascertained, the court refused to stay proceedings upon the delivery of the goods to the plaintiff or upon payment of the value thereof. See also Witten v. Fuller, 2 W. Bl. 902.

So, in Rutland, etc., R. Co. v. Bank of Middlebury, 32 Vt. 639, in an action of trover for the conversion of certain railroad bonds, the rule of the English courts was said to be a just rule and the defendant was permitted to bring the bonds into court, and, in the absence of evidence showing any special damages beyond the value of the bonds, only nominal damages were allowed.

In Hart v. Skinner, 16 Vt. 138; 42 Am. Dec. 500, the right of the defendant to bring the property into court was denied, as not being within the rule.

In Churchill v. Welsh, 47 Wis. 39, it was held, that, after suit was brought, the court will permit the defendant to bring the property claimed into court for the plaintiff, with costs up to that time, and will then order a stay of proceedings or permit the plaintiff to proceed with the action at the risk of having the costs finally adjudged against him, unless he be able to show that he has been specially damaged by the conversion of the property by the

b. APPROPRIATION TO PLAINTIFF'S USE.—Where the proceeds of the property taken and converted have been appropriated to the use of the plaintiff with his consent, express or implied, or by operation of law, as when goods are taken under legal process against the plaintiff from the hands of the defendant, this may be shown in mitigation of damages.¹ Although a distinction is maintained in some cases, and it is held that the rule does not apply where the process is sued by the trespasser himself,² the defendant, in addition to its value at the time of the return; or the court will, in proper cases after the verdict, upon a tender of the property, reduce the verdict to nominal damages.

In Georgia, where the plaintiff in trover takes an alternative verdict as provided for by section 356 of the Code, the defendant has the right to rely upon such a verdict being rendered as may be discharged by the return of the property sued for, and the charge of the court limiting the finding to the value of the property with interest, is error. Tuller v. Carter, 59 Ga. 395.

Sanders*, 16 Vt. 243; Stow v. Yarwood, 14 Ill. 423; Bates v. Courtwright, 36 Ill. 518; Howard v. Cooper, 45 N. H. 342; Smith v. Mitchell, 12 Mich. 191; Erie Preserving Co. v. Witherspoon, 49 Mich. 377.

In Higgins v. Whitney, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 379, where, subsequent to the wrongful taking, the goods were taken from the hands of the tort-feasor by distress for rent, it was held that the defendant might show this fact in mitigation of damages. So in Sherry v. Schuyler, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 204; and in Tripp v. Grounder, 60 Ill. 474, where goods were distrained for rent and sold by a constable without having been appraised as required by law, and the owner of the goods brought trover for their conversion, it was held that the amount which the defendant had paid upon the plaintiff's rent should be deducted from the value of the goods.

In an action against a judgment creditor for the value of property wrongfully attached by him, it was error to exclude evidence that, after the seizure, the creditor bought the property at a sale on foreclosure of a lien placed thereon by the plaintiff in favor of another creditor. Koyer v. White, (Tex. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 46.

Where the plaintiff, owner of a chattel seized for taxes, procured it to be bid off at the auction sale and appropriated it to his own use, he could recover only what he was compelled to pay. Hurlburt v. Green, 41 Vt. 490.

Appropriation by Mortgagee.—In an action by a mortgagor against a third person for the conversion of the mortgaged property, it was held that proof that the mortgagee took possession of the property for a breach of condition, should be considered by the jury as an application of the property for the benefit of the mortgagor, although the foreclosure was not complete at the time of the trial, and although the mortgagee had sold a portion of the mortgaged property and transferred another part of it to the defendant. Dahill v. Booker, 140 Mass. 308; 54 Am. Dec. 465.

2. See Edmondson v. Nuttall, 17 C. B. N. S. 280; 112 E. C. L. 279.

In Hanmer v. Wilsey, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 91, where the property was taken upon an illegal process against the owner, for which taking an action was commenced against the creditor who directed it, and afterwards a legal process was sued out on the same property, which had not gone back into the owner's possession, was seized and sold for his debt, it was held that the defendant could not show this fact in mitigation of damages, it being a mere act of his own.

In Otis v. Jones, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 394, where property was taken, the subsequent appropriation of it by a sale under execution in favor of the wrongdoer was held not to mitigate the damages. But the contrary was held in Lazarus v. Ely, 45 Conn. 504.

So in Michigan. A subsequent sale on a legal process against the owner and in favor of the trespasser cannot be shown to reduce damages; and an appropriation under a mere power weight of authority is against this distinction, and holds that if the appropriation be under legal process, although in the interest, or at the instance, of the wrongdoer, it may be shown in mitigation of damages.¹

One, however, who seizes property without color of authority, cannot show in mitigation his own unauthorized and unsanctioned conferred by the owner can have no greater force than a sale. Dalton v. Laudahn, 27 Mich. 528. See also Bringard v. Stellwagen, 41 Mich. 57. But in Erie Preserving Co. v. Witherspoon, 49 Mich. 377, it was said that although the subsequent seizure of the property does not excuse the tort, it will, under some circumstances, when properly pleaded, go in mitigation of damages.

1. Prescott v. Wright, 6 Mass. 20; Caldwell v. Eaton, 5 Mass. 404; Daggett v. Adams, 1 Me. 198; Board v. Head, 3 Dana (Ky.) 489; Morrison v. Crawford, 7 Oregon 472; Mississippi Mills v. Meyer, 83 Tex. 433; Irish v. Cloyes, 8 Vt. 30; 30 Am. Dec. 446; Lamb v. Day, 8 Vt. 30; 30 Am. Dec. 479; Hopple v. Higbee, 23 N. J. L. 342; Briggs v. Gove, Crompt. & J. 36. So in Pierce v. Benjamin, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 356; 25 Am. Dec. 396, the defendant, a collector of taxes, who had seized and sold property upon a lawful tax against the plaintiff, was entitled to show in mitigation of damages that he had applied the proceeds of the sale upon the tax. See also Irish v. Cloyes, 8 Vt. 30; 30 Am. Dec. 446.

And in Curtis v. Ward, 20 Conn. 204, where the defendant caused the plaintiff's goods to be attached, and while under attachment the levy was erased, the writ discontinued, and a new writ taken and levied upon the goods, judgment having been obtained in the suit commenced by the second writ, and the goods were taken and sold under execution and applied to a judgment in a suit by the attaching creditor for the conversion as under the first attachment, the defendant was allowed to show in mitigation of damages the application of the proceeds on the attachment.

In Plevin v. Henshall, 10 Bing. 24; 25 E. C. L. 17, where after a verdict for the plaintiff, the goods were seized in the hands of the defendant for rent due to A, which the plaintiff was liable to pay, and the defendant paid the rent, the court allowed him to deduct the amount from the verdict.

In Lamb v. Day, 8 Vt. 407; 30 Am.

Dec. 479, the plaintiff brought an action against an attaching officer and the plaintiff in attachment, for wrongfully using a horse; the plaintiff in attachment subsequently recovered judgment, and the horse was sold by virtue of an execution in satisfaction of the judgment. The court said: "Placing the liability of the defendants on the footing of the original taking as an act of trespass, still the ultimate disposition of the horse is material to the question of damages, and as the property was applied in the satisfaction of the plaintiff's debt, that the circumstance serves to reduce the damages accordingly." And in Stewart v. Martin, 16 Vt. 397, where an action was brought against a constable for an attachment out of his jurisdiction, it was held that the defendant might show, in mitigation of damages, that, having taken the property at a place within his jurisdiction, he attached it there on the same process as the property of the same debtor.

In Dodson v. Cooper, 37 Kan. 346, where it appeared in an action brought by the plaintiff, as the owner of a stock of merchandise, against a sheriff who levied upon and took possession of the stock in good faith, as the property of a third party, that the plaintiff had purchased back the goods from a stranger at the sheriff's sale, the measure of damages was the sum thus paid, and in addition such special damages as he had suffered from the unlawful taking in the way of injury or depreciation in value as could be proved.

So where goods were seized for the violation of a statute forbidding their sale within three miles of any place of religious meeting, etc., evidence that an agent of the owner bought them for a nominal price is admissible in mitigation of damages. Rogers v. Brown, Spen. 119.

In Wanamaker v. Bowes, 36 Md. 42, in an action by a mortgagee against a creditor of the mortgagor for a wrongful and illegal seizure of the mortgaged goods, where they were taken under a application of the fruits of his tort to his demand against the plaintiff, which is not attaching by way of lien or security to the property converted.¹ When seized under legal process, the mere fact of the levy or attachment cannot go in mitigation of damages, but it must also appear that the owner had the benefit of it.²

Although in an action of trover by the rightful administrator against an executor de son tort, such an executor cannot defeat the action, he may show in mitigation of damages an appropriation of the funds converted to the debts which the administrator was bound to pay in due course of administration.³ But it is held that the purchaser from the executor, when sued by the rightful void attachment, it was held that the plaintiff might prove in mitigation of damages, that at the time of the seizure under attachment, there was rent in arrear due upon the premises occupied by the mortgagor and in which the goods were, that, after the seizure by the sheriff and before the removal of the goods, there were filed with him by the landlord a notice and affidavit of such rent in arrear, and that in pursuance of such notice an order of the court passing judgment, the sheriff paid the landlord out of the proceeds of the sale of the property, the amount of the rent in arrear. In this case, Bartol, C. J., said: "While the general rule is, that for the wrongful taking and conversion of the plaintiff's goods, the measure of compensation is the value of the goods, and the wrongdoer will not be allowed voluntarily to appropriate the proceeds to the payment of the plaintiff's debts, or in any way apply them voluntarily to his use without his consent, and claim thereby to reduce the amount of his liability. Yet, if without the agency or act of the defendants, the writs have been by operation and judgment of law applied to the use of the plaintiff, his damages resulting from the unlawful act will be pro tanto diminished."

A sheriff, who wrongfully levies upon goods and retains his fees from the proceeds, is liable to conversion, even though he causes the proceeds to be formally credited upon an alleged indebtedness. Bringard v. Stellwagen, 41 Mich. 54.

2. Ball v. Liney, 48 N. Y. 6; 8 Am.

Rep. 511; Wehle v. Butler, 61 N. Y. 249; Roberts v. Stuyvesant Safe Deposit Co., 123 N. Y. 57. And see Allen v. Coates, 29 Minn. 46.

In Ball v. Liney, 48 N. Y. 6; 8 Am. Rep. 511, Earle, J., said: "After a conversion of property, the title still remains in the owner, and the property can be taken from the wrongdoer on an execution against the owner and sold, and the proceeds applied upon his debt, and the owner will thus have the benefit of the property; and in such case the wrongdoer can state the seizure and sales, not as an entire defense, but in mitigation of damages, for the reason that it would be unjust for the owner to recover the value of the property after he has thus had the benefit of it. It is not the fact of the seizure that gives the defense, but that it has been seized under such circumstances that the owner has had, or could have, the benefit of it."

But in Kaley v. Shed, 10 Met. (Mass.) 317, where the defendant in an action for taking and carrying away goods, had promised to return them on the plaintiff's demand, and while preparing to do so they were attached and taken away from him on a writ against the plaintiff, it was held that the measure of damages should be the same as if he had actually returned them, although he did not show that the goods had in fact been applied to the plaintiff's benefit, and although some of the goods were exempt from attachment.

In Glenn v. Smith, 2 Gill & J. (Md.) 493; 20 Am. Rep. 452, Buchanan, C. J., said, that where the rightful executor or administrator sues the executor de son tort, in an action of trover for administrator, cannot show in mitigation of damages that the administrator has paid such debts.¹

TRUE.—In one sense that only is true which is conformable to the actual state of things. In that sense, a statement is untrue which does not express things exactly as they are; but, in another and broader sense, the word true is often used as a synonym of honest, sincere, not fraudulent.²

goods of the deceased, "the defendant cannot plead payment of the debts to the value, or that he has given the goods in satisfaction for the debts. But on the general issue pleaded, he may give in evidence such payments, and they will be recouped in damages if they be such as the plaintiff would have been bound to make, or, in the language of some of the books, made in due course of administration."

But the executor de son tort cannot be justified in applying the assets to the payment of debts which the rightful executor would not have been authorized to pay, and so, in order to mitigate the damages, he must show that he has applied the funds in the same manner that they would have been lawfully applied by the rightful executor. If it appears that he has expended assets in the payment of one particular debt not a lien on them, leaving others unpaid, he will be liable to other creditors. Gay v. Lemle, 32 Miss. 309; Hardy v. Thomas, 23 Miss. 544; 57 Am. Dec. 152. It is laid down as a rule that the executor de son tort cannot give in evidence in mitigation of damages, payment of debts to the value of the goods still in his possession, but only such as were sold. Lomax on Executors, 363. In Mountford v. Gibson, 4 East 441, it was held that a creditor of the intestate, who received the goods of his debtor after his death from his widow in payment of the debt, cannot protect his possession in an action of trover, where the lawful administrator, upon the grounds of such delivery having been made by one who, by such intermeddling, made herself executrix de son tort, no fact appearing to give color to her having acted in that respect in the character of executrix, except the single act of wrong complained of, in which the defendant participated.

2. Moulor v. American L. Ins. Co., 111 U. S. 345. In that case it was held that, as applied to the answers which an applicant for a life-insurance policy must give to the questions propounded by the policy, the latter sense of the term true is the correct one.

In Clapp v. Massachusetts Ben. Assoc., 146 Mass. 530, a similar case, the court said: "The word 'true' is often used as a synonym of honest or sincere, without evasion or fraud." See also First Nat. Bank v. Hartford F. Ins. Co., 95 U. S. 673; Fowkes v. Manchester, etc., L. Assur., etc., Assoc., 3 B. & S. 928; 113 E. C. As to true in statute against forgery, see FORGERY, vol. 8, p. 495.

True Value.—The words "true value," as used in a revenue law, have been held to mean the actual cost of the goods to the importer at the place from which they were imported, and not the current market value of the goods at such place. U. S. v. Tappan, 11 Wheat. (U. S.) 419. See also VALUE.

3. In Potter v. State, 39 Tex. 388, it was held that "trunk" and "chest" were not synonymous, and that an indictment for the theft of one "trunk or chest" was bad for being in the alternative.

I. DEFINITIONS — 1. Trust Deeds.—The only kind of trust deeds embraced within the scope of this article are those which are executed for the purpose of securing the payment of a debt, or the fulfillment of an obligation in the nature of a debt. A trust deed of this kind may be defined as a form of security consisting of a deed of conveyance, wherein the debtor or obligor is the grantor, the creditor or party to be secured is the cestui que trust, and a third person, designated as the trustee, is the grantee. The deed specifies the nature of the debt or obligation intended to be secured, and confers upon the trustee, in the event of a default, a power to sell the property thereby conveyed, exercisable upon certain specified conditions, for the purpose of applying the proceeds, so far as necessary, to the satisfaction of the debt. A trust deed of this character is, in substance and effect, a mortgage with power of sale, with the additional feature of the appointment of a third party to hold the title and exercise the power.¹

1. "A deed of trust to secure a debt is in legal effect a mortgage. It is a conveyance made to a person other than the creditor, conditioned to be void if the debt be paid at a certain time, but if not paid that the grantee may sell the land and apply the proceeds to the extinguishment of the debt, paying over the surplus to the grantor. The addition of the power of sale does not change the character of the instrument any more than it does when contained in a mortgage. Such a deed has all the essential elements of a mortgage; it is a conveyance of land as security for a debt. It passes the legal title to the grantee just as a mortgage does, except in those states where the natural effect of the conveyance is controlled by statute; and in states where a mortgage is considered merely as security, and not a conveyance, a trust deed is apt to be regarded in this respect just like a mortgage. Both instruments convey a defeasible title only; and the right to redeem is the same in one case as it is in the other. The only important difference between them is that in the one case the conveyance is directly to the creditor, while in the other it is to a third person for his benefit." Jones, Mortg. (4th ed.), § 62. See also § 1769.

"When we use the term 'deed of trust,' we do not mean a case where the grantor parts wholly with his title, giving it to a trustee absolutely, for the purpose of raising a fund to pay debts, though this is, properly speaking, a deed of trust. But we mean cases where the conveyance is to secure a debt in case of default, thus assimilating the transaction to a mortgage, and where the intention of the grantor, instead of parting with his

As an absolute deed may be shown to be a mortgage, so an instrument may be a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage, estate, is to retain it in case he performs his legal obligation according to its terms. Instruments of this latter class are also, but less accurately, called deeds of trust. In substance they are mortgages with specific provisions for foreclosing or barring the equity of redemption." Judge Dillon in 2 Am. Law Reg. 642.

"A deed conveying land to a trustee as mere collateral security for the payment of a debt, with the condition that it shall become void on the payment of the debt when due, and with power to the trustee to sell the land and pay the debt in case of default on the part of the debtor, is a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage. By an absolute deed of trust, the grantor parts absolutely with the title, which rests in the grantee unconditionally for the purpose of the trust. The latter is a conveyance to a trustee for the purpose of raising a fund to pay debts; while the former is a conveyance in trust for the purpose of securing a debt, subject to condition of defeasance." Bartley, J., in Hoffman v. Mackall, 5 Ohio St. 124.

The same court has decided that a deed of trust given to secure a debt owed to a third person, and conditioned to be void on payment of the debt, but in case of default giving the grantee power to sell the property at public auction, is not an absolute conveyance in trust, but is in the nature of a mortgage, and the legal title remains in the grantor after default, subject to the trustee's power of sale. Martin v. Alter, 42 Ohio St. 94.

Trust Deeds and Mortgages.—"Mortgages containing powers of sale, and deeds of trust to secure a debt, are substantially the same thing at law and in equity. At law, both kinds of deeds purport to convey the legal title to the grantee, creditor or trustee; but in equity, the land, the title and the deeds, stand for security of the debt. The debt is the principal thing, and the conveyance of the land is collateral to the debt. The mortgagor in both cases has an estate in the land, called an 'equity of redemption.' If he fails to pay the debt, his equity of redemption is barred upon due proceedings had; but if the debt is paid at any time before his equity is defeated by the steps appointed to be taken, it becomes absolute, and he is entitled to a reconveyance or a discharge of the mortgage, as the case may be. In some circumstances, a discharge of the mortgage upon payment, or a reconveyance, is not material, as by the terms of the mortgage, and by the law, it becomes null and void. A mortgage is a pledge or security for a debt, whatever may be the form which the transaction takes; whether a simple mortgage deed in form, or a deed in trust, or a deed absolute on its face, accompanied by an agreement in writing to reconvey or sell, or to do any other thing upon the payment of a certain sum of money. Courts of equity look upon it as a mortgage, and deal with it as such." 2 Perry on Trusts, 602 d.

A deed of trust given by a railroad company, conditioned that upon payment of the funds secured, the estate thereby conveyed shall cease and become void, is in legal effect a mortgage, leaving the title in the mortgagor. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. v. Wisconsin River Land Co., 71 Wis. 94.

But a conveyance of lands by a railroad company to trustees, for the sole benefit of certain designated creditors, containing no defeasance clause, and no directions as to how the trust shall be executed, vests an absolute title in the trustees as against the grantor, and cannot be regarded as a mortgage. Catlett v. Starr, 70 Tex. 485.

That a trust deed to secure a debt is in no material respect different from a power of sale mortgage, see the language of the courts in the following cases: Bell v. Carter, 17 Beav. 11; 22 L. J. Ch. 933; Eaton v. Whiting, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 484; Shillaber v. Robinson, 97 U. S. 75; Woodruff v. Robb, 19 Ohio 212; Flint, etc., Co. v. Auditor Gen., 41 Mich. 635; Sargent v. Howe, 21 Ill. 148; Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. White, 106 Ill. 67; Fitch v. Wetherbee, 110 Ill. 475; Lenox v. Reed, 12 Kan. 223; Newman v. Samuels, 17 Iowa 528; Kyger v. Riley, 2 Neb. 20; Webb v. Hoselton, 4 Neb. 308; Hurley v. Estes, 6 Neb. 386; Thompson v. Marshall, 21 Oregon 171; Wright v. Henderson, 12 Tex. 43; *McLane v. though it does not contain any defeasance clause, and though it authorizes the trustee to take immediate possession and sell.¹ So essentially alike are trust deeds and mortgages, that in those states where it is held that the legal title remains in the mortgagor, the same rule is generally applied in favor of the grantor in a trust deed.²

In California and Florida, however, it is held that a trust deed, unlike a mortgage, vests the legal title in the trustee, subject, of course, to be defeated by payment of the debt.³ While for all practical purposes trust deeds of this character are mortgages, the courts will sometimes make a distinction between them for the purpose of sustaining the remedy, as where a statute requires all "mortgages" to be foreclosed by suit.⁴

2. Power of Sale Mortgages.—A mortgage with power of sale, is one which confers upon the mortgagee power to sell and convey the mortgaged property, upon certain specified conditions, for the purpose of satisfying the debt or obligation secured. It differs in no respect from an ordinary mortgage, except in enabling the mortgagee to cut off the equity of redemption by sale upon

Where a trust deed and a mortgage are executed at the same time, and to secure the same debt, they are to be construed as one instrument. Wheeler, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Howard, 28 Fed. Rep. 741.

Trust Deed—What Is.—To secure the payment of a debt to A, the plaintiff gave a deed of land to B and C, C being designated as party of the third part. The deed recited that it was given to secure the debt to A, and provided that in the case of non-payment, and upon the request of A, B and C should sell the property. In an action to enjoin B and C from selling, it was held that the deed conferred a power of sale upon them, and was a trust deed, not a mortgage. Bateman v. Burr, 57 Cal. 480.

4. An instrument executed by a debtor, conveyed land to his creditor "in trust" to secure payment of the debt, with power to sell on default at public vendue upon giving ten days' notice. The court held that, although the creditor was, himself, the trustee, this was a trust deed, and not a mortgage, and that the Act of Feb. 25th, 1858, providing that "hereafter no mortgage of real estate shall be foreclosed in any other manner than by action in the proper court, provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed to apply to deeds of trust," did not prohibit the exercise of the power of sale. The court observed that, "The proviso needs not to be restricted to that which may be strictly and technically a trust deed. An instrument is, equally, a deed of trust, or one containing or conferring a trust, whether it be for the grantee's own benefit or for that of another." Fanning v. Kerr, 7 Iowa 450.

Mortgagee as Trustee.—It has also been held in California, that an instrument may be a trust deed and not a mortgage, even though the trustee named was himself the creditor secured. The court observed that, "Whether the conveyance is to be treated as a mortgage or as a deed of trust, must depend upon its essential character, as shown by its terms, and not whether the grantee is a creditor, whose debt is to be paid out of the proceeds to arise from the execution of the trust." More v. Calkins, 95 Cal. 435. See also Thompson v. McKay, 41 Cal. 221.

II. VALIDITY OF POWERS OF SALE.—It is not surprising, in view of the regard shown by courts of equity for the mortgagor, that the validity of power of sale mortgages as a means of cutting off the equity of redemption, should have been at first seriously doubted, and even denied, upon the ground that such a power gave the mortgagee a great and inequitable advantage, which he would be likely to employ to the oppression of the mortgagor.²

What Constitutes.—The following instrument was held to be a deed conveying a title, and not a mere mortgage with the power of sale: “$75.00. Georgia, Brooks County. On or by October 1st, after date, I promise to pay Mitchell Brice, or bearer, seventy-five dollars, with interest from maturity at 8 per cent. per annum, and reasonable charges, not less than ten per cent., for attorneys’ fees, if any are incurred in the collection hereof, hereby waiving and expressly renouncing all homestead and exemption rights, for value received. And to secure the payment of said indebtedness I hereby bargain, sell, and convey to the payee of this note, his heirs and assigns, the following property, which is expressly declared to be my individual property, free from any lien whatever, to wit: (Description of the land.) And, in case of failure to pay said indebtedness at the maturity thereof, the payee of this note, his agent, attorney, heirs or assigns, are hereby irrevocably authorized and empowered to seize and take possession of said property, and to sell the same for cash at public outcry at the justice court grounds of the Tallokas district, after having advertised said property at said court grounds for ten days by written or printed notice, and apply the proceeds of said sale to the payment of said indebtedness, and all costs of said sale, including ten per cent. additional for further attorneys’ fees, and the balance, if any, to be subject to my order. And the payee of said note, his agent, attorney, heirs and assigns, are fully authorized to bid at said sale, and to make a fee-simple title to said property to the purchaser or purchasers.” Brice v. Lane, 90 Ga. 294.

2. Early Opinions.—In 1825, Lord

Eldon is reported to have expressed himself as strongly opposed to conferring a power of sale upon the mortgagee; but he reluctantly added that it would be “too much to say that if the one party has so much confidence in the other as to accede to such an arrangement, this court is for that reason to impeach the transaction.” Roberts v. Bozon, Chanc. (Feb. 1825) MS., cited in Coventry’s Prac. Mortg., p. 150; 1 Powell on Mortg. (Am. ed.) 9 a, note; 2 Jones on Mortg. (4th ed.) 1765.

“Powers of the character under consideration were at first seriously doubted, and by Lord Eldon and others strenuously opposed, as tending to destroy the value of the equity of redemption; as putting the debtor in the power of the creditor, who was thus enabled harshly to take advantage of his necessities; and as investing the mortgagee, where the power was confided to him, with the character of a trustee, in a case where he is not free to act for the exclusive benefit of his cestui que trust, for he is, first, a trustee for himself, and second, as to the residue, for the mortgagor.” Judge Dillon in 2 Am. Law Reg. 644.

Croft v. Powell, 2 Comyn. 603, is one of the earliest cases involving the consideration of a power of sale given as the security for a debt, and while the validity of the power was not directly passed upon in that case, it met with a very unfavorable reception by the judges. Coote, Mortg. 129, referring to this case, says it “was considered as raising considerable ground for doubt, but, so far from it, it will, on consideration, seem to be rather an authority in favor of these powers.”

An early text writer (Powell on Mortg. 19) considered the validity of powers of sale “of too doubtful a complexion to be relied on as the source of an irredeemable title.”

In 1813, Kent, C. J., in 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 196, declared powers of sale “not

But, notwithstanding the unfriendly reception with which these powers at first met, it was long ago finally settled, and may now be regarded as the accepted doctrine generally, that the mortgagor is competent to confer an absolute power of sale upon the mortgagee, exercisable in pais, and with the exercise of which, courts of equity will not interfere, provided the mortgagee acts fairly, and in compliance with its terms;¹ although the foreclosure of mortgages, except by judicial proceedings, is forbidden by to be in use in Great Britain." But a few years later, in his commentaries, he says that they are found in England to be so convenient as to become of quite frequent use. 4 Kent's Com. 146.

It was held in the early case of Taylor v. Chowning, 3 Leigh (Va.) 654, that the characters of mortgagee and donee of a power to sell were incompatible, and a sale by a mortgagee voidable unless the mortgagor acquiesced in it.

In Chowning v. Cox, 1 Rand. (Va.) 306, doubt was cast upon the validity of a mortgagee's power of sale; but the force of this decision was weakened by the criticisms of the judges in Floyd v. Harrison, 2 Rob. (Va.) 161.

In an early case in Mississippi, the position seems to have been taken that a power of sale conferred upon the mortgagee, could not be executed without the interposition of a court of equity. Ford v. Russell, 1 Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 42. But see Sims v. Hundly, 2 How. (Miss.) 896.

In the case of Longwith v. Butler, 8 Ill. 32, the court, per Koerner, J., said: "The first question presented by this record, as to the mortgagee's right to sell under a power of sale, without the aid of a court of chancery, is one of considerable importance, and about which much diversity of opinion prevails amongst the profession of our state. For this reason it becomes necessary to examine it with care, and to give it due deliberation. At common law, a mortgage vested the legal title in the mortgagee, liable to be defeated upon performance of the condition. After default, the legal estate became absolute. There is no question that, by the consent of both the mortgagor and mortgagee, the harshness of this rule might be mitigated. The parties were at liberty to prevent the absolute forfeiture, by stipulating that the mortgagee, after default, might sell, so as to evolve the real value of the land and have the debt satisfied, and no more. Such a power was a common-law power, an appointment, and, considering the legal estate all the time in the mortgagee, it may be called a power appendant, or annexed to the estate. It seems clear, then, that the power in question would have been a valid one at common law."

In Webb v. Lewis, 45 Minn. 285, a mortgage with the power of sale was given after the repeal of the statute authorizing a foreclosure by an advertisement and sale. Subsequently, but before default in the mortgage, a new statute was enacted, substantially the same as the repealed act, but with additional regulations as to procedure, and providing that it should apply to all mortgages executed previous to its passage. Thereafter, the mortgage in question was foreclosed under the power of sale, all the requirements of the new act being complied with. In an action by the mortgagor's grantee to recover possession, it was contended that the power of sale could not be sustained in the absence of a statute; and that the new act was unconstitutional in its retrospective application. In sustaining the sale, the supreme court, per Mitchell, J., said: "Powers of sale are not the creatures of statute, but of the convention of the parties. Statutes merely regulate the manner of their execution. A party may grant a valid power of this kind in the absence of any statute either authorizing its creation or regulating its exercise. The act of 1877, though repealing most of the statutory provisions on the subject, neither prohibited the creation of such powers nor affected the common-law power of parties to make such contracts on such terms as they saw fit. The power in this mortgage is one to sell at public auction. It is true it adds 'agreeably to the statute in such cases made and provided,' that is, the sale shall be conducted in conformity to the provisions of statute, if any, regulating the subject. . . . But if there was in fact no statute at all regulating the matter, the power is nevertheless complete in itself, and capable of being executed without the aid of any statute. A sale at public auction implies a sale in a public place, after reasonable notice of the time and place of sale, so as to secure the presence of bidders and the best possible price for the property. A power in a mortgage to the mortgagee to sell, is in the nature of a trust, and imposes on him, by implication, the duty to execute it in good faith, and to exercise all reasonable diligence to obtain the best price, and doubtless the usual practice in making sales of real property on judicial process, or under powers of sale, would, in the absence of any statute or provision in the mortgage regulating the subject, furnish the test and standard of the mortgagee's duty in the matter of making the sale. These powers are always subject to the control of the courts, if attempted to be exercised in a manner oppressive to the mortgagor. . . . We are therefore of opinion that the power contained in this mortgage was, at the time of its creation, a valid common-law power, capable of being executed even in the absence of any statute regulating the manner of its exercise." The court also held that, as the new act merely required additional things to be done in making the sale, which could in no manner prejudice the mortgagor, and regulated the procedure, it was not objectionable as being retrospective, nor did it impair the obligation of the contract.

In Butterfield v. Farnham, 19 Minn. 85, the question was presented, whether a sale under a power in a mortgage was valid, if made conformable to all the requirements of the statute relating to such foreclosure, but in disregard of certain additional requirements contained in the power, to the effect that the mortgagee, in the case of default, should enter on the premises and make a sale, and render to the mortgagor a true and particular account of the sale and expenses. The statute in question provided that every mortgage containing a power of sale might be foreclosed by an advertisement and sale in the county where the land was situated, upon giving a certain prescribed notice. The court, per Ripley, C. J., after referring to the statute, said: "This, in terms, extends to, and includes, all mortgages and all powers of sale whatsoever in any mortgage contained. It is the plainest possible statement that any such mortgage may be foreclosed in the cases mentioned by taking the steps prescribed. It is not disputed that this was within the power of the legislature. It is unnecessary to consider whether or not the statute is imperative; whether, for instance, if the parties contracted for a different mode than that in the statute provided for, a foreclosure conducted according to the contract would or would not be valid. . . . Here no such question arises. The method prescribed by the statute has been followed. Why, then, is not this mortgage foreclosed? Because, says the appellant, the contract required something more. But if the legislature, having the right to say so, has said what shall in every case be sufficient to constitute a valid foreclosure, individuals certainly can have no right to say that a particular foreclosure should be invalid, unless something else was done in addition. There is no difference in principle between a power of sale which requires the mortgagee to take the statutory steps and some additional step, and one which requires him to pursue a course altogether different from that which the statute prescribes. The contract in each case, if it were to be held obligatory upon the party, would amount to a repeal of the statute by individual authority; for it is, in each case, that which the law has said shall be a valid foreclosure, shall not have that effect, but that something else shall. With respect to the first and last matters of objection above mentioned (as to entry by mortgagee, and as to rendering an account of the sale), no question would be made but the power of the sale required more than the statute. With respect to the first, it may also be remarked that the decisions from Massachusetts, cited by the appellant, are inapplicable in the absence there of such a statute as ours. With respect to the requirement, in the power mentioned in the second objection, however (that the sale should be on the premises), it may not at first sight be so obvious that it is a requirement in addition to those of the statute. This will appear to be so, however, upon a little reflection. The statutory requirement is only that it must be in the county, and section 1 declares that a mortgage may be thus foreclosed, i. e., by a public sale made in the county. When it appears, then, that such a sale has been held in the county, the statute is satisfied and the mortgage has been foreclosed in the manner specified. A stipulation that the sale shall take place at a particular place in the county, is a stipulation for more than the law requires. Within the limits of the county, the statute leaves the place of sale, as it leaves the hour of the day (within certain limits), to the mortgagee's option."

The trouble with the above decision is that it attaches undue importance to a statute which was clearly never intended to deprive the mortgagor of the right to impose additional safeguards and restrictions upon the mortgagee's exercise of a power of sale. The statute, solely for the protection of the mortgagor and with a view to proper publicity, lays down a course of procedure which must be observed; but it nowhere says, either expressly or by reasonable implication, that the mortgagor may not in his contract insist upon still further protection and publicity. The court seems to overlook the fact that a power of sale is not a creature of statute, but of contract, and that so long as the parties are competent to create the power, they must be also competent to regulate the manner of its exercise by whatever stipulations they may adopt that are not in violation of the protecting provisions of statute. The logical conclusion from the reasoning of the court in this case would be that the power of sale was a nullity, and could not be exercised at all. The provisions adopted by the parties in respect to the manner of a sale are inseparably connected with the power itself, and if the former cannot stand, the latter must fall with them. This result, however, does not seem to have been urged upon the consideration of the court. See Webb v. Haeffer, 53 Md. 187.

In Pierce v. Grimley, 77 Mich. 273, the court, by Campbell, J., speaking of statutory provisions regulating the exercise of powers of sale, said: "Parties may add to these conditions, but cannot dispense with them."

Louisiana.—A deed of trust, executed in another state, on property in Louisiana, to secure the payment of a debt, is entitled under the jurisprudence of that state, to the legal effect of a conventional mortgage. Watson v. James, 15 La. Ann. 386; Frelson v. Tiner, 6 La. Ann. 18; Tillman v. Drake, 4 La. Ann. 16; Pickett v. Foster, 36 Fed. Rep. 514.

In Missouri, a mortgage with a power of sale in the mortgagee, or agent to be appointed for that purpose, is valid, though a county is the mortgagee, and the form of the mortgage is entirely different from the form prescribed by statute to be used in mortgages for the benefit of counties. Mann v. Best, 62 Mo. 491.

Early New York Statute.—The earliest statutory recognition of power of sale mortgages in this country is found in the New York Act of March 19th, 1774, which is to the effect that the rights of bona fide purchasers at sales under such powers, shall not be disturbed, nor made subject to any right of redemption.

New Hampshire.—In Bell v. Twilight, 22 N. H. 500, the court said: "It may admit of doubt whether such powers to sell, granted in mortgages, are valid under our statutes, which define and fix the right of redemption, and provide easy and prompt methods of foreclosure."

But in the recent case of Very v. Russell, 65 N. H. 646, the validity of such powers was fully sustained, by Foster, J.: "The validity of such powers is very generally, if not universally, recognized and declared by the text writers on both sides of the Atlantic, who adduce abundant authorities in support of their propositions. The doctrine seems to rest upon a principle no less broad and fundamental than the right of parties to make for themselves such legal contracts as they choose." After referring to the doubt expressed in Bell v. Twilight, 22 N. H. 500, the court observed: "But we are unable to see upon what ground, in the absence of legislative prohibition, the court can put a restriction upon the freedom of the citizen to contract for the sale of his land upon the terms and in a mode stipulated in a mortgage, any more than upon his liberty to contract for its sale in any other way, or by stipulations contained in any other instrument. The validity of such a power has been very generally affirmed in the other states of the Union. It is recognized in every other New England state, although in no one of them is it declared by express statute. . . . Doubtless the power ought not to be recognized in any case unless it is conveyed by an express grant, and in clear and explicit language; and its execution should be jealously watched and declared void for the slightest unfairness or excess, or for anything that prevents competition. But the legal power of the parties to make such a contract must, we think, be upheld; and when, in carrying it out, the above essential conditions are fairly fulfilled, the sale must be held to divest the mortgagor of all his rights in the premises."

The Nevada Practice Act, § 246, declaring that there shall be but one action for the enforcement of a right secured by mortgage, does not deprive a mortgagee of his right to foreclose by a sale under a power in his mortgage. Bryant v. Carson River Lumbering Co., 3 Nev. 313.

In North Carolina, powers of sale, though admitted to be valid, are not favored, and the conduct of the mortgagee, in executing the power, is watched with great jealousy. Mosby v. Hodge, 76 N. Car. 387; Kornegay v. Spicer, 76 N. Car. 95.

Montana.—A recent and exhaustive examination of the history of the power of sale mortgages will be found in the opinion of McConnell, C. J., in the case of First Nat. Bank v. Bell Silver, etc., Min. Co., 7 Mont. 32, which holds that a power of sale given to the mortgagee is not void as against public policy; also that the Montana Statute, declaring that "a mortgage of realty shall not be deemed a conveyance, whatever its terms, so as to enable the owner of the mortgage to recover possession of the land without foreclosure and sale"—does not prohibit a power of sale mortgage. The word "foreclosure," as used in the act, does not mean exclusively a judicial proceeding. An advertisement and sale under the power is also a foreclosure, within the intendment of the statute.

The Montana Statute was copied from the California Practice Act of 1851, 260. In the case of Fogarty v. Sawyer, 17 Cal. 589, which was an action of ejectment, wherein the defendant relied for title upon a deed executed under a power of sale in a mortgage, the court, after quoting the section in question, said: "Under this section the mortgage creates a mere lien for the purpose of security, and, as in other cases of lien upon real property, can only be enforced by judicial proceedings, except by the authority of the owners of the property. By virtue of the mortgage alone, the mortgagee can neither acquire the possession nor dispose of the premises. But the existence of the mortgage does not prevent the owner from making an independent contract for the possession, or from authorizing a sale of the premises, the mortgagee consenting thereto, to pay off the debt. Nor is it perceived that there is any legal obstacle to making such contract with the mortgagee, or to clothing him with power of sale. If the owner of the property sees fit to enter into such an agreement with him, or to confer such power upon him, it would be going a great way for the court, for that reason alone, to invalidate the proceedings. The right to dispose both of the possession and estate follows necessarily from the ownership of the property, and this being so, no valid objection can be urged against incorporating the contract and power in the same instrument with the mortgage. They do not become in that way any part of the mortgage, but are as much independent of it as though contained in separate instruments. Some stress is placed by the respondent upon the use of the words 'whatever its terms' in the statute. This language is supposed to prohibit separate stipulations between the parties for the possession, and for the sale of the premises upon default. We do not thus construe the language, but, on the contrary, are clear that it was only intended to control the terms of grant, bargain and sale generally employed in mortgages. . . . We are of opinion that there is nothing in the law of mortgages in this state which prevents the mortgagor from investing the mortgagee with a power to sell the premises upon default in the payment of the debt secured, and when the sale is conducted in accordance with the conditions of power, and is fairly made, a good title will pass to the purchaser upon its consummation by a conveyance."

statute in several of the states,¹ and in one state it seems that the

In Rhode Island, it is held that there is nothing in the statute relating to procedure in foreclosure, which can be construed to prohibit parties from contracting independently of the statute; and that a power of sale given to the mortgagee is valid. Richmond v. Hughes, 9 R. I. 228.

South Carolina.—In the recent case of Johnson v. Johnson, 27 S. Car. 309, the court said: "It has always seemed to us a somewhat anomalous doctrine that a mortgagor of real estate may include in the mortgage a power of the creditor himself to sell the mortgaged premises without any order of foreclosure in a regular proceeding; such power being entirely ex parte, and carrying, as claimed, not only the right to ascertain the amount due on the mortgage debt, but to judge of the necessity for a sale, its time, place, terms, etc., and to execute title to the premises so sold. This anomaly is more striking in those states, as in South Carolina, where it is expressly provided by statute that a mortgage of real estate is a mere security, and, even after condition broken, the legal title remains in the mortgagor or his heirs. We incline to think that experience in the administration of the law has shown that this effort, by a summary proceeding, to avoid litigation and expense, has really increased both, and demonstrated the wisdom of Lord Eldon when he said: 'How can it be right that such a clause shall be inserted in a deed under which a party is trustee for himself?' . . . While, however, the court will not now set aside a power authorizing the creditor, who is the interested party, to sell lands mortgaged, for the reason that it is the contract of the parties themselves, yet all the authorities agree that as such power may be so easily used for purposes of oppression, the courts should scrutinize sales made under them, very closely." The court held that a power of sale in the mortgage was not a power coupled with an interest, and was revoked by the death of the mortgagor.

In Maryland, powers of sale in mortgages are sanctioned by statute, subject to certain restrictions, as that power cannot be given to a mortgagee to sell mortgaged premises outside of the county in which they are situated. Webb v. Haeffer, 53 Md. 187.

The right of a mortgagee under his power of sale may be defeated by the appointment of a trustee in insolvency. Mackubin v. Boarman, 54 Md. 385. Not, however, when the mortgagee is a citizen of another state. Ensor v. Lewis, 54 Md. 397.

In Georgia, the validity of a power of sale attached to mortgages is sustained. See Robenson v. Vason, 37 Ga. 66; Calloway v. People's Bank, 54 Ga. 441.

In Michigan, the power of sale is sanctioned and the manner of its exercise prescribed by statute. See Grover v. Fox, 36 Mich. 461; Lee v. Mason, 10 Mich. 403; Hebert v. Bule, 42 Mich. 489; Doyle v. Howard, 16 Mich. 261.

In Dakota. See Dakota Code of Civ. Pro., § 597.

In Vermont, a power of sale in a mortgage is practically unknown, and the courts have refused to recognize it "in any case unless it is conveyed by an express grant and in clear and explicit terms." Wing v. Cooper, 37 Vt. 169.

1. In Iowa, there is but one method by which a mortgage may be foreclosed, that is, by equitable proceedings. Iowa Rev. Code, § 3319; Todd v. Johnson, 51 Iowa 192. Formerly, however, powers of sale were long recognized and in constant use. See Fanning v. Kerr, 7 Iowa 450; Lowe v. Grinnan, 19 Iowa 193; Crocker v. Robinson, 8 Iowa 404; Pope v. Durant, 26 Iowa 233.

In Indiana, it is expressly provided that a sale to foreclose a mortgage shall be under judicial proceedings. Rev. Sts., § 1088. But in a trust deed, the power of sale may be conferred, however, on a trustee. Eaton, etc. R. Co. v. Hunt, 20 Ind. 457.

The mortgagee is not forbidden to act as an agent for the sale where the agency is not created by the mortgage. Farly v. Eller, 29 Ind. 322.

In Oregon, it is provided by statute that all mortgages "shall be foreclosed, and the property adjudged to be sold to satisfy the debt secured thereby, by suit." Hill's Code, 414. The court holds that this statute prohibits the exercise of a power of sale exercise of the power of sale is prohibited, although there is no statute expressly so providing.¹

The validity of powers of sale in mortgages is not affected by the rule adopted in a number of the states, that the mortgagee does not take the legal title, but has a mere lien as security for the debt.²

In England, powers of sale in mortgages are now so firmly established that they exist by operation of law, even where none is conferred by the mortgage itself.³ Courts of equity will now go so far as to decree specific performance of an agreement to execute a mortgage with an immediate power of sale.⁴

In the civil law, a power of sale in a mortgagee is not only valid, but is implied, and even an express agreement, it seems, will not deprive him of it.⁵

in a trust deed. Thompson v. Marshall, 21 Oregon 171.

In Kansas, mortgages can be foreclosed by a suit only. See Samuel v. Holladay, 1 Woolw. (U. S.) 400.

Texas Homestead.—The Texas constitution and statute provide that no lien can be created upon the homestead except for purchase-money, "or for work or materials used in constructing improvements thereon," and the statute relating to the enforcement of such liens, provides that every sale must be upon a judgment foreclosing such lien and ordering the sale of the property. A deed of trust was executed by a husband and wife, upon their homestead, to secure money borrowed for the purpose of building a dwelling thereon, and which was so used. It was held that the deed could not be regarded as a lien for "work or material used," etc., and that a sale under the power passed no title. Ellerman v. Wurz (Tex. 1890), 14 S. W. Rep. 333.

A trust deed covering a homestead, executed by both the husband and the wife, given to pay off a subsisting vendor's lien, is valid and enforceable to the extent of the lien so discharged. Hensel v. International Bldg. & L. Assoc., 85 Tex. 215. See also Batts v. Scott, 37 Tex. 59; McLane v. Paschal, 47 Tex. 365.

On account of the homestead and administration laws of Texas, a recent text writer has observed that, "A mortgage or trust deed may thus become of no value, and is a security that does not secure." "No reliance should be placed upon a mortgage or deed of trust upon property in this state under its present laws." Jones Mortg. (4th ed.) 1792 and note.

In Virginia and West Virginia, trust deeds have almost entirely superseded mortgages, said Rivers, J., in Taylor v. Stearns, 18 Gratt. (Va.) 244.

1. In Nebraska, though no statute can be found expressly prohibiting the exercise of a power of sale, the supreme court seems to hold that the foreclosure must in all cases be by a bill in equity. Kyger v. Ryley, 2 Neb. 22; Webb v. Hoselton, 4 Neb. 308; Hurley v. Estes, 6 Neb. 386; Comstock v. Michael, 17 Neb. 298.

The United States court in Nebraska, follows the ruling of the state supreme court, and reluctantly holds, that a sale of land under a power of sale mortgage is invalid. Wheeler v. Sexton, 34 Fed. Rep. 154.

2. Calloway v. People's Bank, 54 Ga. 441.

3. English Statute.—By Lord Cranworth's Act, 23 and 24 Vict., Ch. 145, a power of sale is conferred upon mortgagees in all cases, even where none is given by the terms of the mortgage; but it is made a condition precedent to the exercise of such power that six months' written notice shall have first been given to the mortgagor or his assigns, or posted on the premises. The act has not proved to be of much practical value, because a special power of sale in a more expeditious manner, is almost universally inserted in mortgages. See Greenwade's Prac. of Conveyancing, p. 55; Fisher on Mortgages, p. 511; 2 Jones Mortg. (4th ed.) 1722.

III. POWER OF SALE AS INCIDENT TO POWER TO MORTGAGE.—

When the power of sale mortgage was comparatively new to the courts, the decided tendency was to hold that a mere authority to execute a mortgage did not, by implication, authorize the granting of a power of sale in connection with the mortgage.¹ More recently, however, the courts have been inclined to hold that a power of sale is such a common incident of a mortgage that authority to insert it will be implied from a power to mortgage.²

IV. FORMAL REQUISITES—1. What Constitutes a Power.—In general, any form of words, showing an intention to create a power of sale upon the happening of a contingency, or any form of instrument imposing duties upon a trustee, which cannot be fully performed without a sale, will be sufficient to create the power.³

1. In Clarke v. The Royal Panopticon, 4 Drew. 26; 27 L. J. Ch. 207, the Vice Chancellor ruled that a special power given to a trustee to mortgage did not give him authority to grant a power of sale; and that such powers had not become, in practice, a necessary incident to mortgages.

In Capron v. Attleborough Bank, 11 Gray (Mass.) 492, it was held that a stipulation "to give a mortgage" was fully complied with by executing one containing no power of sale. See also Platt v. McClure, 3 Woodb. & M. (U. S.) 151.

In Sanders v. Richards, 2 Coll. 568, it was held that an executor could not, as such, legally execute a mortgage containing a power of sale. But see the following note.

2. In Re Chawner's Will, L. R., 8 Eq. 569, Vice Chancellor Malins said: "I am of the opinion that a power of sale is a necessary incident to a mortgage, and that where a testator says that a sum of money is to be raised by mortgage, he means it to be raised in the way in which money is ordinarily raised by mortgage, and, therefore, that the mortgage may contain what mortgages in general do contain, namely, a power of sale."

So, where land was conveyed to a trustee with the power to sell or mortgage, it was held that he was authorized to give a deed of trust on the land to secure his own note given for the grantor's debt. Ore v. Rode, 101 Mo. 387.

In Wilson v. Troup, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 195; 14 Am. Dec. 458, it was held by Kent, C. J., that a power to mortgage land in New York authorized the execution of a mortgage with the customary power of sale, though it appeared that the owner of the property resided in Pennsylvania, where such powers were not common.

Upon the point that powers of sale are fairly incident to mortgages, see also Bridges v. Longman, 24 Beav. 27; Cook v. Dawson, 29 Beav. 123; Russell v. Plaice, 18 Beav. 21; Cruikshank v. Duffin, L. R., 13 Eq. 555; Vane v. Rigden, L. R., 5 Ch. 663; Wright v. Bundy, 11 Ind. 398; Bennett v. Union Bank, 5 Humph. (Tenn.) 612.

In Jones Mortg. (4th ed.) 1768, the author observes that, "It may be anticipated that when the occasion arises, the courts will hold, as have the courts in England, that a power of sale is a necessary incident to a mortgage." But the question naturally arises, why a necessary incident? Is a mortgage so incomplete without a power of sale, that the courts will ever hold a party under obligation to insert one where his agreement to mortgage was silent on the point? It may well be doubted whether any court would go so far, at least until the power of sale mortgages shall become universally and exclusively adopted.

42 Vict., ch. 20, provides that a power of sale shall be an implied power in mortgages which do not contain an express power.

3. Cherry v. Greene, 115 Ill. 594; Graeme v. Cullen, 23 Gratt. (Va.) 266; DeWolf v. Sprague Mfg. Co., 49 Conn. 282.

What Constitutes.—A conveyance, by the terms of which the purchaser is to sell the property and out of the proceeds pay an antecedent debt of the grantor, with the interests and costs of the sale, any surplus to be returned to, and any deficit to be made good by, the

The power may be conferred by an instrument separate from the mortgage;¹ it may even be contained in a deed from the creditor to the debtor, conferring upon a third person power to sell on default in payment of the purchase price;² and it may arise by necessary implication from the terms of the instrument.³

The granting clause in a trust deed, and not the power of sale, governs as to the quantity of property that the trustee may sell.⁴ A power of sale can never be regarded as an indispensable element of a mortgage, and need not be co-extensive with it.⁵

2. Consideration; Debt Secured.—As against creditors, or a purchaser of the property who has not assumed the debt, a trust deed, to secure notes given merely for love and affection is without valuable consideration and cannot be enforced.⁶

A trust deed is valid to secure future advances, to the amount specified;⁷ also to secure an attorney in the payment of a contingent fee.⁸

It is not essential to the validity of a power of sale that it correctly describes the debt intended to be secured; it is sufficient if the description, though indefinite, is capable of being made certain by parol evidence.⁹ A mere discrepancy, even though large, grantor, is, in legal effect, a power of sale mortgage. Cannon v. McNab, 48 Ala. 99.

A provision in a mortgage that, if the mortgagor "shall fail to make payment, the mortgagee shall advertise and sell enough of the estate herein conveyed to pay, etc., and the mortgagor shall direct what shall be sold," is a sufficient power of sale. Hyman v. Devereux, 63 N. Car. 624.

Form of Instrument.—The following instrument was held to be a trust deed or mortgage with the power of sale, on default, and not a mere power of attorney: "Know ye that I do hereby appoint George W. Wightman, my true and lawful attorney in fact, and I do hereby authorize and empower him to sell and dispose of my house and lot in the town of Fayetteville, where I now reside, either for cash or on credit, at his pleasure, unless I shall, on or before the first day of May, 1867, pay off and discharge all the claims for which the said George W. Wightman is now liable as my surety, or where I am indebted to him, or Sinclair and Vanderbilt, whose effects have been assigned to said Wightman in trust. And with this power of sale I do hereby convey and assign to the said George W. Wightman and his heirs, such an interest in the aforesaid house and lot as shall not be revocable by me, or by my death, before the 1st day of May, 1867, but shall be in the said Wightman as an estate in trust to pay the said debts, and to dispose of and convey to the purchaser, I hereby confirming the same." Pemberton v. Simmons, 100 N. Car. 316.

In Vermont, however, the courts refuse to recognize a power of sale unless "conferred by express grant, and in clear and explicit terms." Wing v. Cooper, 37 Vt. 169.

English Statutory Form.—By statute 25 and 26 Vict., ch. 53, the following short form of power in a mortgage is given: "C. D. shall have power to sell on default of payment of the principal or interest, or any part thereof respectively."

between the actual indebtedness and the amount for which the trust deed or mortgage purports to be security, is not per se sufficient to render the incumbrances void as to creditors; the actual intent with which it was given is to be inquired into.¹

A trust deed purporting to secure the payment of a certain note is valid, even though the note is never in fact executed, provided the indebtedness exists for which the note was to have been given.² The fact that one or more of a number of notes secured are invalid, does not destroy the power of sale as to the valid notes.³

3. Parties.—A failure to insert the name of the trustees does not invalidate the security, but resort must be had to equity for foreclosure.⁴

Summers v. Darne, 31 Gratt. (Va.) 791;
Keagy v. Trout, 85 Va. 390.

Uncertainty as to the Amount of Debts.—A trust deed recited that it was given to secure "to William H. Lake a debt due to him, . . . the amount whereof cannot now be accurately stated, but believed to be about the sum of $2,000; to Theodore M. Triplett a debt due to him by the grantor, the amount whereof cannot now be accurately stated, but the principal of which is believed to be about $2,600; to J. A. Chappelear a debt of about $648, due by bond on note, on which the said William H. Lake and Theodore M. Triplett are sureties; to Robert Bayly a debt of about $3,200, due by the grantor, on which the said William H. Lake is surety; and a debt due to Shacklett & Pfeifer for about $300, due by note and upon account." It also provided that the trustee should, "with all convenient speed, proceed to ascertain accurately the amount of said several debts." It was held that there was nothing in the deed to warrant the inference that the amount of the debts cannot be accurately ascertained within a reasonable time; nor does the fact that the exact amounts are not stated, render the deed fraudulent per se. Norris v. Lake, 89 Va. 513.

Compound Interest.—A trust deed was given to secure the payment of a bond bearing annual interest, and for several years thereafter interest notes were executed for the annual installments, bearing the same rate of interest as the bond. It was held that as between the parties, the deed was security for the interest on these interest notes, but not so as against subsequent creditors or purchasers. Barbour v. Tompkins, 31 W. Va. 410.

1. Sawyer v. Bradshaw, 125 Ill. 440. Thus, if the value of the property be less than the actual debt, other creditors are not prejudiced by the act of the parties in making the debt appear larger. Sawyer v. Bradshaw, 125 Ill. 440.

4. McQuie v. Peay, 58 Mo. 56.

An insertion of the trustee's name by the beneficiary, after delivery, without the consent of the grantors, was held to render the deed void, in Hord v. Taubman, 79 Mo. 101.

Mistake in Designating Trustee.—

The plaintiff borrowed money, for which he gave his note payable to the defendant, the lender, and to secure it, executed a trust deed upon two lots, which were conveyed in trust by mistake to the defendant as trustee, the deed reciting that it was to secure money due and payable to K. The parties were reversed in the trust deed, the property being conveyed to the creditor instead of the trustee. It was evidently the intention to convey to K. as trustee, to secure the defendant, but by its terms the conveyance was to the defendant to secure K. Default having been made, K., assuming to act as the trustee, sold the property under the power, and it was purchased by the defendant. It was held that as K. was not named as the trustee, his act in selling was that of a mere volunteer, and that the defendant took no title; hence that the plaintiff, upon tendering the amount of the debt, was entitled to have his title cleared of the cloud cast upon it by the pretended sale and conveyance. McMee v. O'Connor, 3 Colo. App. 113.

Clerical Mistake.—Where a mortgage provided that on default, the party

The omission of the beneficiary's name is not fatal to the power. As against parties having notice of the trust, the name of the actual beneficiary may be supplied by the trustee and the power enforced for his benefit.¹

Where a trust deed is duly acknowledged by the grantor, but his signature is omitted by mistake, it will be treated in equity as a valid lien, and the grantor may remedy the defect by a new deed.²

It is competent for the legislature, by a curative act, to validate previous sales under powers in mortgages wherein the donees of the power were not properly designated by name; and the fact that a suit was pending at the time of the enactment, to determine the validity of such a sale, does not exclude that case from the operation of the act.³ Nor is it essential to the validity of the power in a trust deed that either the trustee or cestui que trust should by any formal writing signify their acceptance of it.⁴

4. Acknowledgment.—As between the parties, a trust deed is valid though not acknowledged.⁵ Even though by reason of defective acknowledgment, the deed would not afford constructive notice by its record, yet it is good inter partes and as to those having actual notice of its terms.⁶ The trustee, being one of the parties to the conveyance, is disqualified from taking the acknowledgment of the grantor.⁷

5. Seal.—Though the power be conferred by an instrument not under seal, yet a sale, fairly conducted under it, passes such equitable title to the purchaser as will be upheld and enforced.⁸

6. Delivery.—An instrument containing a power of sale is of of the first part, the mortgagor, might make the sale, the court treated the instrument as though it read "party of the second part." Gaines v. Allen, 58 Mo. 537. See also Woodward v. Jewell, 140 U. S. 247.

1. Sleeper v. Iselin, 62 Iowa 583.

Description of Beneficiaries.—In a trust deed executed by the owner of a butter and cheese factory, to secure the farmers and dairymen who were supplying him with milk, the beneficiaries were described as "sundry persons or patrons," but not designated by name. It was held that the deed was not void for uncertainty; and that it was a security enforceable for the benefit of all who might become patrons of the factory. First Nat. Bank v. Schireen, 127 Ill. 573.

It has been held, however, that where a mortgage with a power of sale is not under seal, and the power has been executed by the sale, but the purchaser has refused to complete his bid because of absence of a seal, a decree pro confesso in a suit to which the mortgagor and purchaser are parties, requiring the mortgagor to affix his seal, and providing that the mortgage shall have effect as his deed from the date of its delivery, does not render the sale under the power valid; and the mortgagee may disregard it and maintain an action on the mortgage debt. Springfield Five Cents Sav. Bank v. South Congregational Soc., 127 Mass. 516.

no effect until there has been a legal delivery to the grantee.¹ In respect to trust deeds, however, a delivery to the trustee is not necessary.²

V. INTEREST OF GRANTOR IN TRUST DEED.—A deed of trust being, in substance and effect, a mortgage, it necessarily follows that the grantor in such deed, though nominally divested of the legal title, yet retains an equitable interest corresponding to his equity of redemption under a mortgage; also that in those states where such equities are made subject to execution, the grantor's interest under a trust deed may be seized and sold under execution.³ In some of the states, however, the English rule has been adopted, and the grantor's interest held not subject to seizure at law, the creditor's remedy being by proceedings in equity.⁴ The grantor's interest may be thus sold before any default in the trust debt has occurred, or the power of sale has become operative.⁵ But the purchaser at execution sale does not acquire the legal estate, and therefore cannot maintain ejectment, at least so long as the trust deed remains undischarged.⁶

In North Carolina, where the grantor's interest is recognized, and held subject to levy, it was decided that this interest could not be considered a freehold, within the meaning of an election law imposing a requirement that the voter must be "possessed of a freehold of fifty acres."⁷

Whatever may be the exact nature of the grantor's interest before sale under the power, his interest in, and right to, any surplus remaining from the proceeds of sale after satisfying liens,

(Ala.) 397, where it is stated that, "The prevalent doctrine in the states of this union is that such interests may be levied on and sold by execution at law."

In Arkansas, the grantor's interest is not subject to levy, although the statute subjects equitable estates to sale for debt. Pettit v. Johnson, 15 Ark. 55.

In Mississippi, in an early case, the court observed that, "The interest of a grantor in a deed of trust is not analogous to the interest of a mortgagor, and is not the subject of a lien or execution at law." McIntyre v. Agricultural Bank, 1 Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 105.

6. Anderson v. Hollman, 1 Jones (N. Car.) 169; Thompson v. Ford, 7 Ired. (N. Car.) 418.

7. See appendix to 5 Ired. Eq. (N. Car.). The following questions were submitted to the supreme court by the senate: "1st. Is the vote of a bargainor or grantor in a deed of trust (to a trustee to secure debts to other persons with power of sale on default) legal? 2d. Is the vote of such trustee legal? 3d. Is the vote of the cestui que trust legal?" Ruffin, C. J., speaking for the court, replied in substance: 1st. That a bargainor or mortgagor is not a freeholder, and cannot therefore vote—the execution of such an instrument destroying his freehold estate. 2d. The same as to the beneficiary, because he has neither a legal nor equitable right to the land, but only a right to have his debt satisfied out of it. 3d. That a mortgagee or trustee may vote if actu-is universally admitted, just as in cases of foreclosure of mortgages.¹

VI. POWER IS COUPLED WITH AN INTEREST, AND IRREVOCABLE.—

Under the common-law doctrine that a mortgage vests the legal title in the mortgagee, a power of sale conferred upon him as such, is a power coupled with an interest in the land to which it relates, and therefore irrevocable by any act or change of circumstances on the part of the mortgagor; and, upon principle, the power is equally coupled with an interest in the land, though possibly not in the strictly technical sense of the term, under the equitable doctrine that the mortgagee has merely a lien to secure his debt. The correct principle would seem to be, that, whether the mortgagee's interest be considered as in the land itself or only in the proceeds, the power is essentially coupled with an interest, and not a mere naked power, subject to revocation. It is accordingly held by most authorities that the death of the mortgagor does not revoke or suspend the power, or require the mortgagee to wait for the appointment of an administrator.² And the lunacy of the mortgagor, pending publication of the notice of sale, ally in possession for the requisite period, but not otherwise.

1. See infra, this title, Surplus Proceeds.

2. Power Irrevocable.—Hunt v. Rousmaniere, 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 174; Strother v. Law, 54 Ill. 413; Brewer v. Winchester, 2 Allen (Mass.) 389; Varnum v. Meserve, 8 Allen (Mass.) 158; Cranston v. Crane, 97 Mass. 459; Conners v. Holland, 113 Mass. 50; Wiswall v. Roos, 4 Port. (Ala.) 328; Hyde v. Warren, 46 Miss. 13; Collins v. Hopkins, 7 Iowa 463; Hodges v. Gill, 9 Baxt. (Tenn.) 378; Beatie v. Butler, 21 Mo. 313; De Jarnette v. De Giverville, 56 Mo. 440; White v. Stephens, 77 Mo. 452; Bell v. Twilight, 22 N. H. 500; Bradley v. Chester Valley R. Co., 36 Pa. St. 141; Berry v. Skinner, 30 Md. 567; Corder v. Morgan, 18 Ves. 344.

The power is annexed or appendant to the estate conveyed by the mortgage, and is coupled with an interest. Pickett v. Jones, 63 Mo. 105; McGuire v. Van Pelt, 55 Ala. 344; Varnum v. Meserve, 8 Allen (Mass.) 158; Wilbum v. Spafford, 4 Sneed (Tenn.) 608; Hannah v. Carrington, 18 Ark. 104; Hill on Trustees, 88, 338, note.

A leading case on the question, whether a power of sale given to a mortgagee is revocable by the mortgagor, is Bergen v. Bennett, 1 Cal. Cas. (N. Y.) 15; 2 Am. Dec. 281, in which the opinion of the court was rendered by Kent, J., who said: "It is admitted that a naked authority expires with the life of the person who gave it; but a power coupled with an interest is not revoked by the death of the grantor. In my opinion, the power contained in this mortgage is of the latter description. A power simply collateral and without interest, or a naked power, is when, to a mere stranger, authority is given to dispose of an interest in which he had not before, nor hath by the instrument creating the power, any estate whatsoever. But when power is given to the person who derives, under the instrument creating the power, or otherwise, a present or future interest in the land, it is then a power relating to the land. These last powers are subdivided into powers annexed to the estate, and powers in gross. Both are considered as powers with an interest, because the trustee of the power has an interest in the estate, as well as in the exercise of the power. If, as one of the old cases expresses it, the person clothed with the power hath at the same time an estate in the land, the power is not collateral, because it savors of the land. The power now in question answers exactly to this definition of a power with an interest, because the mortgagee has at the same time a vested estate in the land, and it does not answer at all to the definition of a power simply collateral; for that is but a bare authority to a stranger, who has not, nor never had, any estate whatever. I does not suspend the power;¹ nor does the institution of bankruptcy or insolvency proceedings against him.² Where the mortgagor voluntarily goes within the enemy's lines, with the intention of casting his lot with the enemy, the power is neither revoked nor suspended.³ And where the power of sale in a deed of trust is conferred upon the trustee and not upon the creditor, it is held by most courts to be coupled with an interest, and cannot be revoked, the trustee being vested with the legal estate.⁴

In a few of the states, however, the doctrine prevails that, as the mortgagee has no estate in the land, a power of sale to him is might, perhaps, rest satisfied with giving this description of the two powers, drawn from approved authority; but I think the point is susceptible of more precise and definite illustration. If a man, by his will, directs his executors to sell his land, this is but a bare authority without interest, for the land, in the meantime, descends to the heir at law, who, until the sale, would at common law be entitled to the profits; and, being but a naked authority, if one executor dies, the power at common law would not survive. But if a man devises his land to his executors, to be sold, then there is a power coupled with an interest; for the executors, in the meantime, take possession of the land and of the profits. In this case, as the estate, so also the trust, would survive to the surviving executor. There is a very striking analogy between this case, of a devise of land to executors to be sold, and a mortgage of land with a power to sell. In both cases the estate passes to the person clothed with the power, and in both cases the power is given in trust, to answer a specific purpose. I cannot discern any distinction between the cases, sufficient to render the power in the one instance naked, and in the other coupled with an interest. It is not a power with interest in the executors, because they may derive a personal benefit from the devise; for a trust will survive, though no ways beneficial to the trustee. It is the possession of the legal estate, or a right in the subject, over which the power is to be exercised, that makes the interest in question; and where an executor, guardian, or other trustee, is invested with the rents and profits of land for the sale or use of another, it is still an authority coupled with an interest and survives. . . . I conclude, therefore, that the power to sell was not revoked by the death of the mortgagor, and that the decree cannot be supported on the ground that was taken in the court below." This case has been extensively cited and approved by the courts. Olcott v. Tioga R. Co., 27 N. Y. 566; Franklin v. Osgood, 14 Johns. (N. Under a trust deed empowering the sheriff of the county to sell in case of the death or disability of the trustee, the sheriff may exercise the power, when the necessity arises, even though the grantor is dead. White v. Stephens, 77 Mo. 452.

In West Virginia, the court will not necessarily enjoin the execution of a power of sale by the trustee, after the not coupled with an interest, and therefore does not survive the death of the mortgagor or grantor in a trust deed.¹ It is said to be a "collateral" power, and one which the mortgagor himself cannot revoke during his lifetime.²

In Illinois, it has been provided by statute that the death of the grantor or owner of the equity of redemption, under a mortgage or trust deed, terminates the power of sale, and thereafter foreclosure must be had by action.³

A mere power of attorney from a debtor to his creditor, authorizing the latter to sell and convey the property, satisfy his claim out of the proceeds, and account for the balance, is only a naked power, and subject to revocation.⁴

The right of foreclosure under a power of sale, pursuant to the statute in force at the time of its execution, is a vested right which cannot be taken away by subsequent legislation.⁵

VII. THE TRUSTEE ; HIS DUTIES AND LIABILITIES.—The equitable

death of the grantor. The length of time that has elapsed since his death, and the amount of personal estate in the hands of his representatives, applicable to payment of the debt, will be taken into consideration. Spencer v. Lee, 19 W. Va. 179.

In Robertson v. Paul, 16 Tex. 472, the principle that the power is not revoked by death, was recognized by the court, but it was considered that its exercise was inconsistent with the statute requiring "claims for money" against the estates of decedents to be proved and allowed, before the administrator could lawfully pay them.

In Johnson v. Johnson, 27 S. Car. 309, it is held that a power of sale does not survive the death of the mortgagor, the decision being based on the ground that the legal title does not pass to the mortgagee, whose only interest is in the proceeds of the sale, and not in the property itself. In the course of the opinion the court, per McGowan, J., made the following criticism: "We are aware that Mr. Jones (vol. 2, Mortg., § 1794) has expressed the opinion that 'the rule is the same in those states where, by statute or adjudication, a mortgage is regarded as a mere security for the debt, passing no title or estate to the mortgagee; the power of sale is coupled with an interest, and is irrevocable, just the same as it is where the common-law doctrine, that the mortgage conveys the legal estate still prevails,' and cites as authority for the proposition Calloway v. Bank, 54 Ga. 441. But as the learned author in the same book repeatedly declares that the deed of the sale under the power, should be made by the holder of the legal title, we must suppose that he failed to note clearly the great difference as to title between a common-law mortgage, and one executed under a statute such as that in this state." The language criticised above, was omitted by Mr. Jones, in the last edition of his work on mortgages.

2. The case of Lockett v. Hill, 1 Woods (U. S.) 552, was decided by the circuit court in Georgia, where the equitable theory of mortgages prevails.

Cannot Be Changed Without Consent.—A trust mortgage on railroad property was given to secure bonds equally. The trustee, without foreclosure and without the consent of the plaintiff, one of the secured bondholders, entered into a "reorganization" scheme, by which three mortgages, one covering debts other than the mortgage bonds, and the others being inferior securities, were to be substituted for the trust mortgage, and new bonds issued. It was held that such arrangement was void as to the plaintiff. Hollister v. Stewart, 111 N. Y. 644.

principles which govern the conduct and fix the responsibility of trustees generally, apply with full force to trustees with power to sell for the payment of debts. Such a trustee necessarily occupies a position of great trust and confidence between the parties and it is a requirement of the first importance that he shall be unprejudiced and unbiased in favor of either party. He should not be personally interested in the debt secured, nor closely related to either of the parties.¹ If a state of personal ill-will exists between the trustee and the beneficiary, this furnishes ground for his removal by a court of equity.²

It will be presumed that the trustee is not personally interested in the debt; and when the trustee claims to own it, this presumption must be overcome by satisfactory evidence.³ The fact that the person named as trustee is the real owner of the debt secured does not, however, invalidate the power of sale; because the effect of such ownership is merely to render his position that of a mortgagee with power of sale.⁴ The trustee's position is that of agent for the grantor and his privies in estate, as well as for the cestui que trust, and in carrying out his trust, he must avoid all partiality toward either side.⁵

All directions contained in a power, in respect to the manner of executing it, must be strictly and fairly complied with.⁶

But the mere fact that the trustee, in a deed to secure the purchase price of the land, had acted as attorney in fact for the vendor, in connection with the sale thereof to the trust deed grantor, does not render him incompetent to act as trustee. Sternberg v. Valentine, 6 Mo. App. 176.

"The mortgagor is apt to suppose that, in placing the exercise of the power in the hands of a disinterested third party, whose position in relation to it is merely that of a trustee, he secures for himself the protection of fair dealing. It generally happens, however, that the debtor has to pay for the services of the trustee, whose disinterestedness is no more than that of the creditor himself. The trustee is obliged to act, when the creditor, secured by the deed, has a legal right to call for the exercise of the power, and if he neglects or refuses to act, he may be compelled to do so or to give up the trust." Jones Mortg. (4th ed.) 1770.

Fraudulent Release by Trustee.—The trustee in a trust deed, to whom had been intrusted for collection, the note secured and indorsed in blank, fraudulently pledged it before maturity to B., to secure a personal debt. Subsequently, he obtained the record title, and recorded a release of the trust deed, executed by himself as trustee, and upon the strength of his apparently clear title, he borrowed money secured upon the property. It was held that, as between B. and the other lienors, B. had the better equity, and that the acts of the trustee, after he had obtained the title, could not be regarded as those of a trustee. Smith v. Perkins, 8 Biss. (U. S.) 73.

2. McPherson v. Cox, 96 U. S. 404. Hostility between the trustee and cestui que trust, while of itself not always a sufficient ground of removal, becomes sufficient, where it appears that the trustee's action is probably controlled, or might be controlled, by it. *Gartside v. Mere notice given to the trustee, at the time of his sale, that his trust deed was executed with intent to defraud, does not make it the trustee's duty to abandon the sale, and leave the parties to determine their rights in equity.¹

For an abuse of his powers, or a neglect to exercise proper diligence, the trustee is personally liable in damages to the party injured;² but he is not liable to any one for mere errors in judgment, where he has not been influenced by passion, prejudice, or corrupt motives.³

The rule of caveat emptor cannot be invoked to relieve the trustee from liability for deceit practised upon the purchaser at his sale.⁴

If a sheriff, or other person authorized by statute, acts in place of the trustee in making the sale, he and the sureties on his official bond are liable for his misconduct.⁵

A mortgagee with power of sale is commonly spoken of by the courts as a "trustee" in respect to his duties in the execution of the power. He is not, however, in any proper sense a trustee, because he stands at all times in the position of a creditor whose interests are adverse to the mortgagor; and when he executes the power, he does so solely for his own benefit, and not in a fiduciary capacity. The courts seem to have applied the term "trustee" to him, as being the most convenient word for expressing his admitted obligation to act as a prudent, careful business man would act, in exercising the power, and to refrain from using his privilege in a manner to defeat the rights of others. While he is not in the position of an ordinary trustee, yet it is always incumbent on him to exercise good faith, and to use reasonable diligence to protect the rights of the mortgagor.⁶

But, as said in Waller v. Arnold, 71 Ill. 350, such strictness and literal compliance should not be exacted as will destroy the power. VIII. RIGHT OF ENTRY AND POSSESSION; RENTS AND PROFITS.—A trust deed giving the trustee power to convey the property to the creditor, upon default in payment of the debt, does not entitle the latter to possession without foreclosure and sale.¹

As a general rule, the grantor in a trust deed is entitled to the rents and profits until foreclosure, in the absence of a different stipulation in the deed.² But after a decree has been entered directing sale, the beneficiary is entitled to a receiver for the rents and profits pending the further proceedings.³

The trustee, after default, but without entry by, or attornment to him, cannot enforce the payment of rent from a tenant not a party to the deed.⁴ Nor can he maintain ejectment in order to apply the rents and profits in discharge of the debt, until he has see Richmond v. Evans, 8 Grant's Ch. (Ont.) 508.

In Matthie v. Edwards, 2 Coll. 480, Knight Bruce, V. C., said: "The mortgagee having a power of sale, cannot, as between himself and the mortgagor, exercise it in a manner merely arbitrary, but is, as between them, bound to exercise some discretion, not to throw away the property, but to act in a prudent and business-like manner, with a view to obtaining as large a price as may fairly and reasonably, with due diligence and attention, be, under the circumstances, obtainable."

He should use every effort which a prudent proprietor would use, to have the sale conducted under circumstances of the greatest advantage. Richmond v. Evans, 8 Grant's Ch. (Ont.) 508; Latch v. Furlong, 12 Grant's Ch. (Ont.) 303. The fact that he has not sought a higher offer from one or two persons professing to purchase by private contract, before closing with a rival bidder, is not a ground for setting aside, or canceling the contract. Davey v. Durrant, 1 DeG. & J. 535.

2. Liability for Rents.—Easley v. Tarkington, 5 Baxt. (Tenn.) 592. A trust deed, after the granting clause, contained the words, "together with the net income realized from said property as the rents thereof." There was no express provision for taking possession on default in payment of interest; and no demand was ever made by the trustee, or the beneficiary, for the rents, or for an accounting. It was held that a purchaser, in possession through a sale under a second trust deed, could not be charged by the first trustee for the rents accruing while he was thus in possession, and prior to any attempt by the trustee to take possession upon default. In re Life Assoc. of America, 96 Mo. 632.

Railroad Mortgage.—In Gilman v. Illinois, etc., Tel. Co., 91 U. S. 603, a railroad company, to secure its bonds, executed to trustees two mortgages conveying its road and other property, "together with the tolls, rents, and profits." The court, after speaking of the general rule, that until a mortgagee takes possession, the mortgagor is entitled to all the profits, said: "It is clearly implied in these mortgages that the railroad company should hold possession and receive the earnings until the mortgagee should take possession, or the proper judicial authority should interpose. Possession draws after it the right to receive and apply the income. . . . In this condition of things, the whole fund belonged to the company, and was subject to its control. It was, therefore, liable to creditors of the company as if the mortgages did not exist. They in no wise affected it. If the mortgagees were not satisfied, they had the remedy in their own hands, and could at any moment invoke the aid of the law, or interpose themselves without it. But they did neither." See also Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Cowdrey, 11 Wall. (U. S.) 482; White v. Wear, 4 Mo. App. 341; American Bridge Co. v. Heidelberg, 94 U. S. 798.

complied with all the provisions of the trust deed in respect to first exhausting other assets of the grantor.¹

A power to a trustee in a mortgage to sell upon request of the mortgagee, does not necessarily imply a right to enter upon the premises for that purpose.²

If necessary for the purposes of the trust, the trustee may, even after the power has been executed, sue for damages done to the estate before the sale. And it seems that the cestui que trust may also sue.³

The trustee in a trust deed covering personal property, has the legal title after default, which continues even after a sale by him and before actual delivery to the purchaser; and he can maintain replevin or trover.⁴

IX. THE POWER IS A CUMULATIVE REMEDY.—While the constantly increasing use of powers of sale in mortgages has relieved courts of equity from much labor, they have refused to be ousted of their long-established jurisdiction by the existence of the new remedy; and the doctrine unanimously prevails that the insertion of a power of sale in a mortgage, merely gives to the mortgagee an additional, or cumulative remedy, which, if he desires, he may disregard, and maintain a suit for foreclosure in the usual way.⁵

Trustee's Right of Entry.—A trust deed to secure certain bonds was conditioned to be void upon payment of the principal and interest thereof; it was also provided that upon default, the trustees might enter and manage the estate, consisting of unimproved city property, "so long as said default shall continue," and with power to dispose of it for the best interests of all parties; and that, after payment of the bonds, the trustees "shall restore the residue thereof, and all lands, securities and other property, after such payment, to the party of the first part." There was no provision fixing a time for redemption. It was held, that an entry by the trustee would not work a forfeiture by lapse of time, and that the deed by its own terms precluded a strict foreclosure. Shepard v. Richardson, 145 Mass. 32. If the power be so defective that it cannot be executed, the validity of the mortgage is not thereby affected. Foreclosure can still be had in equity.¹ In this respect there is no distinction made between trust deeds and power of sale mortgages. The cestui que trust is entitled to have the deed foreclosed in equity—a method of proceeding which frequently becomes preferable to a sale by the trustee;² for instance, the trustee may decline to act, in which case any party interested may bring suit to foreclose.³

The trustee may and should, upon his own motion, apply to a court of equity to remove impediments to a fair execution of the trust, to remove any cloud that may be hanging over the title, and to adjust accounts, if necessary, in order to ascertain the amount which ought to be raised by the sale, or the amount of prior incumbrances. And if he fails to do this in a proper case, any party interested, whether he be the creditor secured by the Foreclosure in Equity.—When the power does not authorize the mortgagee to purchase at a sale under it, and the mortgagor is insolvent, and a dispute exists as to the validity of the mortgage, by reason of which no sale under the power could be made for a fairly adequate price, a proper case is presented for foreclosure in equity, and for the application of the rents and profits to the payment of the mortgage debt. American, etc., Mortg. Co. v. McCall, 96 Ala. 200.

A foreclosure by advertisement of one of two mortgages of even date, and intended to be simultaneous, is not effectual to determine the rights of a purchaser under such foreclosure as against the holder of the other mortgage; hence a bill in equity is proper to determine the respective rights, and to obtain a sale of the property. Van Aken v. Gleason, 34 Mich. 478.

The creditor, for whose benefit a number of trust deeds to several trustees have been given, may maintain one suit to foreclose them all, particularly where some are defective as to the power of sale. Nor does the fact that other persons claim liens on the land, affect the creditor's right to have the interests of all parties settled in one suit. Grant v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co., 121 U. S. 105.

Thus, equity will foreclose a deed of trust, where the bill shows that the land has, since the execution of the deed, been subdivided among numerous parties in interest, and serious complications involved. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Grant, 3 McArthur (D. C.) 42.

deed, a subsequent incumbrancer, or the debtor himself, has an undoubted right to make the application.¹

It seems that foreclosure may be had in equity, even before the power to sell has become operative, as where the debt has become due, but default has not continued for the period required to authorize a sale by the trustee.²

If, after foreclosure of a trust deed by a suit in equity to which the trustee was not made a party, he attempts to execute the power, or to assert his legal title, he will be restrained by injunction.³

An abortive attempt to foreclose under the power is no bar to the right to foreclose by action.⁴ On the other hand, the pendency of a suit by the mortgagee to foreclose, does not necessarily deprive him of the right to proceed to execute his power of sale, even against the objection of the owners of the equity of redemption and subsequent incumbrancers.⁵ And the creditor may sell under a trust deed securing his debt, notwithstanding the pendency of a suit between him and his debtor to ascertain the amount due. But in such case the sale will be subject to whatever decree may be entered.⁶ So, the pendency of a suit by the mortgagor to have the mortgage adjudged, satisfied, and canceled, will not prevent the mortgagee from proceeding to sell under his power; he is not obliged to apply to the court in that suit for a decree of foreclosure.⁷ It seems, however, that if the mortgagee makes a junior incumbrancer a party defendant to a suit to foreclose, and pending the suit, exercises his power of sale, the court will allow such junior incumbrancer to redeem from the sale.⁸

A bill by the mortgagee to foreclose will not be entertained after he has elected to exercise his power of sale, and has acquired the rights of the purchaser at the sale.⁹

Where, on a bill to enjoin the mortgagee from selling under the

Foreclosure in Equity After Sale. —

Where the trustee sells under the power, upon default in but one of three notes secured, and the holder of that note purchases all the property at the sale for one-third of its value, with the knowledge that the other notes are outstanding, and the debtor redeems from the sale, equity will again foreclose to protect the other notes. power, he files a cross-bill praying for foreclosure, this will be treated as a waiver and abandonment of any purpose to proceed under the power.¹

An entry by the mortgagee after default for the purpose of foreclosure, and his receipt of the rents and profits, will not prevent him from subsequently exercising the power of sale, to satisfy the unpaid balance of the mortgage debt.²

X. WHO MAY EXERCISE THE POWER—1. Power Cannot Be Delegated.—The office of trustee is one of personal trust and confidence, and therefore cannot be delegated, unless authority to do so is expressly granted in the instrument creating the trust.³ The use of the word "assigns" in the habendum of a trust deed, will not be construed to authorize the trustee to delegate his power.⁴ An assignment by the trustee of his interest in the debt secured by the trust deed, does not operate as an assignment of the trust.⁵

The trustee must be present and supervise the proceedings during the entire time occupied in making the sale. It is not enough for him to appear at the opening and close, and absent himself during its progress.⁶ But in the absence of evidence of unfairness, a sale will not be set aside because one of two joint trustees was not present, the other having personally conducted it.⁷ But

Personal Trust.—"The course marked out for the trustee to pursue must be strictly followed by him, for the method of enforcing collection through such deeds is a harsh one. The grantor of the power is entitled to have his directions obeyed, to have the proper notice of sale given, to have it take place at the time and place, and by the person appointed by him. He gives these directions because he thinks that a sale made by the person selected, and under the circumstances stated, will be to his interest and make his property produce the largest amount of money. Of the prescribed conditions, none is more important than that which requires that the trustee shall in person make the sale. He is chosen because of the confidence the grantor has in his integrity and discretion. The trustee, in making the sale, and during the time the property is under the hammer, is expected to protect the interests of the grantor, to see that no fraud is practised detrimental to his interests, and that no improper bid is accepted, and that the property is not knocked off without giving fair opportunity for it to bring its reasonable value. Perhaps the agent selected by the trustee to attend to this important matter is not one to whom the grantor himself would have intrusted it. He has reposed confidence in the party selected by him, and that confidence cannot be transferred without his consent. The trustee can no more absent himself while the sale is going on, than he can make it at a time or place or for a character of consideration different from that authorized in the deed. These views are so well supported by authority that it is unnecessary to further elaborate them." Willie, C. J., in Fuller v. O'Neal, 69 Tex. 349. See also Perry on Trusts, 402, 499, 602, 779, 780.

the rule under consideration does not apply to mortgagees with a power of sale.¹ The mere fact that the sale is conducted by the attorney in the absence of the mortgagee, will not render the title therefrom void.²

A failure on the part of the trustee to personally supervise and conduct the sale, affords ground for setting it aside at the instance of the holder of the equity, notwithstanding it may have been fairly conducted.³

The mere verbal assent of the grantor and beneficiary to the trustee's being absent from the sale and leaving the conduct of it to a stranger, will not amount to a proper authority to delegate the power.⁴ The objection of lack of authority, or that the trustee was absent from the sale, cannot in any case be considered, unless properly raised by the issues.⁵ The burden of proving that the right to delegate the power existed, and that such delegation was properly made, is, of course, on the party claiming under a sale made by a third person assuming to act for the trustee.⁶

It has been held that the title of an innocent subsequent grantee from the purchaser at a sale under a power, is not affected by the fact that the power was executed by the trustee's agent or attorney,⁷ but there is no good reason why such grantee should have any better title, as against the owner of the equity, than the original purchaser obtained.

While the trustee or mortgagee must personally execute the

Even though the creditor became the purchaser.

1. Fogarty v. Sawyer, 23 Cal. 570. In this case the sale was made by an auctioneer.

In Cranston v. Crane, 97 Mass. 459, the court said: "We are of opinion that the giving of notice and entry upon the land and the conduct of the auction were all matters which the mortgagee might properly employ others to do under his discretion; that it did not require authority under seal for these purposes." See also Hubbard v. Jarrell, 23 Md. 82.

In Welsh v. Coley, 82 Ala. 363, it was said: "That the fact that the auctioneer at the sale was purchaser and that the mortgagee was not present, are not sufficient to set the sale aside. At least such is the rule after the acquiescence of nine years." See Garland v. Watson, 74 Ala. 323.

At most, such an irregularity in the sale only renders the title voidable, and an application to set it aside should be made within a reasonable time before the rights of innocent third parties have intervened. Munn v. Burges, 70 Ill. 604.

The maker of the power alone can question the irregularity of such sale; a creditor cannot. A delay of over four years in filing a bill to avoid the sale, is fatal to relief in equity. McHany v. Schenk, 88 Ill. 357.

In Texas, it seems that the contrary is held, and there the mortgagee has no power to appoint another to make the sale of the land as his agent. Bitter v. Calhoun (Tex. 1888), 8 S. W. Rep. 523.

In Crafts v. Daugherty, 69 Tex. 477, it was held that a sale by an agent of the mortgagee who was not empowered to delegate his authority, though not depriving the mortgagor of the right to redeem, conferred all the mortgagee's rights on the purchaser, and the mortgagor could not maintain an action to try title against such purchaser.

power, he may employ others to assist him, by acting as auctioneer,¹ posting the notices of sale,² or doing any other act which does not require the exercise of discretion.

2. Joint Trustees Must Act Jointly.—The equitable doctrine that where a trust is conferred upon two or more persons jointly, all the trustees must unite in executing the trust, applies with full force to grantees in trust deeds and mortgages. No one of the trustees, nor any number less than the whole, can exercise the power, unless expressly authorized by the deed,³ and even then, if they elect to act jointly, as by giving a joint notice of sale, one of them cannot afterwards act alone in making the sale.⁴

The members of a partnership named as mortgagees are regarded as joint trustees, and one partner alone cannot bind the firm or the mortgagor by exercising the power without the concurrence of his copartners.⁵

The trustee who has taken no part in the sale, cannot give it validity by assuming to approve and ratify the acts of the others. The benefit of his counsel and judgment having been lost, he cannot supply it ex post facto.⁶

In case of the death of one of the trustees, the survivors may execute the power, even without express provisions therefor in the deed,⁷ and, upon the death of the last surviving trustee, his heir acquires the bare legal title, but not the right to execute the Deputy Marshal.—Where a trust deed provided that a sale under the power should be made by the United States marshal, it was held that a sale made and conducted wholly by one of his deputies as "auctioneer," was void, and passed no title to the purchaser. *Singer Mfg. Power to Act Separately.—In a trust deed, two persons were named as trustees, "with power to act separately, and each independent of the other." It was also provided that the proceeds of the sale might be paid to the trustees, "or either of them," also, that "the receipts of said second parties, or either of them, shall be conclusive," etc. The power of sale was as follows: In the case of default, etc., "then it shall and may be lawful for the said party of the second part, his heirs, assigns, or successors in trust, to sell and dispose of said premises, and make, execute, and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale, good and sufficient deeds," etc. It was held, that, although the power to act severally was not expressly conferred by the clause creating the power, yet the other provisions were broad enough to cover all the acts done by the trustees under the deed, including an exercise of the power of sale; and that a sale by one of the trustees, followed by his deed in which the other did not join, was valid. The maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius does not apply. Loveland v. Clark, 11 Colo. 265. Where the deed authorizes the trustees, "or either of them," to execute the trust, one may act without the concurrence of the other, especially where one has removed beyond the jurisdiction of the state, Taylor v. Dickinson, 15 Iowa 483; or refuses to unite in the sale. Graeme v. Cullen, 23 Gratt. (Va.) 266.

power, which remains in abeyance until the court appoints a new trustee.¹

In respect to joint mortgagees, if the mortgage contains no provision for survivorship, on the death of one of the mortgagees, his personal representative should join in the execution of the power.²

3. Substitutes and Successors in Trust.—The equitable rule is that a trustee who has once accepted the trust will not be allowed to lay it down without the assent of the beneficiary or the decree of a court of equity; and that, if he is within the jurisdiction of the court, he may be compelled to discharge the trust.³

In the absence of provision in the deed for the appointment of a new trustee, a court of equity has jurisdiction to make such appointment upon the death, disability, or refusal of the original trustee, upon petition by the beneficiaries, or the grantor, or both, and they are all necessary parties to such a petition;⁴ as is also a subsequent purchaser from the grantor, who has a direct interest in seeing that the trust is executed by a competent person.⁵

Another equitable ground for removing a trustee and appointing a successor is the existence of personal enmity between the trustee and beneficiary.⁶

The general rule is that unless authority be expressly given by the power, enabling the beneficiary to appoint a substitute trustee, he cannot make such appointment, but must apply to a court of equity for relief;⁷ but it has been held that where the original trustee has removed from the state and become a permanent resident of a foreign country, equity will recognize the appointment of a new trustee by the beneficiaries, and enjoin the other from attempting to execute the power.⁸

It is now the usual practice to insert in instruments creating a power of sale, provisions designating or authorizing the substitution of some other person to execute the power in case of the disability, death, absence, or refusal of the first-named trustee to carry out the trust. Such provisions may be inserted, and the acts of the substitute or successor, in the proper contingency, are as effectual as if they had been done by the original trustee.⁹

tion of an interested party, such an order, which does not show on whose motion it was made, nor that the proper parties had notice, or were before the court, is invalid. Pitzer v. Logan, 85 Va. 374.

Whatever conditions and terms the grantor of the trust has seen fit to impose, in respect to its exercise by a successor of the trustee, must be observed strictly in order to render the successor's acts valid.¹

Under a power to appoint a substitute in case the trustee fails or refuses to act, a sale made by such substitute is invalid where the original trustee had never been requested to exercise the power.²

When the court appoints the sheriff to act as trustee, under a provision in the deed, the appointment is a mere ministerial act, and is void if the trust had in fact been extinguished, or the contingency authorizing the appointment had not occurred.³ The sheriff acts officially when so appointed, and hence a sale by his deputy is valid;⁴ but when he acts under a provision in the deed and not by order of court, he does not act in his official capacity, and his official bondsmen are not liable for his failure to account for the proceeds.⁵

If the deed confers upon the beneficiary by name, the power to appoint a new trustee upon the happening of some contingency, such power of appointment is personal or in gross, and cannot be exercised by the beneficiary's assignee, unless by express authority from the grantor.⁶ It is held that authority to the beneficiaries

"The author of every trust has full power to provide for the appointment of a successor or successors in trust, in case the original trustee or trustees refuse to act, die, remove into a foreign jurisdiction, or are removed by a court of competent jurisdiction." West v. Fitz, 109 Ill. 442.

G., the trustee under a will, took a mortgage to secure a note belonging to the estate, wherein he was described as the trustee, and a power of sale in the usual form was granted to "G., trustee, his successors and assigns." Subsequently, upon his application, the court released him from his trust under the will, and appointed M. his successor, the mortgage being thereupon assigned by indorsement. It was held that M. was authorized to exercise the power, either as G.'s successor in trust, or by virtue of the assignment of the debt and mortgage. Western Maryland R., etc., Co. v. Goodwin (Md. 1893), 26 Atl. Rep. 319, citing Berry v. Skinner, 30 Md. 573; Harnickell v. Orndorff, 35 Md. 343.

Sale by Sheriff.—A provision that in the case of the trustee's death, a refusal to act, or an absence from the state when a sale is desired, the sheriff of the county may proceed to sell, means that the sheriff may act on the happening of any one of the three contingencies. Hickman v. Dill, 32 Mo. App. 509.

Where a trust deed provides that in case of the absence, inability or refusal of the trustee, the sheriff of the county may make the sale, a sale by the sheriff in accordance with the terms of the deed, and upon the happening of the contingency mentioned, is a sale under the power, and divests the grantor of his title. *McKnight v. Code (1855), p. 1554, §§ 1, 2, provides that in the case of death or other disability of the trustee, "any person interested in the debt or other liability secured by such deed of trust," may make affidavit thereof to the court, and the court may appoint the sheriff to make the sale. It is held that the debtor is not a "person interested in the debt," and a sale by the sheriff, under an order based on the debtor's affidavit, is void. State v. Jackson, 51 Mo. 196.

or their "personal representatives" to appoint a substitute, does not extend to an assignee of the debt.¹

The refusal of the trustee to act unless paid for his services, in addition to the regular commissions, constitutes such a failure as justifies the appointment of a new trustee.² So, if the trustee is authorized to appoint a substitute, and, upon his "refusal" to do so in a proper case, the power of appointment is vested in the beneficiary, it is held that the death of the trustee without making an appointment is practically equivalent to a refusal, and authorizes the beneficiary to make it;³ and where the trustee, on being requested to execute the power, replied that it was not convenient for him to do so, that was held equivalent to a positive refusal.⁴

The authority of the substitute depends upon the actual existence of the state of facts contemplated in the power, and hence the validity of his sale is not impaired by a misrecital in his notice, or in his deed to the purchaser, as to the happening of the designated contingency: As, for instance, that he was acting because of the absence of the original trustee, when, in fact, he acted because of the trustee's refusal to execute the power. Unless the trust deed requires it, the reason for the substitution need not be given at all.⁵

A provision in the deed that a third person may act in case of the trustee's "absence from the state," means a permanent removal of his residence.⁶ The cestui que trust cannot ignore such a provision; and an appointment by the court in an ex parte proceeding, at the instance of the cestui que trust, is a nullity as to all parties not before the court.⁷

4. Assignees of the Debt.—The power of sale passes by an assignment of the debt or mortgage, when the power is expressly conferred upon the mortgagee, his heirs or assigns,⁸ or, when not so

When an assignment of a mortgage with a power of sale recited that the power had not been and was not intended to be exercised, and contained a covenant to pay the mortgage debt seven years from that date, with a power of sale in case of default, and also assigned the debt and all powers and remedies for recovering the same, and all the benefits of the mortgage, it was held that the original power of sale was not extinguished by the assignment.

conferred, when it is provided by statute that such persons may exercise the power.¹ And it seems, even in the absence of special provision in the mortgage or by statute, the power of sale, which is a power coupled with an interest, and appendant and annexed to the estate, may pass by a conveyance of all the interest of the mortgagee.² But the contrary is held in some cases.³

So the assignment of the debt secured by the mortgage transfers the power of sale to the assignee.⁴ But the mere assignment of the mortgage, without an assignment of the debt, will not have such effect.⁵ So where the debt is not assignable at law, the assignment of a mortgage passes only the equitable title, and the power of sale remains in and can be exercised only by the mort-

The power may also be exercised by the personal representative of the assignee, so where the mortgage was transferred and the transferee died intestate, the administrator of the transferee was allowed to sell the estate and procure a conveyance from the heir of the intestate. Saloway v. Strawbridge, 25 L. J. Ch. 121.

1. The Alabama Code 1886, § 1844, provides that a power of sale given to the mortgagee "may be executed by any person, or the personal representative of any person, who, by assignment or otherwise, becomes entitled to the money thus secured." Under this statute it is not necessary that the mortgage should have been transferred by apt and formal words of conveyance. The assignment of the debt and mortgage, by whatever language, entitles the assignee to execute the power. McGuire v. Van Pelt, 55 Ala. 344; Buell v. Underwood, 65 Ala. 285; Wildsmith v. Tracy, 80 Ala. 263; Martinez v. Lindsey, 91 Ala. 334.

In Cook v. Crawford, 13 Sim. 99, it was held that a trust or sale vested in A and his heirs, could not be exercised by the assigns of A. But this was overruled in Osborne v. Rowlett, 13 Ch. Div. 774, upon the principle that where there is a legal estate with a power annexed to it, that power devolves with the legal estate to which it is annexed, unless there is something showing a contrary intention.

In Hamilton v. Lubukee, 51 Ill. 415, where a power of sale was given by the mortgage, which was given as a security for notes which were afterwards sold to the mortgagee, his heirs, or assigns, the indorsement of the mortgage did not transfer the power of sale, it not being assignable either at law or by statute.

North Carolina.—The following indorsement upon a mortgage: "For value received I assign and transfer this mortgage to G. H. Simmons," signed by the mortgagee but not sealed, was held not to vest the mortgagee's title in the assignee so as to enable him to exercise the power of sale; and the court refused to aid a purchaser at a sale by such assignee, by compelling the assignee to perform the contract of sale. In the course of the opinion Shepherd, J., said: "It is next insisted by the plaintiff, that, Simmons being the equitable assignee, the court should compel him and the mortgagee to specifically perform the contract of sale. gagee himself.¹ The assignee being the proper person to execute the power, he is also authorized to execute a deed to the purchaser at his sale.²

An assignment of the debt and mortgage need not be absolute in order to authorize the assignee to foreclose. An assignment or pledge as collateral security for payment of a debt due the assignee will enable him to execute the power on default, and this without first selling and buying in the securities.³

In several of the states, the statutes regulating foreclosure by advertisement require that all assignments of the mortgage shall have been duly recorded. A failure to comply strictly with this requirement prevents an assignee from making a valid sale under the power.⁴ So essential is the record of assignment regarded, that, if the assignment is not properly acknowledged, or is in any authority for this position is cited, and we are sure that none can be found in our reports. We feel at liberty, therefore, to consider the policy of decreeing specific performance in such cases. We are of the opinion that the exercise of a power of sale in a mortgage should be watched with great jealousy, and that courts of equity, as well as of law, should require its terms to be strictly pursued. Where this is done, the courts may, in proper cases, decree specific performance, but never in a case like the present, where the court is called upon to establish, as well as to assist, in the execution of a power against a mortgagor who prays that he may be permitted to redeem. Again, we think that to lend the equitable aid of the court in cases like this would tend to produce confusion and uncertainty without any corresponding benefit. It is always in the power of the assignee, if he wishes to execute the power, to take an assignment by deed of the legal estate, and if he fails to do so, neither he nor his purchaser, who loses nothing but a bargain, should be heard to complain. Another objection is, that several notes may be assigned to different persons, each of whom may attempt to execute the power, and thus much trouble and litigation will be invited. There is no equity in favor of such a purchaser, who has paid nothing, and who has not been actually misled by the conduct of the parties. The records are open to his inspection, and he can readily inform himself as to the validity of the power under which the sale is made. Whatever may be the rulings in some of the states, where the mortgage is regarded strictly as a pledge, they can have no application here, where the distinction between the equitable and the legal estate is still maintained." Dameron v. Eskridge, 104 N. Car. 621.

Insolvency of Mortgagor.—In Maryland, it is held that when a mortgagor in default applies for the benefit of the insolvency laws, and a trustee in insolvency is appointed and qualifies, the trustee, and not the mortgagee, must execute the power. Mackubin v. Boardman, 54 Md. 384. But otherwise, where the mortgagee and a third person to whom the power of sale was given, were residents of another state. Ensor v. Lewis, 54 Md. 391.

2. Heath v. Hall, 60 Ill. 344.

3. Jenkins v. International Bank, 111 Ill. 480; Holmes v. Turner's Falls Co., 150 Mass. 535.

The mere possession of the note and mortgage is not sufficient. Bausman v. Kelley, 38 Minn. 197.

Rights of Pledgee.—The holder of a note and mortgage assigned them to C to secure a note. The complainant bought the latter note from C and received also the collateral note and mortgage as security. The mortgagee then assigned his interest in the note and mortgage to the defendant, who proceeded to foreclose by advertisement. It was held that in view of the conflicting equities, such an assignment did not give the defendant a title that would authorize an execution of the power of sale. Olcott v. Crittenden, 68 Mich. 230.

4. In Backus v. Burke, 48 Minn. 260, a foreclosure sale in the name of the original mortgagee was held void, where the record showed a previous assignment of the mortgage by him, even though the assignment was not inother matter of form insufficient to entitle it to record under the recording laws, the fact that it was actually recorded will not authorize the assignee to make a valid sale.¹

If the record of assignment was defective, rendering the assignee's foreclosure void, the right to take advantage of the defect, and to redeem, is one of which the party cannot be deprived by a subsequent curative act.²

5. Executors and Administrators.—When the power is given to a trustee in a trust deed, it is a personal trust and cannot be executed by his administrator, even where the power is in terms granted to the trustee and his "legal representatives."³ But in respect to powers given to mortgagees, the rule is different; the power, being coupled with an interest, passes to the personal representatives of the mortgagee, whether they are expressly designated in the mortgage or not.⁴

In making foreclosure, the administrator need not recite the fact of his appointment or the death of the mortgagee; it is sufficient if he sign the notice as administrator.⁵

Foreclosures by advertisement, made in the name of foreign executors or administrators, of whose appointment or qualification no evidence had been recorded in the county where the mortgaged property was situated, or who had not qualified in the state at all, have been upheld, on the ground that their legal title tended to be absolute, and at the time of the sale he held an unrecorded reassignment to himself.

Assignment by Attorney.—In Morrison v. Mendenhall, 18 Minn. 232, a foreclosure sale by an assignee was sustained, where the assignment, which was duly recorded, had been executed by an attorney in fact whose authority was not of record.

Sufficiency of Record.—An assignment by a writing under seal upon the back of the mortgage, referring to it as "the within described mortgage," and separately recorded in the same book with the mortgage, is a sufficient compliance with the statute requiring all instruments to be recorded "at large and in full, word for word." Carll v. Taylor, 15 Minn. 171.

Under a statute requiring "all the assignments" of a mortgage to be recorded, where a mortgage was given to "Beecher & Dean," and the record showed an assignment from one Charles R. Dean to one Solomon I. Beecher, also one from Beecher to Barnes, and from the latter to Elizabeth McKnight, who foreclosed, it was held that as "Beecher & Dean" did not appear to have assigned, the statute had not been complied with, and the sale was a nullity. Morris v. McKnight, 1 N. Dak. 266.

Legal Representatives.—If the power is to the mortgagee and his "legal representatives," it is properly executed by his administrator. Merrin v. Lewis, 90 Ill. 505.

Heirs and Assigns.—So, if the power is to the mortgagee, "his heirs and assigns," his administrator may execute it. Lewis v. Wells, 50 Ala. 198. See also Demarest v. Wynkoop, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 129; Bausman v. Kelley, 38 Minn. 197; Johnson v. Turner, 7 Ohio 216; Look v. Kenney, 128 Mass. 284.

A power given to the mortgagee "or his executor," vests in the person who qualifies as his executor. There is a sufficient designation of the person. Yount v. Morrison, 109 N. Car. 520.

5. Baldwin v. Allison, 4 Minn. 25. And if, before the sale, a special admin-was not so much by virtue of the office as by the terms of the power itself.¹

6. Corporations.—If a corporation has under its charter the right to take mortgage security, there is no reason why it should not also have the right to execute a power of sale under a mortgage, acting through its proper officers. In Maryland, however, corporations are denied authority to execute such powers,² though if a power of sale be given to the corporation, its successors and assigns, a natural person to whom the mortgage has been assigned may execute the power.³ But where the power is given to the corporation mortgagee or its attorney (without naming him), it cannot be exercised by a person employed as attorney.⁴

7. Sheriffs and Auctioneers.—It is competent for the legislature to apply to existing mortgages with power of sale, the provisions of a subsequent act requiring sales under such powers to be conducted by the sheriff of the county. Who shall act as auctioneer at a public sale is a mere matter of detail in exercising the power, istrator is appointed, it will be presumed that the sale was with his approval. Baldwin v. Allison, 4 Minn. 25.

In Minnesota, By Laws 1876, ch. 41 (Gen. St. 1878, ch. 81), a foreign administrator is now required to file with the Register of Deeds of the county where the land lies, proof of his appointment, before making sale under the power.

In Doolittle v. Lewis, 7 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 45; 11 Am. Dec. 389, Chancellor Kent decided that a power of sale given to a mortgagee, "his executors, administrators, and assigns," could be executed by an administrator appointed in another state, where the mortgagee resided, and without taking out letters of administration in New York, where the land was situated. The reasoning of the decision is that while the courts do not recognize a foreign administrator as such, yet they do recognize that his right to execute the power is a matter of contract, and not of jurisdiction.

But in Sloan v. Frothingham, 65 Ala. 593, it was held that a sale by a foreign administrator who had not complied with the statutory requirements as to recording his letters of administration and giving a bond, was not merely voidable, but a nullity.

3. In Chilton v. Brooks, 71 Md. 445, the court said: "It is contended that the executors acted without authority, because the power was given to the corporation to sell in case of default, and as a corporation cannot execute such power, under the decision of Frostburg Mut. Bldg. Assoc. v. Lowdermilk, 50 Md. 175; Queen City Perpetual Bldg. Assoc. v. Price, 53 Md. 398, the corporation could not by assignment give to an assignee a right to do what it could not do—something it could not possess. All that was decided in those cases, adversely to the power in the mortgages there involved, was that the power, being given to a corporation, and to no one else, was void. It is necessary that some one capable of executing the power should be designated as authorized to execute it. For the want of such designation in the 53 Md. case, the power was declared void; and in Frostburg Mut. Bldg. Assoc. v. Lowdermilk, 50 Md. 175, nothing was decided but the inability of a corporation to execute the trust given by the power. In 53 Md., the assignees of the mortgage were not named as clothed with the power, while here they are, by express language, mentioned as authorized to execute it, and in the alternative a designated attorney is authorized to execute it. . . . We think the assignee may execute the power, if the power so states."

and the substitution of a public officer does not affect or impair the obligation of the contract.¹

The fact that the person acting as auctioneer at a foreclosure sale under the power was not duly licensed as required by statute, of which fact the mortgagee was ignorant, does not vitiate the sale.²

XI. WHEN POWER BECOMES OPERATIVE—1. Default.—The existence of a default in payment of the debt secured, or some part of it, is ordinarily a condition precedent to the power to institute proceedings culminating in a valid sale, even as to bona fide purchasers.³

If a sale is made by the trustee when nothing is due and no default has been made in any of the conditions of the deed, there exists no power to sell, and if the title passes at all, the purchaser will be held in equity as a trustee for the debtor; but that cannot be inquired into in an action at law.⁴ It will not be presumed, after sale, that the contingency upon which the right to sell was to arise, had not occurred. Such lack of power must be averred and proved.⁵ If the power is by its terms exercisable only after default has continued for a specified length of time, no valid sale can be made until such period has fully expired.⁶ Nor can the sale proceedings be commenced before the expiration of the time.⁷

A vendor by warranty deed, with covenants against incumbrances, who takes a trust deed to secure the purchase price, cannot sell under the power until all existing incumbrances have been removed.⁸ But in the absence of such a covenant, the existence of prior incumbrances would not prevent a sale under a

The costs of proceedings to obtain a sale of the mortgaged premises, is such a charge upon the estate as will entitle the mortgagee to proceed to a sale in the case of non-payment, although the principal and interest have been paid.

But in Grant v. Canada L. Assur. Co., 29 Grant's Ch. (Ont.) 256, where the power of sale was to arise after three months' default without notice, and the mortgagee covenanted with the mortgagor not to exercise the power without one month's notice, it was held that the period of default, and the period of notice could run concurrently. trust deed given to secure purchase-money, though the conveyance contained covenants of warranty.¹

Where there is a dispute as to the existence of default, the mortgagor may have an injunction to restrain the advertised sale until the question of default can be judicially determined.²

2. Provisions for Accelerating Maturity.—It is competent for the parties to a trust deed or mortgage to stipulate therein that upon non-payment of interest, taxes, or any installment of the principal, the entire debt may be declared due and the power of sale become operative.³ It is now usual to insert in the power a provision for declaring the whole debt due upon default in any payment, but, even in the absence of such a clause, if the power is Due Only For Purpose of Foreclosure.—It is held that, where a trust deed or mortgage provides that in case of default all the notes secured shall become due and payable, whether due on their face or not, the notes not actually due become, under such provision, due only so far as to authorize their payment out of the proceeds of sale. Morgan v. Martien, 32 Mo. 438; Mason v. Barnard, 36 Mo. 384. Under such circumstances, an action cannot be maintained on the notes not due, according to their terms, at the time the action is commenced. White v. Miller (Minn. 1893), 54 N. W. Rep. 736; McClelland v. Bishop, 42 Ohio St. 113; Mallory v. Indiana, etc., R. Co., 35 N. Y. Super. Ct. 174; West Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Sprague, 103 U. S. 756. The contrary, however, has been held in the following cases: Wheeler, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Howard, 28 Fed. Rep. 741; Noell v. Gaines, 68 Mo. 649 (see dissenting opinion of Hough, J.); Chambers v. Marks, 93 Ala. 412.

Clauses Construed.—A mortgage was given by A. to B. to secure payment of eighteen notes, each for $2,400, two payable each year, and another note for $48,000, payable ten years after the first two, on condition that B. should obtain a conveyance to A. from certain minor heirs; and the mortgage provided that, if default should be made in payment of any of the $2,400 notes, or if $12,000 of the large note should not be paid in thirty days after maturity, then the whole sum unpaid should become due, and the power of sale operative. It was held that a sale might be made on default in payment of any of the $2,400 notes, without first tendering the deed from the heirs, but not so as to the large note without such tender. Gibbons v. Hoag, 95 Ill. 45.

Where a mortgage provides that on default in payment of any of the notes secured for thirty days, the mortgagee may declare the whole debt due and make the sale, and there is nothing in the mortgage to show that any of the notes were given for unpaid interest, and a sale is made for the amount of all the notes, including one given for unearned interest, the purchaser has the right to regard all the notes as being for principal and rightly declared due. Wisner v. Chamberlin, 117 Ill. 568.

And where the mortgage provides that all the notes may be declared due on default in any of them, the fact that the payment of one note, not due, depends upon the mortgagee's procuring an outstanding portion of the title for the mortgagor, will not prevent him from declaring such note due on default in payment of the other notes, and making a valid sale. Wisner v. Chamberlin, 117 Ill. 568. See also Gorham v. Farson, 119 Ill. 425.

Sale Before Maturity of Principal.—A power of sale upon default in payment "of any part of the aforesaid debt and interest," authorizes the trustee to sell upon failure to pay the interest, though no part of the principal is yet due. Richards v. Holmes, 18 How. (U. S.) 143.

Under a mortgage with power of sale in case of default in principal or interest, and directing that out of the

made operative on non-payment of interest or an installment, the entire premises may be sold and the proceeds applied to the unmatured portions of the debt as well as to the portions in default.¹ If the entire mortgaged premises are sold upon default in payment of a portion of the debt, the power is thereby exhausted, and the property cannot be sold again upon non-payment of installments subsequently accruing.²

By claiming in his notice of sale that the whole debt is due, the mortgagee sufficiently declares his election so to consider it, under the provisions of the mortgage.³

If the mortgagee is authorized to declare the whole debt due on default in an installment, his assignee of the debt and mortgage is entitled to exercise the same option.⁴

3. Necessity of Previous Entry.—Usually the mortgage or trust deed contains a provision authorizing an entry by the mortgagee or trustee upon default. Such entry, however, is not a prerequisite to a sale under the power.⁵

proceeds of sale the principal and interest shall be paid, the power may be exercised upon default in payment of interest prior to the maturity of the principal. Hooper v. Stump (Arizona, 1887), 14 Pac. Rep. 799.

Non-Payment of Taxes.—A provision in a mortgage that if the taxes should not be paid before sale to enforce them, the mortgagee might "lawfully sell the premises at public auction, and make a deed, rendering the surplus," etc.—gives the right to foreclose for the whole debt, though not due, upon such non-payment of taxes. Pope v. Durant, 26 Iowa 233.

A mortgage to secure a debt payable in installments provided that if any installment should be in default for thirty days, the mortgagee might sell the premises and retain out of the proceeds the entire debt. It was held that to entitle him to retain the entire debt, the proceedings to foreclose must not have been commenced until thirty days after an installment became due. Holden v. Gilbert, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 208.

Even where a trust deed declares that "it shall be the duty of the party of the third part herein, at the request of the holder of said note, to take into his possession all the property described herein," and to advertise and sell the same, such taking possession is not a condition precedent to the exercise of the power. Hamilton v. Halpin, 68 Miss. 99; Tyler v. Herring, 67 Miss. 169. If a trust deed provides, that on default it shall be the duty of the trustee, upon request of the creditor, to take possession of the property and sell it, the trustee has no right to possession, even after default, until the creditor has duly requested him to take possession for the purpose of sale. Bowman v. Roberts, 58 Miss. 126.

And when possession is justified under a power authorizing the trustee to sell on default and upon request of the mortgagee, it must be alleged that such request was made, and that the entry was for the purpose of the mortgage trusts. Watson v. Waltham, 2 Ad. & El. 485; 29 E. C. L. 153; 1 H. & W. 24.

"On principle, it would seem that, according to the strict construction, it would be proper, or, at least, consistent, to construe the clause in favor of the necessity of entry, if there be reason to believe that such entry would, in some way, be towards the advantage of the mortgagor; but that, in the absence of any possible advantage to him it would not be proper or reasonable so to construe it, merely to impose a troublesome condition on his creditor. In practice, there is no doubt whatever that the more liberal view is the

4. Request by Beneficiary to Sell.—The trustee in a deed of trust, having no personal interest in the payment of the debt secured, ought not to exercise the power of sale without being requested by the creditor to do so; but it is held that if the deed does not provide for such request as a condition precedent, the trustee may make a valid sale upon his own motion.¹ Where the exercise of the power is conditioned upon the request of the beneficiary, a sale by the trustee without such request having been made is invalid, except possibly as to innocent purchasers without notice of the irregularity.² Neither can the trustee make a valid sale without the request of the grantor, if that is made one of the conditions of the power.³

A mortgagee who becomes the purchaser at a foreclosure sale, and who, after the expiration of the period of redemption, goes into possession and receives the rents, thereby ratifies the foreclosure, and cannot have it set aside on the ground that he one that would meet most favor with conveyancers and mortgagees." Hunter's Sale Under Mortgages (Ontario, 1892) 52.

In Roarty v. Mitchell, 7 Gray (Mass.) 243, a mortgage provided that in default of payment the mortgagee might enter and take possession of the premises immediately, and might sell and dispose of the same on giving notice, etc. It was held in this case that an entry or at least a demand were conditions precedent without which no valid sale could be made under the power.

In Cranston v. Crane, 97 Mass. 459, the court had under consideration a power of sale mortgage which provided that upon default, "it should be lawful" for the mortgagee to enter upon the premises and make a sale, etc. It was held not to be necessary for the mortgagee to make the entry at any other time, or in any other manner than on the day of the sale, and for the purpose of the sale; also that the entry could be made by an agent of the mortgagee, under a parol authority.

In Foster v. Boston, 133 Mass. 143, where a trust deed given by a land improvement company, conveyed a large quantity of unimproved city property, and provided that upon default the trustee should enter and take possession, and so manage and dispose of the property as to carry out the purposes of the trust, by making sales from time to time, it was held that an entry by the trustees was necessary before they could exercise the power of sale. The previous cases of Roarty v. Mitchell, 7 Gray (Mass.) 243, and Cranston v.

Crane, 97 Mass. 459, were cited with approval.

1. Wood v. Augustine, 61 Mo. 46.

In Krieger v. Bissell, 80 Ky. 330, where the holder of a mortgage to secure certain bondholders brought suit as trustee of an express trust, to obtain a sale of the land, without joining the beneficiaries, and the land was sold to him as trustee, the deed giving him by order of the court full power to dispose of the land, it was held that he had a complete legal title, and could sell without the request or permission of the bondholders.

Order of County Court.—In Missouri, where a sheriff's deed, executed under a power of sale conferred upon him in a mortgage in favor of the county, failed to recite that a certified copy of the order of the county court directing him to foreclose had been delivered to him, or that the sale was made pursuant to such order, it was held that the deed was not admissible as evidence of title. *Carter v. The trustee, in a deed requiring the beneficiary to request a sale at least thirty days before the day of sale, proceeded to give notice of the sale without having been requested. Eleven days before the day fixed, such request was made. It was held that the sale should be set aside. Equitable Trust Co. v. Fisher, 106 Ill. 189.

never authorized the proceedings.¹ Neither can the mortgagor, in an action for a deficiency, deny the validity of the sale, after having relied upon and confirmed it in court in a former action.²

5. Promise of Forbearance.—An arrangement between the creditor and debtor to extend the time of payment until further notice, even though made without valuable consideration, is sufficient to justify a court of equity in setting aside a sale made in violation of the promise.³

6. Effect of Tender Before Sale.—The owner of the equity of redemption has the right to prevent a sale under the power, by making a tender of the amount due and all accrued costs, at any time before the sale takes place; and if the tender is refused and the sale proceeded with, equity will interfere by injunction or by setting aside the sale.⁴ The offer must be not merely to buy the debt, but to pay it.⁵ The actual proffer of the money is dispensed with if the debtor, being ready and willing to pay, is prevented from actually producing it by the creditor's declaring that he will not receive it.⁶

A trustee, who has the deed and note in his own hands for collection and foreclosure, is the proper person to whom to make the tender.⁷

If the debtor, after advertisement, but before sale, brings a bill to redeem, and offers to pay the amount found due, that is equivalent to a tender before sale, and renders the sale invalid.⁸

action upon the debt, it is a generally established rule, that a power of sale may be exercised for the purpose of applying the proceeds of sale to the payment of the debt secured, even though an action on the debt would be barred by the statute.¹ The contrary, however, is held in one or two states.²

Where the power is by its own terms limited to a specified time, it ceases absolutely if not executed within that time.³

A statute limiting the right to foreclose by advertisement to ten years after maturity, the act to take effect in one year from its passage, gives a reasonable time as to mortgages already matured, and foreclosures not completed by sale within the year come under the operation of the statute.⁴ But a statutory requirement that every action to foreclose a mortgage shall be commenced within a specified time, has no application to a foreclosure by sale under a power.⁵

XIII. PUBLIC OR PRIVATE SALE.—It is now commonly provided, either by statute or the terms of the power, that a sale under it shall be at public vendue, after specified notice. But in the absence of any such provision, the trustee or mortgagee may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, sell either at public or private sale.⁶

Where a discretion as to the method of sale is vested in the donee of the power, a private sale made fairly and in good faith is valid, without previous notice or advertisement;⁷ but if the power, by its terms, provides for a private sale, it is believed that

The Massachusetts Statute of 1888, ch. 433, now regulates the right of sale pending a bill to redeem.

Limitation in Power.—Where a power of sale given to trustees contained the clause, "provided always that the same shall be sold within eighteen months from the date hereof," it was held that this was merely directory, and not a limitation upon the power. Parsons v. Rhodes, 22 Hun (N. Y.) 80.

A mortgagee with power to sell either by public auction or private contract, and a proviso that all arrangements, sales, conveyances, acts, matters, and things made and done under the power, should be as valid without, as if made with the consent of the mortgagor, sold the property at private sale, and agreed that a part of the purchase-money might remain on a mortgage of the property sold. It was held that the sale was valid, as against purchaser and mortgagor, though the mortgagee had not previously attempted to sell at a sale at public auction would not be justified, as the latter method might not be so advantageous to the debtor as a private sale would be.¹

XIV. PLACE OF MAKING SALE.—Whenever the trust deed or mortgage contains directions as to the particular place where sale under the power is to be made, these constitute a limitation of the power, and must be strictly complied with or the sale will be a nullity. In some of the states, provision is now made by statute, directing all sales to be made at some designated public place, and a compliance with the statute in this respect is essential to a valid sale.² If the instrument creating the power does not specify the place of sale, and there is no statute regulating it, it is not necessary that the sale be made upon the premises; any public place in the county is proper for such purpose.³ Where no place is designated, a discretion is vested in the trustee to make it at such place as he deems most beneficial to the parties interested;⁴ and it has been held that where the trustee is vested with a large discretion in this regard, a sale made by him outside the state in which the property is situated, is not for that reason void, in the absence of anything suggestive of fraud.⁵

In one case, a trustee's sale of property in the city of Washington during the Civil war, which was then occupied by the United States for military purposes, so that the public could not enter upon the premises for purposes of examination, was set aside.⁶ A very common provision in the power is that the sale shall be made at the county courthouse, or at some particular door of the courthouse. Doubts as to the proper place have sometimes arisen in cases where the building used as a courthouse at the time of executing the instrument has been destroyed or removed to another location at the time of sale. In all such cases, the true intention of the parties, if it can be ascertained from the instrument, must be allowed to govern; but, unless a contrary intention is shown, the courts are inclined to hold that the public public auction. Davey v. Durrant, 1 De G. & J. 535; 26 L. J. Ch. 830.

Where the trustee is directed to sell the estate "at public auction," he has no power to sell except in that manner, even though the interests of the grantor would be promoted by selling at private sale. Greenleaf v. Queen, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 138; Griffin v. Marine Co., 52 Ill. 130.

2. Effect of Statute on Prior Mortgages.—The Illinois Statute requiring sales under powers to be made in the county where the land is situated, was not intended to apply to instruments executed before its enactment; and where a mortgage was executed prior to that time, extensions of the time of payment from year to year after the act took effect, did not bring the mortgage within its operation. McConneaughey v. Borgardus, 106 Ill. 321.

Sale Out of County.—Under art. 64 of the Maryland Code, a power cannot be given to a mortgagee to make sale of the mortgaged premises, outside of the county where they are situated. A mortgage with such a clause contains no valid power of sale, and foreclosure must be had in equity. Webb v. Haeffer, 53 Md. 187.

character of the building, and not a particular locality or spot of ground, was what the parties intended to designate.¹

XV. NOTICE OF SALE UNDER POWER—1. When Necessary.—In the absence of statutory regulation, and of any stipulation in the power, requiring notice of sale to be given, the power may be exercised and a valid sale made without the giving of any notice whatever. But the courts justly regard such a proceeding with suspicion, and will not sustain a sale without notice, if there is

1. Presumption.—Where the testimony was that the sale was made at the courthouse "under the deed of trust," the jury were warranted, in the absence of anything tending to disprove it, in presuming that the sale was made in conformity to the requirements of the deed. German Bank v. Stumpf, 73 Mo. 311; 6 Mo. App. 17.

Removal of Courthouse.—Where the sale is required to be made "at the courthouse," and before the day of the sale the courthouse is removed to a different part of the city, the sale must be made at the new location. Napton v. Hurt, 70 Mo. 497.

So where the courthouse had been taken down to the first story and was being reconstructed, the sale was properly made at another building temporarily used for courthouse purposes. Hambright v. Brockman, 59 Mo. 53.

A trust deed provided for a sale "at the courthouse door;" but at the time of the sale the courthouse had been torn down, and a new one on the same site was almost completed, but not occupied for court purposes. It was held that a sale at the door of the new building was valid, having been well attended, and no one being misled as to the place of sale, although the county court was then held temporarily at the office of the county clerk, in a different locality. Davis v. Hess, 103 Mo. 31.

And in a recent case in the same state, where the deed provided for a sale "at the east courthouse door," and at the date of the deed there was a courthouse with an east door; but at the time of the sale it had been partially destroyed by fire, and court was being held temporarily in a building situated in another part of the town, it was held that a sale at the front door of the latter building was made at the wrong place and invalid. Stewart v. Brown (Mo. 1891), 16 S. W. Rep. 389. As to the proper place of sale under such circumstances, see the separate opinions of the judges in Stewart v. Brown, 112 Mo. 171.

Certain trust deeds provided that sales under the powers should be made "at the courthouse door in the city of Carthage." At the time of the sale, the circuit court was held in the second story of the building known as the courthouse, the first story being occupied as a store room, fronting on the street. The door of the court room was at about the center of the second story, and was reached by an open outside stairway running from the street to a landing or platform in front of the door, over which had been erected a watershed with an opening at the head of the stairway. The sales were made at the opening of this watershed, the trustee standing on the platform, and the bidders standing around him in the shed and on the steps. It was held that it could not be said that the sales were not made at the places specified in the trust deeds. Maloney v. Webb, 112 Mo. 575.

Building Used as Courthouse.—The place of sale as described in the notice was, "at the front door of the courthouse in the city of Minneapolis, corner of 2d Ave. S. and 3d St." The county courthouse had been partly destroyed by fire, and the county commissioners had rented a building at the corner of Second avenue, South and Third streets, for the meetings of the courts, and for some of the county officers, and it was so used for some weeks before the date of the notice, and till after the sale. It was held a proper designation of the place of sale, and that the sale was properly made at the front door of the building at the corner of the streets named, though the door leading to the court rooms which were in the second story, was at the rear of the building on Third street, eighty feet from the front. Johnson v. Cocks, 37 Minn. 530.

Under a trust deed calling for a sale "at the courthouse door," a sale at the door of a building commonly used as a courthouse, was held to be a sufficient compliance with the deed, it the least evidence of unfairness.¹ And where no length of time is specified for the notice required, it must be one which, under all the circumstances, is reasonable.²

2. Form and Sufficiency.—It is considered that the principal object of publishing notice of sale is not so much to notify the grantor or mortgagor, as it is to inform the public generally, so that bidders may be present at the sale and a fair price obtained.³ Accordingly, the notice should contain such facts as are reasonably sufficient to apprise the public of the description of the property to be sold, and the time, place, and terms of sale.⁴

The object being to attract bidders, any untrue statement in the notice as to the condition of the title, or the existence of adverse claims, by which bidding would naturally be discouraged, will warrant setting aside the sale.⁵ Generally, if the notice contains erroneous statements of matters not required to be stated, and which are calculated to mislead and deter bidders, the result will be to render the sale voidable, unless the false statement was caused by an honest mistake, and has been corrected by a timely publication before the sale.⁶

The notice should contain recitals showing that there has been a default, by virtue of which the power of sale has become operative; though it does not seem to have been held that such an omission would necessarily vitiate the sale.⁷ It should also show on its face that the purpose is to foreclose and sell, by virtue of the power;⁸ but it need not expressly state that the mortgage is to be foreclosed, if it announces a sale in accordance with statu-appearing that the county had no regular public court building, and that the building in question was commonly called "the courthouse." Moore v. Isabel, 40 Iowa 383.

A provision for a sale "at the north door of the courthouse in said city of Chicago," does not restrict the sale to the then existing site of the courthouse; and in case of its destruction by fire, the sale may be made at the north door of a building used as a courthouse in another part of the city. Alden v. Goldie, 82 Ill. 350. See Waller v. Arnold, 71 Ill. 350, where it was held that a sale might be made at the ruins of the old courthouse.

Sale at Wrong Door.—Though a trust deed provides for a sale at the east door of the courthouse, yet a sale at the south door is not void, in the absence of evidence that the irregularity resulted in any injury to the debtor. Hickey v. Behrens, 75 Tex. 488.

5. Equitable Trust Co. v. Fisher, 106 Ill. 189.

Cumulative Securities.—A mortgagor subsequently gave a deed of trust covering the same property, to secure the same debt. A sale having been made under the deed, it was held that the record of the two instruments afforded notice to the world that both securities were for the same debt, and that the trustee was not bound to give notice of that fact in his advertisement of sale. Weld v. Rees, 48 Ill. 428.

6. Hubbell v. Sibley, 5 Lans. (N. Y.) 51.

7. Bush v. Sherman, 80 Ill. 160.

That such an omission is not a material defect, see Model Lodging House Assoc. v. Boston, 114 Mass. 133; King v. Bronson, 122 Mass. 122.

8. Judd v. O'Brien, 21 N. Y. 186.

tory requirements;¹ nor is it necessary to state in the notice that the subscriber has lawful right or authority to exercise the power; the right, if it exists, is independent of any such recital.²

A failure to state in the notice that the sale will be made at public vendue, does not vitiate it, if it can be fairly understood from all its terms to refer to a public sale.³ And even though the notice does not expressly state that the property will be sold, the omission may be cured by recitals in the notice clearly showing that a sale at public auction is intended.⁴

Where the power itself specifies what notice shall be given, a fair compliance with its terms is all that is necessary, unless the matter is further regulated by statute.⁵

3. Presumption of Validity.—It will be presumed, not only as against the mortgagor, but also as against all persons claiming under him, that a sale under a mortgage or trust deed was advertised as required by the terms of the power;⁶ and the burden of proof rests upon the party attacking the sale, to rebut this presumption.⁷

A party who attacks a sale under a trust deed, on the ground that it is fraudulent as against creditors, will not be permitted to take advantage of defects in the notice of sale, which are not pleaded.⁸

4. Several Notices in One.—It has been held that where several trust deeds, each covering a different tract of land, are given to secure separate notes, the parties being the same in all, the trustee may in one advertisement give notice that he will sell under each deed the tract covered by it.⁹ But the better practice in such cases would be to give a separate notice under each power.

Sufficient Notice of Sale.—The following notice was held to sufficiently indicate a mortgage sale under a power: "Mortgage sale. By virtue and in pursuance of a mortgage made and delivered," etc., "dated December 8th, 1847, the undersigned will sell," etc. White v. McClellan, 62 Md. 347.

The Wisconsin Statute, regulating foreclosures by sale, requires the notice to state, among other things, the amount claimed to be due, a description of the mortgaged property, and "the time and place of sale." It is held that where the notice states that a sale will be made at a time and place specified, it is sufficient, though not expressly stating that the mortgage "will be foreclosed by a sale of the mortgaged premises." Maxwell v. Newton, 65 Wis. 261.

5. Johns v. Sergeant, 45 Miss. 332; Bush v. Sherman, 80 Ill. 160. A notice that, unless payment be made, the mortgagee will institute legal proceedings to gain possession, is not sufficient to support a sale. Bartlett v. Jull, 28 Grant's Ch. (Ont.) 140.

rule is that notice to the mortgagor or grantor in a trust deed, of intention to foreclose under the power of sale, or of time and place of sale, is not necessary, unless stipulated for in the instrument itself, or directed by statute to be given.¹ Neither is it necessary to notify the mortgagor of the intention to exercise an option to declare the whole debt due upon default in payment of an installment, or of interest.² The party exercising the power must, however, give personal notice whenever his previous conduct or statements have been such as to warrant the debtor, or party claiming under him, in believing that no sale would be made until he had received such notice. Though an assurance of this kind may not have the support of a valuable consideration, a sale in violation of it would be strong evidence of bad faith.³

A statutory requirement of service of notice upon the mortgagor or his "personal representative," is satisfied as to the interest of a deceased mortgagor's heir, by serving a notice upon such

3. Promise to Give Notice.—If the creditor has promised the debtor, after default, that he need not pay until payment is demanded, and that personal notice will be given him, a sale by the trustee without making any demand, and without any other notice than an advertisement published in an obscure newspaper which the debtor did not see, should be set aside as in fraud of his rights. Clevinger v. Ross, 109 Ill. 349.

Where the mortgagee may have thrown persons claiming under the mortgagor, off their guard by applying for relief in chancery, he should notify the mortgagor, or his assigns, of his intentions, before proceeding to sell under his power. But if a specific demand for payment is duly made upon the mortgagor or second mortgagee, such persons cannot claim that they were lulled into security by the pendency of the bill. Tartt v. Clayton, 109 Ill. 579.

Where the trustee had promised the holder of a subsequent mortgage, who accepted such mortgage on the strength of that promise, that he would give the mortgagee notice of default under the trust deed, before taking any steps to execute the power of sale, and afterwards he sold the property without notifying the mortgagee, who remained in ignorance of the sale, it was held that the sale was unfair, and that the mortgagee could redeem as against a purchaser with knowledge of the facts. Cassady v. Wallace, 102 Mo. 575.

Action for Damages.—A mortgagor may recover damages for such costs as he has been put to, by reason of failure to give notice of a sale when notice is required. Cockburn v. Edwards, 18 Ch. Div. 449.

A voluntary promise made by the holder of a mortgage, to the mortgagor's vendee, that he would not sell under the power without giving him personal notice, and a subsequent assignment of the mortgage to one who falsely represented that said vendee desired it, and who advertised the mortgage sale in an obscure paper, and sold the property during the vendee's absence, are not sufficient grounds to support an action at law against the assignee and purchaser at his sale, though the vendee had been forced to pay such purchaser an exorbitant sum to obtain a clear title. Randall v. Hazelton, 12 Allen (Mass.) 412. See also Wicks v. Caruthers, 13 Lea (Tenn.) 353.

Persons Under Disabilities.—Notice may be served on the persons indicated in the power, although such persons are under disabilities, as upon an infant. Bartlett v. Jull, 28 Grant's Ch. (Ont.) 140; Tracy v. Lawrence, 2 Dend. 403, or a lunatic, Mellerst v. Keen, heir where there is no executor or administrator.¹ But a general agent of a mortgagor cannot be considered as his personal representative, within the meaning of the statute.²

Where a mortgagor has given a mortgage with a power of sale, to be exercised after notice to himself, he cannot, by an arrangement with the mortgagee, after conveying his equity of redemption, waive his right to notice, so as to enable the mortgagee to exercise the power without notice.³

b. SUBSEQUENT INCUMBRANCERS AND PURCHASERS.—Parties to whom the mortgagor has subsequently mortgaged or conveyed his equity of redemption are not in privity with the first mortgagee, and are not ordinarily entitled to personal notice of his intention to exercise the power of sale;⁴ but if such parties have, by law, a right to receive notice, the insufficiency of service thereof upon any of them, affects the validity of the sale only as to those not properly served and others claiming under them.⁵

A subsequent mortgagee entitled to notice may maintain an action for damages against the mortgagee selling without notice.⁶

c. PERSON IN POSSESSION.—In Minnesota, the statute requires a copy of the notice of sale to be served on the "person in possession" of the mortgaged premises, at least four weeks before the day of sale, in the same manner as summonses are served in civil actions,⁷ and it is held that a failure to comply with this statute, where the premises are occupied, renders the foreclosure null and void as to all parties;⁸ also, that the subsequent waiver, by the person in possession at the time notice should have been served, of the failure to serve it upon him, cannot validate the sale as against other parties interested.⁹ It is not necessary that the notice should be served on the mortgagor's wife, where both are in occupation of the premises as a homestead.¹⁰

Where a trust deed contains a waiver of personal notice to the grantor, a failure to give notice to third parties to whom the land had been transferred prior to the sale, is no ground for setting it aside. Cleaver v. Green, 107 Ill. 67.

But where a mortgage contained a power to sell upon notice to a "mortgagor, his executors, administrators or assigns," the subsequent mortgagee was held to be entitled to notice as an assign, notwithstanding the fact that the mortgagor was still living, and was served with notice. Hoole v. Smith, 17 Ch. Div. 435. And in Bartlett v. Jull, 28 Grant's Ch. (Ont.) 140, it was held that where the notice was required to be given to the mortgagee, his heirs, executors, or administrators, notice must be given to the mortgagor, if alive, if not, then to his heirs and personal representatives.

6. Signing the Notice.—It is usual and proper, but not indispensable, unless made so by statute, for the mortgagee or trustee to personally sign the notice of sale under the power.¹ While a signature may not be necessary, yet, if the notice is signed improperly or without authority, it may be void, as where the notice is made in the name of a deceased mortgagee and purports to be by his authority. In such case, the defect cannot be cured by proof that, in fact, the notice was given by authority, and for the benefit of another person.²

The mere act of signing is not a matter involving the exercise of judgment, and may be done by an agent or attorney of the mortgagee or trustee.³

7. Description of Parties.—In some of the states, the notice is required to give the names of the original parties, the present holders of the security, etc. Trifling defects, such as the omission of a middle initial of a party's name, are not permitted to vitiate an otherwise sufficient notice,⁴ nor are slight errors in spelling the name of the mortgagee;⁵ but it is otherwise, if a wrong name be given as that of the mortgagor.⁶

Where the name of "the last assignee" is required to be given, this means an actual holder of the security; and it is not necessary to give the name of one to whom the mortgage had been transferred, as collateral security for a debt which was fully paid before publication of the notice.⁷

If not controlled by statute, an assignee may foreclose by giving a notice which mentions neither the record of the assignment nor the name of the assignee.⁸

It has been held that an omission to give the names of either mortgagor or mortgagee, is cured by a correct reference to the book and page of the record, because anyone desiring to learn the names can do so by inspecting the record.⁹

Dec. 95; Roche v. Farnsworth, 106 Mass. 509), and a notice which upon its face is declared to be the act of a designated person, and which, as such, would be void, cannot be made effectual by proof that it was really the act of another and undisclosed person, not even standing in a relation or privity with the person in whose name the notice was given. A notice by a mere stranger can effect nothing."

The signing of a notice of sale under a mortgage given to I. C., agent for A. B., as "I. C., agent for A. B., A. B. mortgagee in fact," is a sufficient signing by the mortgagee. Menard v. Crowe, 20 Minn. 448.

Name of Mortgagor.—A wife's mortgage on her own land is not invalidated by her husband's joining in its execution; nor is notice of a foreclosure sale rendered void by the fact that she is described therein merely as his wife. Yale v. Stevenson, 58 Mich. 537.

In one case, a notice which named the mortgagor, but not the mortgagee, and was not signed by the latter, and contained no reference to the record, was sustained.¹

It is not necessary that the notice should state the names of subsequent mortgagees or purchasers of the equity of redemption.²

8. Description of Mortgage.—Statutory provisions in respect to the description of the mortgage must be strictly followed in the notice; thus, where the statute required the notice to state "the date of the mortgage, and when recorded," a notice which omitted to give the date of recording was pronounced fatally defective, notwithstanding it gave the place, book, and page of the record, by reference to which the exact date could be ascertained.³ On the other hand, if the date and place of recording are correctly given in the notice, it is not bad because of an error in stating the number of the record book.⁴

Other courts have held that a mistake in giving the date of the execution of the mortgage, was cured by a correct description of the date of recording and the book and page of the record.⁵

9. Description of the Property.—In respect to the description of the premises intended to be sold, it is generally held that the notice of sale is sufficient if it follows the description contained in the mortgage or trust deed.⁶

The office of a description in the notice is merely to furnish information to the public by means of which, the location, and character of the property to be sold can be ascertained with reasonable certainty, and if the description is sufficiently accurate for such purpose, it is good, even though it contains some inaccuracies and is not as full and complete as a careful conveyancer would have drawn it in a deed.⁷

The notice should contain some reference to the general char-

A notice of sale describing the premises by metes and bounds, as described in the mortgage, and referring by book and page to the registry of deeds, and to a plan recorded in the office of the superintendent of public lands, contains a sufficient description. Stickney v. Evans, 127 Mass. 202.

7. Loveland v. Clark, 11 Colo. 265.

Undivided Interest.—In Johnson v. Cocks, 37 Minn. 530, where a notice of a sale described the property as, "The undivided half of lots two and three in block two, lot eight in block four," etc., it was held that the words "undivided half" applied only to lots two and acter of the property, as, for instance, whether it is a farm or a town lot,¹ but if the notice describes the land otherwise with reasonable certainty, it is good, though omitting the name of the town.²

Care should be taken to avoid confusion as to whether the premises referred to are the ones intended to be sold, or are given merely to fix the place of sale.³

It has been held that a notice describing a much larger quantity of land than that covered by the mortgage, is bad, on the ground that persons who might be disposed to purchase the quantity described in the mortgage, might not want so large a tract as was embraced in the notice, and therefore would not attend the sale.⁴

It is of much greater importance that the notice shall correctly state the nature of the estate in the property intended to be sold, inasmuch as statements of this character will have a controlling influence over the bidding. If the sale is to be made subject to another incumbrance, the amount thereof must be correctly given; and a false statement that the premises are subject to another mortgage, will warrant setting aside the sale.⁵

three, and that the objection that the notice purported to sell only the undivided half of the other lots described, was not tenable.

Realty and Personality.—In ejectment by the purchaser of land at foreclosure sale, under a mortgage covering both realty and personality, it cannot be objected that the notice of sale insufficiently described the personality, where the realty was described with sufficient particularity. First Nat. Bank v. Bell Silver, etc., Min. Co., 8 Mont. 32.

Where the notice correctly described the lot to be sold, and stated that all the improvements thereon would be sold with it, but incorrectly stated the number of houses, it was held sufficiently accurate, no one appearing to have been misled. Sumrall v. Chaffin, 48 Mo. 402.

3. A notice stated that there "will be sold at public auction for breach of the condition contained in said mortgage," at a time specified, "on the premises which are described as follows, viz.: a certain piece of land," describing it by metes and bounds. It was held that it was sufficiently clear from the notice, that the premises so described were to be sold, and not merely the locus upon which the sale was to be made. Streeter v. Ilsey, 151 Mass. 291.

4. Fenner v. Tucker, 6 R. I. 551.

Excessive Description.—A mortgage described the property as a certain lot, less the west twenty-five feet thereof, which amounted to about one-eighth of the entire lot. The notice of sale described the lot, but omitted the exception. It was held that, in the absence of evidence, that the variance affected the result, it could not be said to be misleading or prejudicial to any party interested. Schoch v. Birdsall, 48 Minn. 441.

5. Burnet v. Denniston, 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 35.

Sale Free from Prior Liens.—A foreclosure sale under a fourth mortgage, purporting to be of the entire estate, free from all incumbrances, is void as against the mortgagor. The mortgagee has no right to sell a greater interest than that covered by his mortgage, any more than he would have to sell a less interest. Donahue v. Chase, 130 Mass. 137. See also O'Connell v. Kelly, 114 Mass. 97; Alden v. Wilkins, 117 Mass. 216; Morton v. Hall, 118 Mass. 511; Cook v. Basley, 123 Mass. 396.

In Dearnaley v. Chase, 136 Mass. 288, a sale under a second mortgage given to one Slater, purported to be of the entire estate, not merely the equity of redemption, the purchasers assuming the prior mortgage as part of the purchase price. On a bill to redeem, the court said: "We are of opinion that this was not a valid execution of

If the mortgage is a first lien covering the entire estate, a notice stating merely that "all the equity of redemption" will be sold, is bad, because it suggests prior or continuing incumbrances, and tends to keep bidders from attending.¹

10. Stating Amount Due.—The common practice, whether regulated by statute or not, is to embody in the notice of sale, a statement of the amount claimed to be due under the mortgage. But unless made so by statute, it does not seem to have been held that such statement is essential to a valid notice. Nor is there apparently any good reason for requiring it. The debtor must be supposed to know how much is due, and intending bidders cannot be particularly concerned further than to satisfy themselves that a default has occurred, and that the power of sale has become operative. The state of the account can have no effect upon the purchaser's title, and hence will not influence his bid.²

Under statutes requiring the notice to state the amount claimed to be due, all that is demanded of the party exercising the power is, that he shall make the statement honestly and in good faith. The notice will not be invalidated by an excessive claim, if the mistake was caused by a misconstruction of the contract, or by an erroneous computation.³

An excessive claim is to be considered according to its magni-

the power in the mortgage to Slater, so as to foreclose the mortgage. He had a right to sell what was conveyed to him by his mortgage, which was the land subject to the prior mortgage, or, in other words, the equity of redemption from that mortgage, but no right to sell the entire estate as unincumbered, requiring the purchaser to assume the first mortgage as part of the consideration, if he chose to have it remain upon the property." The court, however, held that the deed to the purchaser operated as an assignment of the Slater mortgage and debt.

1. In Fowle v. Merrill, 10 Allen (Mass.) 350, the court, in holding such a notice fatally defective, said: "It offered to the public only the mortgagor's interest in the premises, and did not include the mortgagee's. The power was to sell the whole estate, including the equity of redemption, and gave no authority to sell the equity of redemption alone. If only the equity were to be sold, it is difficult to see what would become of the mortgage. Certainly a person who might wish to purchase would only infer from the advertisement that he could buy an estate on which the incumbrance would continue. As the notice of sale was not in conformity with the power of sale in the mortgage deed, the attempted sale in pursuance of it was ineffectual, and passed no title which can bar the right of redemption."

In Callaghan v. O'Brien, 136 Mass. 378, the notice of sale was of "all and singular the premises described in said mortgage, namely, a certain parcel of land," describing it, and stating that "the above premises are to be sold subject to taxes." The terms of sale referred to the premises as "frame building and land," etc. It was held that it was the intention to sell the land, and not merely an equity of redemption, and that the purchaser must have so understood. On failure of the mortgagee to give a good title, the purchaser was entitled to recover his deposit.

Excessive Claims.—The question of the effect of an excessive claim in the notice has been before the supreme court of Minnesota a number of times, and the rule stated in the text is now firmly established.

In the earliest case, Spencer v. Annan, 4 Minn. 542, where the notice claimed $1,606.60, when in fact but tude or the apparent want of good faith, if an attempt is made to redeem.¹

Where the notice is required to specify the amount claimed to be due "at the date of the notice," it is not indispensable that a date be affixed to the published notice. The time of its first publication will be regarded as its date.²

Where the mortgagee is authorized to declare the principal debt due upon default in payment of interest or an installment of principal, a recital of such default, and that the option has been exercised to declare the whole debt due and payable, sufficiently shows the amount claimed, to be due.³

If one mortgage covering several different tracts, is intended as a separate mortgage upon each tract for a specified portion of the debt, with the right to foreclose as to each tract upon default in payment of its portion, one notice of sale may be made to include as many tracts as are covered by the sums in default, but it must state separately the amount claimed to be due upon each of such tracts.⁴

Under a statute requiring the notice to state the amount of taxes, if any, paid by the mortgagee,⁵ it is not necessary to give the year and levy, the date of payment, nor to state that the party holds the tax receipts.⁶

11. Stating Place of Sale.—(See also sub-title, Place of Making Sale).—The place where the sale is to be made should be $964.62 was due under the contract, the court set the sale aside.

In Ramsey v. Merriam, 6 Minn. 168, the amount claimed in the notice was $16,870, and the mortgagor contended that but $16,385 was due, the balance being disputed items of interest and exchange; but the court refused to disturb the sale.

In Butterfield v. Farnham, 19 Minn. 85, it was held that, in the absence of evidence of injury or fraudulent intent, a claim of $34,251.28, being an excess of $7,335.68 over the amount actually due, did not vitiate the sale. See also Bowers v. Hechtman, 45 Minn. 238.

4. Bitzer v. Campbell, 47 Minn. 221; Mason v. Goodnow, 41 Minn. 9.

In Child v. Morgan, 51 Minn. 116, a mortgage covering three lots was given to secure a note of $700, the condition of defeasance being that the mortgagor should pay that sum, "said $700 to be a specific lien of $233.33 on each of the above described lots, releasable at any time by the payment of said amount of $233.33, together with accrued interest." The court held that this was in effect a separate mortgage of $233.33 upon each lot separately; that a notice of foreclosure, stating only the amount of the entire debt claimed to be due, without specifying the amount due separately on any of the three lots, was insufficient, and a sale of the three lots together for a gross sum was invalid; also, that the sale was not aided by the fact that the lots were first offered separately, but without receiving any bid. See also Hull v. King, 38 Minn. 349.

5. Minnesota Gen. St. (1878), ch. 81. 6. Jones v. Cooper, 8 Minn. 334.

A notice stated the amount of debt and interest claimed to be due, and that the premises would be sold, "to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises." It was held that this notice was not to be construed as claiming that anything was then due for taxes previously paid, but merely that the proceeds of the sale, if sufficient, would be applied, so far as necessary, to the payment of any taxes designated in the notice with sufficient certainty to enable the public to find the locality without seeking other information. If the designated place has, in fact, no existence, the notice is of no effect, and no valid sale can be made under it.¹ Whatever provisions are contained in the mortgage or deed as to the place of sale, must be followed in the notice.²

Under a statute requiring the "place of sale" to be given, it is sufficient to designate it as in front of the office of the register of deeds of the county, without giving the location of his office,³ and if the notice itself cannot be produced, parol evidence is admissible to show that the place of sale was properly designated.⁴

12. Date and Hour of Sale—Adjournment.—A notice which omitted to fix any date for the sale, would be no notice at all; and for the same reason, the giving of an impossible or unreasonable date would invalidate the sale, unless it can be seen to a reasonable certainty that the date given was the result of mistake, and of such a character that no one would be misled by it.⁵ A notice which gives the date and hour of sale, but omits the year, is cured on the premises which might be due, and payable at the date of sale; and that the notice was sufficient. Kirkpatrick v. Lewis, 46 Minn. 164.

1. In Bottineau v. Aetna L. Ins. Co., 31 Minn. 125, a notice of a mortgage sale named as the place of sale "the front door of the courthouse in the village of Crookston," when in fact there was no courthouse, nor any place known as a courthouse, in that village. The court held that the mortgagee might treat the whole proceeding as a nullity, and proceed anew to execute a power.

2. In Colcord v. Bettinson, 131 Mass. 233, it appeared that, subsequent to the incorporation of the south part of Malden as the town of Everett, the plaintiff, who owned and lived upon land in the latter place, mortgaged it to the defendant, describing herself as of Malden, and the property as situated in the south part of Malden. The mortgage provided that, upon default, and upon publishing a notice of sale in a newspaper printed in the county, a sale of the premises might be made "at public auction, in said Malden." The notice of sale was published in a newspaper printed in Everett, and stated that the sale would take place on the premises described in the mortgage, "to wit, a lot of land in the south part of Malden." The sale took place, as advertised, on the premises in the town of Everett. The land was described in the notice by metes and bounds, and the date of the mortgage, together with the book and page where recorded, were also given. It was held that the notice was sufficient, and that the sale was made at the place required by the mortgage.

4. Wilkerson v. Allen, 67 Mo. 502.

5. See Fenner v. Tucker, 6 R. I. 551, where the giving of the wrong year was held to invalidate a sale.

Harmless Mistakes.—In Jensen v. Weinlander, 25 Wis. 477, it is held that a published notice of sale to take place in the year 1761, instead of 1861, which was the year the notice was published, does not render the sale void, as the mistake could have misled no one.

In Gray v. Shaw, 14 Mo. 341, where a notice dated December 7th, advertised a sale to take place "on the 28th day of December next," it was held that a sale on the 28th of the same December was valid, as the date given could not have deceived intending purchasers.

Dating the notice of sale April 23d, 1858, instead of 1868, the year of the sale, is a mistake obvious on inspection, and does not invalidate the proceedings. Mowry v. Sanborn, 68 N. Y. 153.

Sale After Death of Grantor.—The Missouri Statute (Wag. St., p. 94), forbidding a trustee's sale within nine months after the death of the grantor, refers to trust deeds executed by the decedent, and not to those executed by

by the date printed in the newspaper as the date of its issue.¹ The hour of sale should in all cases be given, but it does not seem to be of so much importance as the date; and if neither the statute nor the instrument requires the hour to be stated in the notice, its omission will not invalidate the sale, particularly where there is laches in raising the objection.² Even where by statute the "time of sale" is required to be stated, it seems that a notice stating the day, but not the hour of sale, will not necessarily invalidate the foreclosure.³

In the absence of a showing that anyone was prejudiced, a notice that the sale would take place "between the hours of 10 o'clock a. m. and 4 o'clock p. m." is not fatally indefinite.⁴

It has been held that where there is a local custom by which sales are almost invariably made after one o'clock in the afternoon, a sale at eleven in the forenoon was irregular.⁵

If the sale is advertised for a certain hour, it should begin promptly at that hour, but if intending purchasers are not shown to have left on account of the delay, a valid sale may be made at any time during the following hour. Thus, the hour of twelve will be deemed to last until one o'clock if the attendance continues.⁶ But a sale made before the hour stated in the notice, is equivalent to a sale without any notice, and is void.⁷

Statutory provisions requiring notice of sale to be published for a certain length of time prior to the date of sale, are construed third persons on the same property. Lass v. Sternberg, 50 Mo. 124.

1. Parmly v. Walker, 102 Ill. 617. In this case the notice called for a sale on "Wednesday, 28th of August at 11 o'clock a. m." The newspaper in which it was published was dated 1878.

2. Meier v. Meier, 105 Mo. 411; Hamilton v. Lubukee, 51 Ill. 415; Thorwarth v. Armstrong, 20 Minn. 464; 2 Jones Mortg. (4th ed.), § 1846.

3. The Minnesota Rev. St. requires sales under powers to take place "between the hours of nine o'clock in the forenoon and the setting of the sun;" and also requires the notice to state the "time and place of sale." A notice under this statute, specifying merely the day of sale without designating any hour, was acquiesced in for twelve years after the sale, and the court refused to interfere. Berry, J., speaking for the court, said: "It cannot be said that such a notice does not specify the time of sale, and apprise the mortgagor and the public thereof. It can only be said that it does not specify the time with as much particularity as it ought to do, by designating the hour of sale according to common usage and the better practice. The indefiniteness of the notice was then, at most, an irregularity, and whatever the mortgagor might have done upon reasonable application, such irregularity cannot be permitted to overthrow a sale which, so far as appears, has never been attacked until the present action was instituted, nearly twelve years after the sale took place." Menard v. Crowe, 20 Minn. 448.

Sale After Hour.—Where the trustee appeared at the place of sale at ten o'clock a. m., the hour stated in the notice, and opened the sale by reading the notice, and remained in charge until the consummation of the sale, which was after eleven o'clock, but delayed the proceedings in order to enable complainants to apply for an injunction restraining the sale, it was held that the delay did not invalidate the sale. Erwin v. Hall, 18 Ill. App. 315.

7. Richards v. Finnegan, 45 Minn. 208. In this case it was held that the notice of sale, stating the hour as eleven as not requiring the sale to occur immediately after the expiration of the period of publication. An interval of two weeks would not be unreasonable or affect the validity of the sale.¹

While the date of sale may, in a proper case, be changed, pending the publication of the notice,² yet if the owner or other parties interested are misled by reason of the change, and lose the opportunity of attending the sale by not learning of the substituted date, the sale will be set aside.³

A sale is not necessarily invalid because made on a legal holiday, other than Sunday.⁴

A trustee, mortgagee, or public officer charged with the duty of making sales under powers, has always by implication the power to adjourn the sale to a future day or from time to time, if, in his judgment, the interests of the parties will be promoted by so doing,⁵ and if he sees that a proper sale cannot be made at the time advertised, it would be not merely his privilege, but his duty, to postpone the sale.⁶

While it is sometimes the duty of the trustee or mortgagee, in order to prevent a sacrifice of the property, to adjourn the sale to a more favorable time,⁷ yet he must in all cases give adequate notice of the adjournment, and must strictly comply with the statutory requirements, or the terms of the power, as to posting and publishing the new notice.⁸ But it seems that the notice of the adjourned sale need not be so minute and specific in matters o'clock a. m., and the sheriff's certificate reciting that at the time stated in the notice he sold the property "at 10 o'clock a. m.," are sufficient to put a purchaser on inquiry as to the hour of sale, and that the mortgagor is not estopped by having taken no steps to clear the record.

of description and recitals as the original advertisement. If it clearly describes the property and gives the time and place of sale, it will be sufficient,¹ and it need not be published for the same length of time as the original notice, unless so required by statute or the terms of the power.²

If the sale is properly commenced on the day advertised, and is not completed at the close of that day, it may be continued to the next day without a new publication;³ but the trustee should publicly announce his intention to resume it, and if upon the failure of a bidder to comply with the terms of sale, he allows the bidders to disperse without proclamation that he will proceed to resell, it is his duty to publish a new notice.⁴ The time of adjournment as announced by the trustee should correspond with that afterwards published, as a change in the date might mislead intending purchasers and render the sale invalid.⁵

After the publication of a notice of postponement, the mortgagee or trustee cannot ignore it and proceed to sell at the date originally given.⁶

13. Publication of Notice.—Unless required by statute or the terms of the power, the trustee or mortgagee need not publish any notice, but may make a private sale.⁷

When public notice is required by the deed, however, the sale may be set aside for failure to advertise.⁸

If the grantor expressly consents that the trustee may sell upon a shorter notice than that required by the deed, he becomes estopped to attack the sale on the ground of insufficient notice.⁹ It has been held, however, that such a requirement cannot be changed by the oral consent of the parties.¹⁰

If the power authorizes a private sale, there is no objection to the mortgagee entering into a contract for sale and the place where publication of notice of sale is required by the deed to be made, is cut off by the existence of war, will not justify a sale made without such publication. If the power cannot be complied with, it is for the time suspended.¹

Where a trust deed requires notice to be published in newspapers printed in two designated counties, a sale under a notice published in only one county, is void. The purchaser must take notice of such requirement, particularly where the deed has been recorded.²

The publication is sufficient if made at the place designated in the mortgage, notwithstanding an error in the record as to such designation. The mortgagee cannot be affected by the fault of the recording officer.³

An unreasonable delay on the part of the owner in attacking a sale under a power, upon the ground that the notice was not properly published, will bar him from disputing the sufficiency of the publication.⁴

In many of the states, it is now provided by statute that a notice of intention to sell shall be published for a specified length of time in some newspaper. Such provisions must, of course, be strictly complied with in order to make a valid execution of the power.⁵ The statute in force at the time of publishing notice of Clerical Error.—A mortgage required the notice of sale to be published "in a newspaper printed in the Chicago Times." The words "Chicago Times" were written in a blank space evidently intended for the name of the city or town where the newspaper was published. It was held that a publication in the Chicago Times was proper. Strother v. Law, 54 Ill. 413.

In Watson v. Sherman, 84 Ill. 263, a mortgage provided that a sale under the power could be made by advertising the same for a specified period in a newspaper published in a certain town, "by posting up written or printed notices in four public places" in the county. The court held that the word "by" was intended for "or," and that the notice might be given in either mode.

When Statute Governs.—Under a trust deed providing that sale might be made on default after giving such reasonable notice "as might be usual or provided by law in the State of New York," it was held that the New York Statute on the subject of notice must be complied with. Shillaber v. Robinson, 97 U.S. 68.

Court Designating Newspaper.—The Missouri Statute (Rev. St. 1889, 312), requiring circuit court judges to act as a board for the purpose of awarding to newspapers the publication of "all advertisements, judicial notices, and orders of publication required by law to be made," does not apply to the publica-sale, and not the one in force when the mortgage was executed, governs as to the form, contents, and period of publication. The application of a new statute to an existing mortgage affects only the remedy, and does not impair the contract.¹

Statutory provisions regulating foreclosures under powers of sale, have no extra-territorial force, and cannot be invoked to restrain a sale made within the state, of land situated in another state. Accordingly, the courts of New York have refused to interfere with the sale upon notice published in the city of New York, in compliance with the terms of a mortgage on land in Colorado, and not shown to be in violation of any law of the latter state, though such method of publication would, under the New York statute, render the sale of property in New York invalid.²

Where the statute prescribes the contents of a notice of sale, and the manner of its publication, these requirements cannot be varied by the terms of the power.³ And if the original publication is insufficient, it cannot be cured by postponing the sale and publishing notice of that fact, where neither notice is published for the statutory length of time.⁴

Under a statute prescribing publication of notice, in case none was provided for by the terms of the power, the statute may be followed where the method of publication agreed upon in the power cannot possibly be carried out, as for want of a daily paper in the county.⁵

When notices are required to be published in a "newspaper," one printed in the English language is always intended, unless the contrary is expressed.⁶

It is not clearly settled what is requisite to constitute a "newspaper" within the meaning of statutes or powers requiring notices of sale to be published in some newspaper. The term itself implies that the paper shall be devoted to some extent to the publication of current general news items; but it seems that if a few such items are regularly and in good faith published, the paper is none the less a newspaper because it is chiefly devoted to the interests of some special class or religious denomination.⁷

tion of notices of sale under powers in trust deeds; and such notices may be published in a paper other than the one designated as official by the judges. Dart v. Bagley, 110 Mo. 42.

Cost of Publication.—Where the statute requires notice of a sale to be published in "one or more" newspapers for a specified time, and a notice is properly published in one paper, and also for a part of the required time in another, the cost of the latter publication cannot be charged against the property. Brown v. Ogg, 85 Ind. 234.

Unless the statute or power otherwise provides, a weekly newspaper is a proper medium for the publication; and where the notice is to be published in a "public newspaper" for a given number of weeks, it may be published once a week in a daily paper.¹

A journal of limited circulation, devoted to legal matters and advertising, has been held to be a proper medium of publication.²

Evidence of the extent of circulation of the paper in which the notice of sale was published, is not necessary, unless the proper issues have been raised upon the question of circulation.³

If a proper paper is selected, a change in its name, and its removal to another part of the county pending publication of the notice, does not affect the validity of the publication,⁴ nor does its consolidation with another paper, during the period of publication, if there is no interruption in the successive publications.⁵

If a daily paper is employed, the notice need not necessarily be inserted in each day's issue, but may be published at weekly intervals; but it is not permissible to change the publication from the daily issue to a weekly reprint of the same paper.⁶

It is not essential to the validity of the publication that the notice shall be published in all of the editions of the paper struck off on the days of its publication, provided that the edition in which it does appear is a bona fide one,⁷ neither is it requisite that the notice be published in the Sunday editions of a daily paper, ination, but containing in each issue a column of the general news of the day, is a "newspaper" within the meaning of Gen. St. Minn. (1878), ch. 81, in which notices of foreclosure sales may be published. Hull v. King, 38 Minn. 349.

Daily Newspaper Not Necessary.—Where a trust deed required an advertisement of the sale "in some newspaper" for at least twenty days, it was held that a notice given by four insertions in a weekly paper, beginning more than twenty days before the sale, was sufficient, and that notice in a daily paper was not necessary. Campbell v. Tagge, 30 Iowa 305; Leffler v. Armstrong, 4 Iowa 482.

6. In Stine v. Wilkson, 10 Mo. 75, "twenty days' previous notice" of the time of sale was required. One notice was published in a daily newspaper twenty-one days before the sale, and after that, the notice was published in a weekly edition, or reprint of the same paper, and taken out of the daily edition. This was held insufficient, the court saying: "Would one publication of a notice by a sheriff of an intended sale of real estate, under execution, made in a newspaper twenty days before the sale, be held to be a compliance with the statute which directs him to give twenty days' previous notice of the time, etc., by an advertisement in some newspaper printed in the county? We apprehend that such is not the general understanding, nor the practice in the county, but that such notices are continuous to the day of sale." Cited with approval in German Bank v. Stumpf, 73 Mo. 311.

because the law does not presume that secular business receives public attention on that day.¹

Under a trust deed providing for a sale "after first advertising the time, place, and terms thereof for five days," a Sunday occurring between the first and last publications is to be counted as one of the five days required.²

It will be presumed, in the absence of proof, that the first publication in a daily paper was made on the day the notice bears date.³

If the deed or statute directs the notice to be published in a newspaper "printed" in the county, a sale cannot be supported merely by proof that the paper was "published" there.⁴

If the power does not designate the paper in which the notice is to be published, the choice of a paper rests with the trustee or mortgagee.⁵ In making such choice, he must act in good faith; and where, though nominally complying with the terms of the power, he purposely selects an obscure paper, printed in a remote part of the county, and the debtor's interests are prejudiced thereby, the court will set aside the sale.⁶ The mere fact that the mortgagee selected for publication of the notice, a paper which was not adapted to giving the proposed sale so much publicity, or to procuring the presence of so many bidders, as another paper published nearer the premises would have done, is no evidence of a fraudulent purpose. All that can be required is that the paper selected shall have a bona fide circulation.⁷

The trustee, if not restrained by the deed, may, in the exercise of a fair discretion, publish notice in a newspaper located in another state.⁸

The publication, whether required by the statute, or by the terms of the power, must be continuous during the specified period; in other words, there must be no interval between the expiration of one publication and the commencement of the next.⁹ A

Designating Newspaper.—A provision in a trust deed that a notice of the sale should be published in some newspaper published in the county of Morgan or an adjoining county, is not void for uncertainty. In Washington v. Bassett, 15 R. I. 563, where the mortgage required "twenty days' notice of such sale in some one of the public newspapers printed in said city of Providence," and the sale took place August 12th under a notice published in a daily paper on July 22d, 25th, 29th and August 1st, 5th, 8th and 11th, it was held that the notice was insufficient, not having been published continuously for twenty days in the paper selected.

In German Bank v. Stumpf, 73 Mo. 311, where a trust deed provided for giving thirty days' notice of sale, and it single insertion of the notice, however, may sometimes be sufficient if the power does not seem to contemplate a continuous publication.¹

It is not necessary that the sale be advertised to take place on a day immediately following the expiration of the required period of publication. A publication for a greater length of time than required, or a publication expiring some little time before the day of sale, cannot prejudice any rights of the parties interested.²

Conversely, under a statute requiring at least thirty days' notice, it is not necessary that the last publication shall be at least thirty days before the sale.³

In determining whether the publication was begun the required length of time before the sale, the first day of publication should be excluded, but the day of sale may be included.⁴

Where the notice is required to be published for a certain number of days or weeks, the full number must intervene between the first day of publication and the day of sale, the latter being counted. A sale before that time would be premature and void, was shown that the sale was made under a notice, the first publication of which occurred more than thirty days before the sale, but which was published only twenty-seven times, it was held that the sale would not be disturbed, no injury or inadequacy of price being shown to have resulted.

1. Jenkins v. Pierce, 98 Ill. 646. In Weld v. Rees, 48 Ill. 428, where the deed provided for a sale "after publishing a notice in a newspaper published in the city of Chicago ten days before the day of such sale," it was held that one insertion ten days before the sale was sufficient, as the language used seemed to exclude the idea that the notice should be published continuously for that length of time. But the court said that there might have been a question as to its sufficiency if "notice for ten days" had been required.

2. Howard v. Hatch, 29 Barb. (N. Y.) 297.

In Taylor v. Reid, 103 Ill. 349, the court intimated that if the publication had expired an unreasonably long time before the day of sale, it would have the same effect as no notice whatever.

Where the last day of publication was required to be ten days before the sale, it was held that while the last notice could not be less, it might lawfully be more, than ten days before the sale, subject only to the qualification that the interval must not be unreasonable. Tooke v. Newman, 75 Ill. 215.

Failure to Publish on Day of Sale.—In Patterson v. Miller, 52 Md. 388, it appeared that in consequence of a failure to publish the notice on the day of the proposed sale, a public impression was produced that the sale would not occur. It was held that a sale made on that day, at which an inadequate price was realized, should be set aside. Ordinarily, however, such an impression would not exist merely because the notice was not seen on the day of the sale.

Under a trust deed providing that a sale might be made after "giving thirty days' notice" by posting a notice at the place of sale, "and by advertising the same in some newspaper published in the city of Austin, Texas, for at least thirty days prior to the day of sale, such publication to be made four times in succession in said paper," it was held that thirty days must elapse between the first and the last insertion and the day of sale. Howard v. Fulton, 79 Tex. 231.

4. Magnusson v. Williams, 111 Ill. 450; Worley v. Naylor, 6 Minn. 192; Howard v. Hatch, 29 Barb. (N. Y.) 297.

The first day of publication is to be excluded, and the last (being the day of sale) is to be included in making up the prescribed number of days. Bowles v. Brauer, 89 Va. 466.

Under a trust deed requiring ten days' notice of sale, where the first publication was made on the 8th day of October, a sale on the 18th was held void, even though the notice had been published the requisite number of times.¹

In New York, where the notice is required to be published once each week for twelve successive weeks, it has been held that the first publication need not be eighty-four days before the sale, if the requisite number of weekly publications be made.²

It has been held that the word month in the New York statute relating to the publication of notices, means a lunar month.³

Of course the publication should not begin until default has occurred; hence, a publication begun on the same day the debt becomes due, is premature and void. It should not appear until the next day.⁴ If, by the terms of the power, the sale is not to be made until after default has continued for a stated time, the required period of publication cannot begin until the period of continued default has elapsed. The two periods are not synchronous, but successive.⁵

Mere clerical errors in the publication, such as could not have misled anyone, will not justify setting aside the sale.⁶

The statutes usually provide for filing an affidavit of publication; the power to make a valid sale, however, does not depend upon the affidavit, but upon the fact of publication, and this may there having been only nine days' publication, excluding the first. Lerch v. Snyder, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 421.

1. Siemers v. Schrader, 88 Mo. 20; Enochs v. Miller, 60 Miss. 19.

In Bacon v. Kennedy, 56 Mich. 329, the court, per Campbell, J., said: "The only question in this case is whether a statutory foreclosure is valid where the sale was made on a notice which, although published twelve times in separate weeks, provided for selling on a day less than twelve weeks from the first publication. The statute does not say that the notice shall merely be published twelve times, once a week, but once a week 'for twelve successive weeks.' The object of this was manifestly to give that full interval between the first notice and the sale." See also Gantz v. Toles, 40 Mich. 725.

2. George v. Arthur, 2 Hun (N. Y.) 406; Howard v. Hatch, 29 Barb. (N. Y.) 297.

A publication beginning December 7th and ending March 1st next, is not a compliance with the statute requiring twelve weeks' publication. Bunce v. Reed, 16 Barb. (N. Y.) 347. But under a statute requiring six weeks' publication, a notice published on August 3d and each week thereafter up to and including September 14th—the day of sale—was held sufficient. Worley v. Naylor, 6 Minn. 192.

Constitutionality of Statute.—The New York Act of 1842, reducing the period of publishing the notice of sale from twenty-four weeks to twelve weeks, is not unconstitutional as to its operation upon mortgages existing at the time of its enactment. James v. Stull, 9 Barb. (N. Y.) 482.

In Massachusetts, it has been held that where the power is to sell the land "by public auction, first publishing a notice of the time and place of sale, once each week for three successive weeks," it is not necessary that the first day of publication shall be twenty-one days before the day of sale. Dexter v. Shepard, 117 Mass. 480; Frothingham v. March, 1 Mass. 247.

5. In Macon, etc., *R. Co. v. Georgia R. be shown independently of the affidavit which is merely prima facie evidence.¹ It is no objection to the publisher's affidavit that the copy of notice attached does not appear to have been actually cut from the newspaper in which publication was made. That it is a true copy is sufficient.²

An omission in the purchaser's deed of a recital that the sale was advertised as required by the terms of the power, may be supplied by evidence aliunde.³

It has been held that the burden of proving that proper notice of a sale under a power was given, is upon the party claiming under the sale, even where he is defendant and the bill affirmatively charges that there was no publication.⁴

14. New Publication.—A sale is not invalidated by the fact that it was twice advertised, where the second notice was rendered necessary by reason of a defect in the first which was abandoned, and no one is shown to have been misled by the substituted publication.⁵

15. Posting Notices.—It is sometimes provided that the notices of sale shall be posted in public places before the sale. Such requirements, whether by statute or the terms of the power, must be strictly complied with; and it will not answer to post the notices and immediately take them down, thereby preventing the public from obtaining the proper information.⁶ When the notice has been once properly posted as required by the statute or power, it will be presumed, until the contrary is shown, that it remained posted up to the day of sale.⁷ But even though it be shown that the notices did not remain posted during all the time, this would not affect the validity of the sale in the absence of fraud. Unless expressly required, it is not the duty of the party executing the power, to guard against removal or destruction of the notices.⁸

When the notice is required by the terms of the power to be posted in a particular place, no other place, however public, will suffice; and it makes no difference that the trustee is prevented by the owner of the place designated, from posting the notice there;⁹ nor is it any excuse that there was no such place as the one specified. The proper remedy in such case is to obtain judicial foreclosure.¹⁰

A requirement that the notice shall be posted "at the courthouse door," has been held to be sufficiently complied with by posting it in the courthouse corridor, about forty feet from the front door, at the side of a stairway leading to the court room, upon a bulletin board furnished by the county for posting notices of sheriff's sales.¹

A notice posted on the inside of the post-office door, where it was visible to the public except on Sundays, was held sufficient; the law does not contemplate that such notices shall be seen on Sunday.²

Under a requirement that notices shall be posted in three public places in the county, it is permissible to post two—and possibly all three—notice in different places in the same city or village.³

A local custom among auctioneers of posting notices upon the doors or in the windows of houses to be sold, stating the time and place of sale, does not have the force of law or contract, and a sale made without observing such custom is valid.⁴

The act of posting notices may be done by an agent of the trustee.⁵

XVI. RESALE UNDER POWER.—If, by reason of irregularities in the proceedings, a mortgagee's or trustee's sale is ineffectual and void, it is considered that the power has never been exercised, and a new sale under it may be made.⁶ As, if the bidder to whom the property is struck off refuses to pay the amount of 408, a statute required that one of the notices of sale should be posted at the place of holding the last term of the district court. At the time of posting the notices under a mortgage, no term of court had ever been held in the county, but the notices were posted in three public places in the county, one of which was the office of the clerk of the district court. In holding that the sale was invalid, the court, per Lowe, C. J., said: "The power to deprive a man of his property without the intervention of the processes of the law of procedure, is, to some extent, an extraordinary, not to say a severe, power, which should not be exercised except in the particular method prescribed by law. If we sustain the sheriff's sale and deed in this case, we would go beyond the law and sanction an omission to comply with one of its important requirements. This we are unwilling to do, particularly as the plaintiff had another plain remedy which we think he should have pursued. In the absence, however, of such a remedy, and rather than that there should be a failure of justice, we do not say that, under some circumstances, we would not so construe the existing law in question as to advance the remedy, if a different construction should have the effect to defeat and destroy a right. Yet, under the circumstances attending this case, we think it safest to hold that, inasmuch as the sheriff, without any fault of his, did not do those things which, under the law, conferred upon him the power to sell, that the title of the defendant to the premises mortgaged was never divested."

his bid, or fails to comply with the terms of sale, the person conducting the sale may immediately, before the bidders have dispersed, announce his intention to resell, and call for other bids,¹ or he may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, strike off the property to the next highest bidder.² But the sale cannot be proceeded with, even on the same day, if in the meantime the bidders have dispersed. In such case, a new advertisement is necessary.³

Doubts having arisen as to the validity of a trustee's conveyance, the purchaser deeded back to the trustee, who again sold the property to the same purchaser, giving him a deed reciting the facts, and purporting to convey all the interest of the grantor in the trust deed. It was held that whether the first sale and deed were void or not, the purchaser was invested with the legal and equitable title. Fulton v. Johnson, 24 W. Va. 95.

Power Exhausted by First Sale.—A trust deed required the trustee to give ninety days' notice before selling. He advertised and made a sale in all respects regular and valid, except that only eighty-nine days' notice was given. The plaintiff became the purchaser and received a deed from the trustee. Subsequently, the trustee on discovering the defect in the notice, re-advertised, giving ninety-five days' notice, again sold the property to the plaintiff, and gave him another deed. In ejectment brought against the debtor's grantee, it was held that while the first sale and deed were ineffectual to deprive the debtor of his equitable estate, the trustee nevertheless divested himself of his legal title under the trust deed; that the first sale extinguished the power of sale so far as the original trustee was concerned; and that his attempted resale and second conveyance was a nullity, and did not cut off the right of redemption. The court, per Helm, J., said: "An effort on his part to exercise the power originally vested in him, by an attempted resale or a second deed, is of no more force and effect than if the same proceedings were taken by one who had never been connected with the power." The court also observed that in such cases, "Appropriate equitable relief is usually obtained in one of the following modes:

the cumulative remedy of a regular judicial foreclosure and sale is allowed; or a decree is entered requiring the grantee to execute the power in accordance with the terms of the trust deed, as the trustee should have done; or the execution of the power is, by decree, devolved upon a new trustee appointed for the purpose." *Stephens v. Where, at a foreclosure sale, the sheriff sold the premises to the highest bidder, the mortgagee, for $500, and, about fifteen minutes later, having in the meantime sold another tract, he again offered the premises first sold and they were bid in by the same mortgagee for $542, it was held that the power was exhausted by the first sale, and the second was a nullity. Paquin v. Braley, 10 Minn. 379.

At a trustee's sale, the premises were struck off to the highest bidder, who, upon being asked by the trustee what she could do, replied that she did not know, and soon after went away without tendering the purchase price or getting a deed, and did not return; whereupon the property was again offered for sale by the trustee and struck off to the plaintiff at a higher price. It was held that the trustee's conduct was not oppressive; the sale being for cash, he had a right to demand immediate payment; and it was proper for him to resell before the bidders dispersed, and thus avoid the necessity of re-advertising. Davis v. Hess, 103 Mo. 31.

highest bidder, but is unable to produce the money, he is not in a position to complain of the carrying out of an arrangement publicly made at the time between the trustee and all the other bidders and parties in interest, to the effect that if the debtor failed to raise the money within three days, the trustee should convey the property to the next highest bidder.¹

If the trustee is directed by the power to make a public sale only on a particular day named, and he sells on that day, but fails to compel the purchaser to complete his purchase, it seems that his power is exhausted and he cannot resell on a later day, even after a new advertisement.² Where, upon the failure of the successful bidder to complete his purchase, the trustee makes a resale, the measure of damages as against the first purchaser is not conclusively the difference of price between the two sales; but if the second sale was made after due notice, and was fairly conducted, such difference of price may be taken as the prima facie measure of damages.³ The party aggrieved by the trustee's wrongful act in releasing a responsible purchaser and reselling for a lower price, is not bound to repudiate the second sale and enforce the liability of the first purchaser; but he may abide by the resale and sue the trustee for the difference in price between the two sales.⁴

In some of the states it is provided by statute, that where the mortgage is given to secure the payment of installments, each installment shall be regarded as a separate mortgage and may be foreclosed as such; and that a redemption from a sale for an installment shall not prevent a subsequent foreclosure sale for other installments. But if the premises consist of a single tract, the statutes contemplate but one sale, from the proceeds of which the entire debt secured, though not all due, shall be paid.⁵

Collusive Resale.—The grantor in a trust deed having fled from the state, the trustee sold the property under the power, and the defendants became the purchasers at a price sufficient to pay the trust debt and leave a surplus. The defendants, after receiving a deed from the trustee, became apprehensive that they would be compelled to pay this surplus to other creditors of the grantor, and thereupon conveyed the property back to the trustee, and induced him to resell it under the power, at which resale they were the successful bidders for an insignificant sum, and received a new deed from the trustee. It was held that the second sale was a nullity, and that the defendants were liable to the grantor for the surplus arising from the first sale. Gair v. Tuttle, 49 Fed. Rep. 108.

Reason of Mortgagee's Disability.—The disability of the mortgagee to become the purchaser at his own sale, has recently been explained by Lord Justice Lindley, upon a simpler ground than the relation of trust, as follows:

"A sale by a person to himself is no sale at all, and a power of sale does not authorize the donee of the power to take the property subject to it at a price fixed by himself, even although such price be the full value of the property. Such a transaction is not an exercise of the power, and the interposition of a trustee, although it gets over the difficulty so far as form is concerned, does not affect the substance of the transaction." Farrar v. Farrar, 40 Ch. Div. 409.

In New York, the mortgagee is by statute permitted to purchase in good faith. 3 Rev. St. (6th ed.), p. 847, § 7. Independently of the statute, it has been held that his purchase is not void if no unfair advantage was taken. Elliott v. Wood, 53 Barb. (N. Y.) 285; affirmed in 45 N. Y. 71; Slee v. Manhattan Co., 1 Paige (N. Y.) 48; Bergan v. Bennett, 1 Cal. Cas. (N. Y.) 1; 2 Am. Dec. 281; Hubbell v. Sibley, 5 Lans. (N. Y.) 51. See also Lansing v. Goellet, 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 346; National F. Ins. Co. v. Loomis, 11 Paige (N. Y.) 431.

Under the Maryland Code, art. 66, authorizing the mortgagee, or his legal representatives, to purchase at a sale under the power, the executors of an assignee of the mortgage may lawfully purchase. Chilton v. Brooks, 71 Md. 445; Condon v. Maynard, 71 Md. 601.

In Minnesota, the statute (Kelly's St. 1891, § 5351) provides that the mortgagee, his assigns, or his or their legal representatives, "may fairly and in good faith purchase the premises," at a sale conducted by the sheriff. But if the mortgagee's own agent makes the sale, the statutory permission does not apply. Allen v. Chatfield, 8 Minn. 435.

In Michigan, the statute is the same as in Minnesota. Annot. St. 1882, 8497-8515.

In Rhode Island, to render a purchase by the holder of the mortgage, valid, a notice is required by statute to be served on the mortgagor, or upon the person holding the equity of redemption. McLaughlin v. Hanley, 12 R. I. 61.

In Wisconsin, the statute (3531) allows the mortgagee to purchase at his own sale, provided he acts fairly and in good faith. See Maxwell v. Newton, 65 Wis. 261.

Where the property was bid in by the mortgagee for less than half its value, and then sold by him to the defendant, both parties knowing that the mortgagor was insane, the sale was held fraudulent and void. Even if the fact agency of the nominal bidder.¹ But where the sale is made to the mortgagee through the medium of a third person, and the property is subsequently conveyed to a bona fide purchaser without notice, the mortgagor will not be allowed to redeem after the statutory period as against him.² The mortgagee cannot even sell to a partnership of which he is a member. He has no right to become the purchaser either in severalty, joint tenancy or otherwise.³

In an action by the purchaser at a sale under the power, to recover possession from the mortgagor, the latter is not entitled to an instruction that the burden is on the purchaser to prove that he was not the partner or agent of the mortgagee at the sale.⁴

Not only the mortgagee, but also his solicitor or the attorney who acts for him in conducting the sale, is disqualified from purchasing. As to the latter, it was remarked by Lord Eldon that he was, upon principle, the individual of all others, disabled.⁵ The same disability attaches to the mortgagee's agent. He cannot purchase either for himself or for some one else.⁶ A pledgee of the mortgage, who exercises the power, cannot purchase, not only because he is acting as mortgagee, but also, because he occupies the position of trustee as to both mortgagor and mortgagee.⁷ Of course after the mortgagee has exercised the power of insanity had not been known, equity would set aside the sale upon a showing that no injustice would be done, and that the parties could be placed in statu quo. Encking v. Simmons, 28 Wis. 272.

Presumption of Collusion.—The mere fact that nearly two years after the sale, the purchaser conveyed the property to the mortgagee, does not create a sufficiently strong presumption that the former was acting for the latter at the sale, to overcome the positive testimony of both to the contrary. Burr v. Borden, 61 Ill. 389.

and made a sale in good faith to a third person, his duties as trustee are at an end, and he may thereafter deal with the property the same as anyone else.¹ The rule that the mortgagee shall not be allowed to become the purchaser is intended not merely to remedy actual wrong, but to prevent the possibility of it; and hence the actual bona fides of the sale, or the fairness of the price, is no defense.² In a few states, however, the doctrine prevails that a purchase by the mortgagee is not ipso facto voidable, but becomes so upon proof of any unfair advantage taken by the mortgagee.³

b. EFFECT OF PURCHASE BY MORTGAGEE.—The mortgagee's title as purchaser is not absolutely void, but only voidable, and other creditors cannot impeach it. It is good against all the world,

1. Munn v. Burges, 70 Ill. 604.

Assignment of Bid to Mortgagee.—The purchasers at a sale under a mortgage power, subsequently notified the mortgagee that they were unable to pay the purchase price, whereupon he agreed to take the property at the amount of their bid. There was no arrangement or understanding between the mortgagee and the purchasers at the time of the sale, except that he agreed to give them a reasonable time to pay the purchase-money. No deed was executed, no money paid, nor was possession taken by the mortgagee. It was held that this was not an indirect purchase by the mortgagee at his own sale, and that the foreclosure was valid, and cut off the equity of redemption. Durden v. Whetstone, 92 Ala. 480.

Actual Fraud Immaterial.—In Very v. Russell, 65 N. H. 646, the court, by Foster, J., said: "We think it would be dangerous, even when no fraud is shown, to hold the sale valid in such cases, and that the safer course is to discourage every appearance or suspicion of fraud, by adopting strictly the rule as above expressed, that a purchase of the mortgaged estate by the mortgagee must, as to the mortgagor, be regarded as ipso facto fraudulent and void."

In Howards v. Davis, 6 Tex. 174, the court, in holding that a mortgagee could buy at his own sale, said: "A mortgagee is a trustee, but in a qualified sense. He does not hold for the benefit of others, but for himself. He is a cestui que trust as well as trustee. He has an interest in the property. It is pledged expressly to secure his claim, and, were he deprived of the power to purchase, he might suffer a great loss by its sale at a low price. He has an interest that the bid shall amount to his incumbrance, and that the property be not sacrificed, to the injury as well of the mortgagor as the defeat of his own claim, as this may be the only fund for the discharge of his debt. Sales at foreclosures, whether under a power or by decree, are open and public, and are made after long notice, and it is to the interest of the mortgagor that the mortgagee shall enter into the competition at the sale."

In Bohn v. Davis, 75 Tex. 24, the question was whether the trustee in a deed given to secure several creditors, among them the trustee, could himself purchase at his own sale. The court, by Henry J., after stating the rule as to mortgages, said: "We see no substantial reason why the rule should not embrace such cases as this. If by any means the trust is abused as to the other beneficiaries by the trustee, they have their remedy. In this case they make no complaint."

A mortgagee may purchase the mortgage premises at the sale under a foreclosure by advertisement. Lewis v. Duane, 69 Hun (N. Y.) 28; Moritz v. St. Paul (Minn.), 54 N. W. Rep. 370.

except the owner of the equity of redemption.¹ The mortgagee himself cannot be heard to repudiate it.² The rule may be stated to be that an unauthorized purchase by the mortgagee arms the mortgagor or his successors in title with an option to have the sale declared invalid and the right of redemption established,³ or to ratify and affirm the sale, and receive the benefit of it.⁴ It may be confirmed either by release under seal, estoppel, or laches.⁵

If the mortgagor, with knowledge that the sale was made to the mortgagee, acquiesces in it and treats it as valid, he cannot afterwards repudiate it.⁶

A delay of sixteen years on the part of the mortgagor precludes relief, on the ground of laches.⁷

What is a reasonable time for disaffirming has been limited by some courts, by analogy, to the statutory period of redemption after the sale.⁸

A sale to the mortgagee, under the power, after the debt has been fully paid, may be set aside at any time within ten years.⁹

Election to Rescind—Judicial Foreclosure.—Where the mortgagee has elected in court to treat a mortgage sale under the power as a nullity, because the mortgagee took an assignment of the purchaser's bid, the mortgagor cannot be heard to claim that the mortgagee has exercised the power and therefore is not entitled to a decree of foreclosure. Martin v. McNeely, 101 N. Car. 634.

Disaffirmance by Infants.—The infant heirs of the mortgagor, who was dead at the time of the foreclosure sale, at which the mortgagee became the purchaser, should be allowed to disaffirm the sale at any time within two years (the statutory period of redemption) after coming of age, provided twenty years had not elapsed since the sale. Alexander v. Hill, 88 Ala. 487.

9. Askew v. Sanders, 84 Ala. 356.

In Alabama, it is held that the mortgagee himself may bring a suit in equity, to have the defect in his title, arising from the mortgagor's right of disaffirmance, removed by a confirmation of the sale, if the mortgagor so elects, or by a resale under decree of court.¹ Until the mortgagor has elected to disaffirm the sale, he has legal title in the property capable of being conveyed.² And after conveying all his interest in the land to a third person, he has no longer any right to either affirm or disaffirm the sale on the ground that the mortgagee was the purchaser.³ The mortgagor will not be allowed to disaffirm under a bill to set aside the sale, containing no allegation as to the state of the accounts, nor offering to pay what may be due.⁴

If the mortgagor and mortgagee, after the maturity of the mortgage, make an arrangement by which the latter is to become the purchaser at foreclosure sale, this will, if possible, be construed as intended to keep the equity of redemption from being cut off by the sale.⁵

After wrongfully purchasing at his own sale, the mortgagee may perfect his title by obtaining a conveyance from the holder of an outstanding and superior title.⁶

c. PERMISSION TO PURCHASE.—A provision in the power, that the mortgagee may purchase at his own sale, is valid, and protects the mortgagee, provided the sale was fairly conducted.⁷ But authority of this character must be clear and unambiguous, or it will not protect him.⁸ A purchase by the mortgagee under permission is "a transaction which the law would watch with jealousy;"⁹ and the mortgagee will be held "to the strictest good faith, and the utmost diligence for the protection of the rights of the debtor."¹⁰

A previous arrangement between the mortgagee and a third person, by which the latter is to bid on behalf of the former, at least the amount of the debt and costs, has no tendency to prevent competition and does not invalidate the sale.¹¹

8. In Griffin v. Marine Co., 52 Ill. 130, a mortgage provided that the mortgagee "may become the purchaser at such sale, provided his bid for said property or any portion thereof." It was held that this clause was too unintelligible to justify the mortgagee in purchasing.

If the mortgagee acts in good faith in conducting his sale, and is authorized to purchase, the facts that no other bidders were present, and that the mortgagee's bid was made through an agent, do not render the sale invalid, nor does the fact that the property brought less than its market value.¹

Where the mortgagee lawfully becomes the purchaser at his own sale, he may either execute a deed to a third person and have the latter convey back to him,² or he may execute the deed directly to himself as purchaser, which would operate as an appointment, by the donee of the power, to his own use;³ and when the mortgagee sells to himself under a permission in the power, he is bound to complete the purchase, the same as if he were a stranger to the mortgage. He cannot, by ignoring the sale, and failing to execute a deed to himself as purchaser, maintain an action on the debt where the amount of his bid was sufficient to extinguish it.⁴

d. SALES BY PUBLIC OFFICERS.—Where by statute the sheriff of a county is authorized or required to conduct foreclosure sales under powers, it seems that the mortgagee, even without express permission, may lawfully purchase at the sheriff's sale.⁵ But under a mortgage providing for a sale by either the mortgagee or marshal, it was held that they were co-trustees, and that the mortgagee could not, by refusing to conduct the sale in person, remove his disability to purchase at a sale by the marshal.⁶

The inhibition against the mortgagee's purchasing at his own sale, extends to all officers authorized or required by law to conduct mortgage sales.⁷

2. The Trustee.—The trustee in a trust deed is not allowed to become the purchaser at his sale under the power, either on his own behalf, or as agent for a third person. The law will not tolerate any attempt on his part to act in the double capacity of buyer and seller.⁸ It has been judicially intimated that a trustee might be allowed to purchase with the express consent of his beneficiary;⁹ but certainly the consent of the grantor would be

The proper performance of his duty as purchaser is as imperative upon him as is the proper performance of his duty as seller. The fact that he unites the two characters in his own person, cannot give him any additional rights; on the contrary, he is held to a stricter accountability when he undertakes to buy."

equally essential; and there are grave reasons of public policy why he should not be allowed to purchase even with their joint consent. It has been held that a purchase by the trustee at his own sale, is so far a nullity that it cannot be considered an "alienation" of the title such as would defeat a policy of fire insurance.¹

The doctrine that a sale by the trustee to a third person secretly acting for the trustee, may be set aside, is carried to the extent that creditors not secured by the deed may demand an annulling of the transaction of the trust, even though all other parties interested in the disposition of the proceeds are satisfied with the trustee's conduct.²

There is nothing improper in the beneficiaries sending their bid to the trustee, and requesting him to sell the estate to them in case he does not procure a higher bid at the sale; and the trustee may do so without breach of trust, subject always to the limitation that he must do nothing, as their agent, toward obtaining the property at an unfair advantage.³

If the trustee in a second trust deed becomes the purchaser at a sale under the first trust deed, his beneficiaries are entitled to the benefit of his bargain, but they must first reimburse him in full.⁴ A purchase by the trustee on behalf of his beneficiary, but without previous authority, is not binding upon the beneficiary unless he ratifies it, as by accepting a deed.⁵

Where the trustee is also one of the secured creditors, who are empowered by the trust deed to bid at the sale, it is no objection that the sale was made to the trustee's attorney for the benefit of all the creditors.⁶

Though the debtor has a right to avoid a sale at which the trustee has become a purchaser, yet he ratifies it when, with full knowledge of all the facts, he arranges with the trustee for the privilege of procuring a third person to buy from the trustee, and afterwards stands by and sees the property improved in good faith.⁷

It is held in Alabama that after an acquiescence of several years, a mortgage sale will not be set aside at the instance of the mortgagor, on the grounds that the person who conducted the sale became the purchaser, that the mortgagee was not present, and that the auctioneer had no written authority for making the sale.⁸

After the trustee's sale has been closed, there is no reason why the trustee should not have as good a right as any one else to purchase the property from the successful bidder, provided there was no collusion or understanding between them to that effect at the time of sale.¹

3. Creditors in Trust Deeds.—One who is merely a creditor, secured by the trust deed, but occupying no relation of trust as to the property, may, if he acts in good faith, become the purchaser at the trustee's sale.² The relation of a creditor secured by trust deed to a sale by the trustee, has been likened to that of a mortgagee of property sold under judicial foreclosure. In either case, there is no danger to be apprehended from the creditor's bidding at the sale.³

To render a purchase by a beneficiary valid, it must be free from all suspicion of collusion with the trustee.⁴ The beneficiary's title as purchaser at the trustee's sale may be attacked collaterally by showing that the trust debt was paid before the sale.⁵

4. Junior Mortgagees.—A junior mortgagee, being a stranger to the prior mortgage, is under no disability to purchase at a sale under it.⁶ If, however, the junior incumbrancer also holds the equity of redemption in trust for others, he stands in the same position as any other trustee, and cannot prejudice the rights of Creditor in Possession.—Where the creditor purchases at the trustee's sale, and the sale is set aside for irregularities, he will be treated as a mortgagee in possession after default, with the right to retain possession until the debt is fully paid. Harper v. Ely, 70 Ill. 581.

Parkinson v. Hanbury, 2 De G. J. & S. 450, which seems to hold the contrary.

In Watkins v. McKellar, 7 Grant's Ch. (Ont.) 584, the right of a junior incumbrancer to acquire an irredeemable title by purchase at a sale under the prior mortgage, is asserted in the following language by the court: "The proposition that the defendants, being mortgagees, were incapable of acquiring an absolute interest in the property in question proceeds, I suppose, upon this, that a mortgagee is a trustee for the mortgagor, and incapable, therefore, of dealing with the estate for his own benefit. That a mortgagee is a trustee for the mortgagor, in some sense of that word, cannot be denied; but that he is not a trustee, in the sense implied in the argument, is equally clear. Had it been true that mortgagor and mortgagee stand to each other in the relation of trustee and cestui que trust, then all dealings between them in relation to the equity of redemption, must have been regulated by the rules applicable to dealings between trustee and cestui que trust; and upon the same assumption, every purchase of an incumbrance affecting the estate made by the mortgagee must have been held to be a purchase for the benefit of the mortgagor. But the falsity of both conclusions is apparent. And if it be true, as I apprehend it is, that a mortgagee is allowed to deal for the equity of redemption as a stranger; and if it his beneficiaries by purchasing at the prior mortgage sale.¹ But the mere fact that the junior mortgagee is in possession, and is directed by his mortgage to pay over to other creditors of the mortgagor, any surplus after satisfying his own debt, does not make him a trustee in such sense that he cannot purchase the prior mortgage.²

5. The Mortgagor.—While, of course, there can be no objection to the mortgagor purchasing, yet he cannot thus obtain a title which would cut out subsequent incumbrances. On the contrary, it operates to their benefit.³ This is equally true of a purchase by the holder of the equity of redemption, subject to two or more mortgages.⁴

A director of a corporation mortgagor is not prevented by his office from purchasing at a sale under the mortgage, if he acts in good faith.⁵

be clear, as it no doubt is, that a mortgagee who gets in the incumbrance affecting the mortgaged estate, is entitled to receive the full amount due upon such incumbrance, no matter how advantageous the terms upon which he may have acquired it, then I know of no principle upon which to hold a puisne incumbrancer incapacitated from purchasing the estate upon a sale by a prior mortgagee under his power."

2. In Kirkwood v. Thompson, 34 L. J. Ch. 305; 2 De G. J. & S. 613, Cranworth Ch., speaking of such a mortgage, said: "As between the mortgagor, the person conveying, and the person to whom it was conveyed in trust to sell, it certainly was a mortgage as far as he was concerned. He took possession, and he, taking possession, could be liable to account as mortgagee. It cannot be contradicted that, between the parties conveying and the parties to whom it was conveyed, it certainly was a mortgage. It is possible—I do not say whether that would be so—that there might have been different duties as between him and the mortgagor, if he had sold, than would have existed in the case of a simple mortgage. But what took place is something that comes in paramount and prior to the exercise of his duties as trustee; he can never sell, because persons having a paramount title to his, choose to exercise their right, and therefore prevent the possibility of his exercising his right, which is a trust only to arise if it was ever in his power to sell, which it was not, in consequence of the sale made by the prior mortgagees."

A purchaser of the equity of redemption, who has assumed, and agreed to pay two mortgages on the property, cannot obtain a title so as to cut out the rights of the second mortgagee, by bidding in the property at a sale under the first mortgage, collusively arranged between himself and the holder of the first mortgage. 8. Co-Tenant of Mortgagor.—In the absence of fraud or collusion, the owner of an undivided interest in land covered by a mortgage or trust deed, may become the purchaser of his co-tenant's interest at a sale under the power; but the co-tenant may avail himself of the purchase by contributing his proportion of the purchase price.¹

XVIII. THE CONTRACT OF PURCHASE—1. Statute of Frauds.—Under the Statute of Frauds, the purchaser at a mortgagee's or trustee's sale cannot be compelled to complete the contract or be sued for damages, unless a memorandum of the sale was signed by him or by an auctioneer acting as the agent for both parties.² A memorandum signed by the sheriff, containing a description of the property sold, terms of sale, etc., is competent evidence of the sale, though not executed by the sheriff's deputy who personally conducted the sale.³

As long as the mortgagee and purchaser treat the contract of sale as binding, the mortgagor cannot take any advantage of their failure to comply with the Statute of Frauds.⁴

2. Rights of Purchaser; Caveat Emptor.—The doctrine of caveat emptor applies to sales by trustees and mortgagees, so as to charge the purchaser with notice of want of authority or of irregularities in the sale proceedings.⁵ The purchaser cannot avoid his purchase on the ground that the trustee ought not to have sold until the amount of prior liens had been ascertained; the rule of caveat emptor applies.⁶ Ordinarily, the purchaser is not bound to see to the application of the purchase-money by the trustee.⁷ The rule that one who purchases from a trustee with notice of the trust is charged with the same trust in respect to the property, does not apply to sales under trust deeds at public auction.⁸

It has been declared that the same reasons of public policy exist for giving favor and security to titles acquired under powers

Mistake in Quantity.—The property to be sold was described in a trustee's notice of sale, and also announced at the sale, as consisting of eighty acres, and was sold en masse at a certain price per acre. It was subsequently ascertained that the tract contained but twenty-three acres. It was held that the purchaser could not recover back from the trustee the amount per acre paid for the number of acres short, but that he would be entitled to have the sale set aside on the ground of mistake. Coons v. North, 27 Mo. 73.

Res Adjudicata.—A judgment rendered by a justice of the peace in an action of forcible entry, in favor of the purchaser at a trustee's sale, is no bar to an action to set aside the sale, the justice having no jurisdiction to determine questions involving the title. *Equitable Trust Co. v. of sale in mortgages and trust deeds, as are recognized in respect to judicial sales.¹

If the purchaser dies before paying the purchase-money, his executors or administrators may pay it and take a deed to themselves as trustees for the heirs or devisees. Upon such title they can maintain ejectment for the land.² If the purchaser voluntarily pays taxes assessed on the land against a subsequent mortgagee in possession, he cannot sue the latter to recover back the amount paid.³

3. Rights Under Invalid Sale.—A foreclosure sale which, by reason of irregularities, is insufficient to convey the legal title to the purchaser, but which results in a payment of the debt secured, is generally held to operate as an assignment of the equitable title to the securities, to the extent necessary to reimburse the purchaser.⁴ Each subsequent conveyance by the purchaser also operates as an assignment of the securities.⁵ So, the purchaser acquires the rights of the mortgagee under an irregular statutory sale made by a sheriff or other officer, in place of the mortgagee himself.⁶ Even though the sale was wholly void, yet if the purchase-money has been used to extinguish the trust debt, the purchaser is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor, but he must assert his rights in a court of equity.⁷

The payment of a part of the amount bid at a sale under the power in a mortgage, if the sale fails of consummation, in consequence of the non-payment of the balance of the bid, operates in equity as an assignment of the mortgage debt to the extent of

So, if a mortgagee should enter into possession of the mortgaged premises and retain the same, in such a manner as to set the Statute of Limitations running in his favor as against the owner of the equity of redemption, or against any person who claimed the estate adversely from the mortgagee, and before the lapse of the statutory period of limitation the mortgagee should convey the mortgaged premises to the purchaser, such conveyance would pass to a purchaser the benefit of the possession so held by the mortgagee, and would avail the purchaser in the same manner as if the possession throughout had been held by himself. Void Sale.—In Hayes v. Lieulokken, 48 Wis. 509, where a foreclosure sale was made by a person purporting to act as the foreign executor of the mortgagee, but whose authority, as such, was not sufficiently established, and at the sale such person became the purchaser, it was held that the sale could not be treated as an equitable assignment to him of the mortgage and debt.

Damages For Irregularity.—Where a power of sale has been irregularly exercised, the person injured thereby may the amount paid, and to that extent entitles the bidder to the benefits of the mortgage security.¹

As against the purchaser in possession under a defective sale, the mortgagor may redeem, but cannot maintain ejectment or a writ of entry.²

If the purchaser goes into possession in good faith, and with the assent of the mortgagor, he will be regarded as a mortgagee in possession, and as having acquired the legal title after the right of redemption has become barred.³ So, a beneficiary who purchases at an invalid sale by his trustee, acquires thereby the rights of a mortgagee in possession after default.⁴

The mortgagor or his successors in title who have received the surplus proceeds of an invalid sale under the power, cannot set the sale aside and recover the land, without first offering to restore such surplus to the purchaser, because by retaining the money they ratify the sale. The fact that they have spent the money and are too poor to replace it, does not excuse a failure to make the tender.⁵

An action by the purchaser for possession cannot be converted into a suit to foreclose the mortgage, upon his failure to establish a valid title under the sale.⁶

Where the purchaser in good faith makes valuable improvements upon the property while in possession, he is entitled to compensation therefor upon the sale being set aside,⁷ and is not accountable for the rents and profits, as enhanced by such improvements, during his occupancy.⁸

But where a mortgagee obtained a foreclosure decree, which was defective by reason of certain outstanding claims against the mortgaged estate, remaining unenclosed, and the mortgagee then sold the property to a purchaser with a notice of the outstanding claims, and the purchaser entered and made improvements upon the property, in a contest between the claimants and the purchaser, the latter failed to get any allowance for his improvements by reason of their having been made with a notice of the outstanding rights. *Russell v. chaser at a sale under the power, from all necessity of inquiring as to the regularity of the sale proceedings.¹ Under such a clause, if the mortgagor suffers injury through the misconduct of the mortgagee in selling improperly, his only remedy would be against the mortgagee personally for damages, and not against the purchaser.² There are two kinds of these protection clauses: first, to the effect that if a sale is authorized according to the conditions of the power, the purchaser shall not be obliged to inquire into the regularity of the proceedings under it; second, to the effect that the purchaser is not only relieved from inquiring into the regularity of the proceedings, but also from inquiring into the existence of default or the right to exercise the power.³ Under a provision of the first class, the purchaser is not protected if, in fact, the power of sale had not become operative. He must look to that at his peril.⁴ The protection of clauses of this character extends only to bona fide purchasers, having no actual knowledge of irregularities or improprieties. While such a clause excuses non-inquiry, it does not waive the effect of actual notice.⁵

5. Innocent Purchasers.—The rule has been laid down that a bona fide purchaser at a sale under a power, without notice of any fraud, irregularities, or defects, is entitled to the same protection in his purchase as if the foreclosure had been by decree in equity.⁶

In respect to constructive notice, the purchaser at a sale under a power has the right to rely upon the record as it existed at the time of sale.⁷ His title cannot be affected by a collateral

Protection Against Actual Notice.—It would seem to be competent for the parties to extend the protection still further, by providing in the mortgage that actual knowledge of irregularities shall not effect the title of the purchaser, and that the debtor's only remedy shall be for damages. Such a strong clause, however, is not commonly used. See Prichard v. Wilson, 10 Jur. N. S. 330; Hunter's Sale under Mortg. 151.

6. Jackson v. Henry, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 185. See also Jackson v. Dominick, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 435.

The rule stated in the text has been followed and applied in many cases: Shillaber v. Robinson, 97 U. S. 69; Hosmer v. Campbell, 98 Ill. 572; Jenkins v. Pierce, 98 Ill. 646; *Carey v. Notice of Lis Pendens.—Pending a bill to redeem land from a sale under a trust deed, a portion of the land was sold under a second trust deed. The bill in the suit to redeem set forth the claims of the debtor as to the transaction under which the second trust deed was executed, one defense being usury and payment. It was held that the pendency of the bill was a notice to the purchaser at the second sale, so as to preclude him from resisting the debtor's right to redeem. Ryan v. Newcomb, 125 Ill. 91.

agreement between the mortgagor and mortgagee, of which he had no notice, to defer the sale in consideration of payment of interest, or the like.¹ Nor is it affected by any unfair conduct on the part of the trustee not brought to the purchaser's notice;² nor by fraud in the consideration of the note secured;³ nor by the fact that a valid tender of the debt had been made before sale, and refused.⁴

Where the debt secured is tainted with usury, which by statute renders the contract and securities void, a bona fide purchaser without notice of the usury, takes a good title at a sale under the power.⁵

Even though the debt secured has been fully paid, yet, if the mortgage remains unsatisfied of record, a sale under it to a bona fide purchaser without notice of the fact of payment is held equivalent to a sale under decree in equity, and a complete bar, both as against the mortgagor and those claiming under him.⁶ This is especially true of a purchaser at a sale under a power which by its terms absolves bidders from making inquiry as to the existence

In Minnesota, it is held that where a usurious note and mortgage are purchased before maturity for value, and without notice, and the purchaser forecloses under the power and buys in the land at the sale, but having at the time of the sale received notice that the defense of usury was raised, the mortgagor may have the foreclosure set aside and recover possession, without offering to redeem. Scott v. Austin, 36 Minn. 460, overruling Scott v. Austin, 36 Minn. 460. See also Exley v. Berryhill, 37 Minn. 182.

6. Warner v. Blakeman, 36 Barb. (N. Y.) 501. See a dictum to the contrary in the earlier case of Cameron v. Irwin, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 272.

In Merchant v. Woods, 27 Minn. 396, the court said, in holding the title of bona fide purchasers good, notwithstanding a previous payment of the mortgage debt: "The principle, and the reason for it is this: Whenever the lien of a recorded mortgage containing a power of sale is in fact discharged, in whole, or in part, by payment or otherwise, the law makes it the duty of the mortgagor, or the holder of the equity of redemption, as between him and third parties having no notice thereof, to procure the evidence of the discharge to be properly put upon record. A failure so to do leaves the mortgage, apparently, a subsisting security, and the mortgagee, apparently still clothed with the authority originally conferred by the power; and if, in the exercise of such apparent authority, a sale is affected, upon the faith of the appearances, the innocent purchaser will be protected in his title, if first recorded, as against the party through whose fault and negligence the apparently valid foreclosure and sale were rendered possible." In Palmer v. Bates, 22 Minn. 532, the court made a similar ruling, holding that an unrecorded release of a portion of the mortgaged premises was of no avail as against an innocent purchaser for value, whose title was acquired under a foreclosure sale of the entire tract, with a certificate of sale duly executed and recorded, and the usual statutory affidavits.

But, in Illinois, the position is taken that payment of the mortgage debt extinguishes the mortgage, and that a sale thereafter under the power, passes no title in equity, even as to an innocent purchaser. Redmond v. Packen-

of default, or as to the regularity or propriety of the sale.¹ If the purchaser be cognizant of, or a party to, any unfair conduct or actual fraud in connection with the sale, he is, of course, in no position to claim the immunities of a bona fide purchaser.² Though a sale may be open to attack as against the original purchaser, by reason of his having notice of some irregularity or defect in the proceedings, yet, if he conveys to a third person having no such notice, and acting in good faith, the title of such third person is not subject to be defeated on the ground of his grantor's notice.³ To entitle a subsequent purchaser to protection, the trustee's deed must contain nothing tending to show that the terms of the power were not properly complied with.⁴

6. Remedies Against Purchaser.—The mortgagee or trustee has two distinct remedies against a purchaser who wrongfully refuses to complete his contract, viz. : He may tender a proper deed and sue for the full purchase price, or he may make a new sale under the power, and sue the first purchaser for the resulting damage, including the cost of resale.⁵ Generally, it is the duty of the trustee, upon a sale at a fair price to a responsible bidder, to insist upon a completion of the purchase, and, if necessary, to proceed against the purchaser to enforce the contract; but by consent of all parties the bidder may be released.⁶ After the trustee has proceeded to make a second sale, he cannot maintain a suit for specific performance against the successful bidder at the first sale.⁷ Upon the failure of the purchaser to comply with a demand to complete his payments within the time allowed him for that purpose, the mortgagee or trustee has the right to treat the contract as abandoned.⁸

Purchase by Mortgagee.—Thus, where the mortgagee in bad faith purchased at his sale through a third person, who subsequently conveyed to him, it was held that the sale could not be set aside as against a bona fide purchaser from the mortgagee without notice. 8. Atkins v. Tutwiler, 98 Ala. 129; Seabury v. Doe, 22 Ala. 207.

In Atkins v. Tutwiler, 98 Ala. 129, the court said: "It is well settled in this state that though the power in the mortgage expressly provides for a cash sale, an agreement by the mortgagee to allow time to the purchaser affords the mortgagor no ground of complaint. The payment of the purchase-money is a matter between the mortgagee and the purchaser. The mortgagor has no other interest than that he obtain credit and benefit of the amount bid." (Citing Mewburn v. Bass, 82 Ala. 622; Durden v. Whetstone, 92 Ala. 480; Cooper v. Hornsby, 71 Ala. 62.) "But it is clear that it is the right of the mortgagee either to insist upon the payment in cash of the amount of the bid, or to make the consummation of the sale dependent upon a compliance by the purchaser with the terms of credit agreed upon.

The purchaser will not be permitted to avoid his contract of purchase by showing that there was a secret understanding between him and the mortgagee that he was to have the property at the amount of his bid, regardless of what anyone else might be willing to bid, for, if there was any fraud, he was a party to it, and cannot take advantage of it.¹

If the purchaser has been misled by false statements made by the trustee or mortgagee as to the state of the title, by which he was induced to bid more than he would otherwise have bid, he cannot be compelled to complete the purchase, even though the amount required to remedy the defect might be deducted from the purchase price.²

XIX. THE PURCHASER'S DEED AND TITLE—1. Right to a Deed.—Except where otherwise provided by statute, a purchaser who has complied with all the terms of the sale, is entitled to receive from the trustee or mortgagee a deed of the property purchased, containing recitals sufficient to show that the deed is made by virtue of, and pursuant to, the power of sale.³

Until a deed has been executed and delivered to the purchaser, he does not acquire the full legal title, though the sale and payment of the purchase price vest in him the equitable title which he may perfect by proper proceedings.⁴ But a bill cannot be maintained by the purchaser to subject other property to his purchase in lieu of that sold under the power, on the ground that the mortgage by mistake covered the wrong property. He must take what was actually sold, or nothing.⁵

Before the purchaser can compel the delivery of a deed, he must tender to the mortgagee or trustee the full amount of his bid, even though the sale was made for an installment of the debt,

He is entitled, as against any bidder at the sale, to hold the title to the mortgaged property as mortgagee until a bid is made and paid in the manner prescribed by the power, or until he becomes bound by the terms of an agreement between him and the successful bidder to execute a conveyance under the power, and to become accountable to the mortgagor for the amount of the bid. The mortgagee's interest is to realize on the security to the extent of the debt due to him. The successful bidder is not entitled to the property as purchaser until he complies with the conditions of the sale. When he claims as the purchaser at a sale under the power which provides for a sale for cash, if his bid was not paid in cash, the burden is upon him to show that the mortgagee consented to accept a provision for future payment in lieu of the cash, and that the provision for such future payment has been made, or that there is some legal excuse for the failure to make it in the manner agreed upon."

Purchaser Entitled to Deed.—Where a trust deed provided that upon foreclosure the trustee should "execute a deed to the purchaser, pay all the amount herein secured, with interest and costs, and hold the same subject to my order," the word "same" was construed as referring to the surplus proceeds and not to the trustee's deed; and that the deed was properly delivered to the purchaser. Huston v. Seeley, 27 Iowa 183.

and the purchase price was sufficient to pay the unmatured installments also. A tender of the amount of the first installment and costs, with a receipt from the debtor for the balance of his bid, is invalid.¹

The purchaser at a cash sale must make his payments to the trustee within a reasonable time, and if he fails to pay when a deed is tendered, equity will not compel the trustee to convey upon a subsequent tender of the amount bid.²

The purchaser takes the title as of the date of creating the power, divested of all subsequent incumbrances,³ the underlying principle being, that a deed in execution of the power is the conveyance, not only of the trustee, mortgagee, or assignee executing it, but also the conveyance of the mortgagor himself, relating back to the date of the mortgage.⁴

Authority to execute a deed to the purchaser at a sale under the power is a necessary incident of a power to sell, and need not be expressly conferred, though usually it is.⁵

There is no requirement of law that the deed to the purchaser shall be executed within a given time after the sale. The purchaser, of course, has the right to insist that there be no unreasonable delay.⁶

Where the grantor in a trust deed has sold his equity, it is not essential that the trustee's deed should purport to convey the interest of the grantor's vendee. A conveyance of all the estate, right, title, etc., of the grantor, operates to cut off the equity of redemption, by whomsoever held.⁷

The trustee or mortgagee may execute a second deed to the purchaser, to correct errors or omissions in the first deed.⁸

Unexplained Delay in Making Deed.—A trustee's deed executed in 1878, showing upon its face the trustee's recognition of a sale made by him in 1866, and that the grantee was the purchaser at such sale and entitled at all times to a conveyance, is admissible as evidence of the purchaser's title, without explanation of the delay in its execution. *Jones v. 2. Proper Parties Grantor.—Where the mortgagee is authorized by the power to foreclose and sell, and, as the attorney of the mortgagor, to convey to the purchaser, such conveyance must be in the name of the mortgagor as grantor; and a conveyance made in the name of the mortgagee or assignee only, does not pass the legal title.¹ Such defect in the purchaser's deed, however, does not render the sale invalid; the equitable title passes, which a court of equity will aid in establishing as a legal title.² Under a power authorizing the mortgagee to sell and "make, execute, and deliver to the purchaser, all necessary conveyances for the purpose of vesting in him the premises sold, in fee simple," the deed may be executed by the mortgagee, reciting the power and signed with his own name and seal.³

Where an administrator takes a mortgage in which he is described as administrator, he should execute the deed to the purchaser in his own name and not "as administrator." He does not act by virtue of his office, but under the power of sale.⁴

A married woman mortgagee with power of sale, may execute the deed to the purchaser at her sale, without having her husband join, as is required by statute in cases where she conveys her own property.⁵

Where the sale is conducted by a deputy sheriff, the deed to the purchaser may be executed by the successor of the deputy's principal, the act of the deputy in selling being the act of the sheriff.⁶

3. Proper Parties Grantee.—It is not necessary that the deed be made to the successful bidder as grantee. It may be made to any person he may designate, or to whom he has assigned his bid.⁷ Thus, in the absence of fraud, if the ostensible purchaser directs the trustee to execute the deed to a third person, a stranger to the sale cannot be heard to complain that the real purchaser did not make his bid in person.⁸ Where the mortgagee may lawfully purchase at his own sale, the deed may run directly to himself as purchaser.⁹

4. Recitals in Deed.—While it is proper and advisable to recite, in a trustee's or mortgagee's deed, the power under which it is executed, as well as the proceedings had before sale, yet the omission to insert such recitals does not invalidate the conveyance. It can always be shown aliunde that the conveyance was made in execution of the power.¹

Though no mention be made of the name of the trustee in the body of his deed, yet, if the recitals furnish the means of identifying the grantor as the trustee, the description is sufficient;² and it is not essential for the trustee's deed to contain a recital of the exact date of his sale made in pursuance of the power.³ Recitals in a mortgagee's or trustee's deed to the purchaser are, at law, generally held to be prima facie evidence of the facts stated, even where the power itself does not provide that such recitals shall have that effect.⁴

In equity, a person claiming under a trustee's deed must be able to show that all the conditions precedent to the right to sell

The cases of Dexter v. Shepard, 117 Mass. 480, and Jackson v. Colden, 4 Cow. (N. Y.) 266, seem to assume, arguendo, that the mortgagee cannot make a deed directly to himself.

1. Smith v. Henning, 10 W. Va. 596; Taylor v. Eatman, 92 N. Car. 601.

Absence of Recitals.—A mortgagee gave to the mortgagee or his assigns a power to sell on default, at public or private sale, and to convey to the purchaser in fee simple absolute. After default, the assignee of the mortgage executed to a third person an ordinary warranty deed of the premises, containing no reference to the mortgage or power, and there was no assignment of the debt to the grantee. It was held that the deed was an execution of the power, and not an assignment of the mortgage. Lanigan v. Sweany, 53 Ark. 185. But in Pease v. Pilot Knob Iron Co., 49 Mo. 124, it was held that a simple conveyance by the mortgagee after default, without any reference to his power of sale, or the nature of his interest in the property, would convey only his mortgage interest, and could not be regarded as an execution of the power.

Contradictory Recitals.—Where a trustee, under a trust deed covering several lots, makes a sale and conveys to the purchaser all the lots covered by the trust, and in one part of his deed recites a sale by him of one particular lot, this will not defeat his deed as to the other lots, when from the whole deed it sufficiently appears that he actually sold all the lots conveyed. Miller v. Shaw, 103 Ill. 277.

The trustee's sale purported to have been made in the town of P., but his deed did not recite that the sale was made at the time stated in the notice, nor did the affidavit of publication show that the newspaper was printed in the city of P. It was held that these matters did not render the trustee's deed incompetent as evidence of title. Missouri Fire Clay Works v. Ellison, 30 Mo. App. 67.

Recitals as to Creditor's Right to Bid.—Recitals in a trustee's deed are prima facie evidence of the fact that the power permitted the creditor to purchase, and it is not necessary that the trust deed should provide that the trustee's recitals shall be received as evidence. Savings & Loan Soc. v. Deering, 66 Cal. 281.

Recitals as to Notice of Sale.—The fact that the mortgagee's deed recites particularly certain essentials in respect to the giving of the notice, and is silent as to some other essentials, does not repel the presumption that the notice was sufficient. Tartt v. Clayton, 109 Ill. 579.

have arisen and been complied with.¹ At law, a trustee's deed purporting to be made in exercise of the power, cannot be impeached for fraud or misconduct in the proceedings prior to its execution. The deed passes the legal title and a court of equity must be applied to to set it aside.² But in equity, such recitals are no evidence of a regular and proper exercise of the power, unless so provided in the instrument creating the trust.³

If the power authorizes the trustee to make recitals in his deed prima facie evidence, the same effect must be given to the recitals in a substitute trustee's deed.⁴

A stipulation in a trust deed that the recitals in the trustee's conveyance under the power shall be conclusive evidence of default, right to sell, and regularity of sale, are binding upon the grantor as against a bona fide purchaser at such sale.⁵

A party claiming under a deed made in execution of a power of sale, is bound by a recital in it that the mortgage debt draws interest at a certain rate; and he cannot defeat redemption based upon a payment of the debt and such rate of interest, though in fact the debt bore a higher rate and the recital was erroneous.⁶

5. Trustee's Covenants.—The trustee is under no obligation to give any other covenant in his deed to the purchaser, than the ordinary trustee's covenant against his own acts. His deed is good and effectual without either warranty or personal covenants, and he has no implied power to make covenants, merely from a power to convey.⁷ Of course, if the trust deed empowers the trustee to sell and convey with full covenants of warranty, such covenants in the trustee's deed to the purchaser at his sale are as binding on the grantor in the trust deed, as if he had personally made them.⁸

6. Statutory Substitutes for Deed; Certificates.—In New York, no deed is necessary where the mortgagee becomes the purchaser; the affidavits required by law to be filed have the force and effect of a deed.⁹ So in Wisconsin.¹⁰

In Minnesota, all sales under powers in mortgages must be made by the sheriff of the county, and his certificate of sale operates as a deed after the expiration of the statutory period of redemption.¹¹ The failure of the person executing the power to file a duplicate certificate of sale in the office of the register of deeds, as directed by statute, does not invalidate the sale.¹ A mere misstatement as to the date of executing the mortgage, or as to the amount of the note secured, does not invalidate the certificate.²

A recital in the certificate of sale that a deed would not be issued until two years (instead of one, the proper period) from the date of sale, is not prejudicial, and does not invalidate a deed issued after the expiration of two years.³

A sheriff's certificate, signed by him as such, is not fatally defective because it fails to recite that he made the sale as sheriff.⁴ Where the sale is conducted by a deputy sheriff, the fact that he executes the certificate in his own name as deputy, without using the sheriff's name, is at most a mere irregularity not affecting the validity of the sale.⁵

In Minnesota, it is held that where the sale is conducted by a deputy sheriff, the certificate of sale is properly executed by him in his own name.⁶ The statutory requirement that the certificate

Minneapolis Stock Yards, etc., Co., 47 Minn. 417.

A statement in the sheriff's certificate (dated) that the premises sold "are subject to redemption within the time and according to statute," is a sufficient compliance with the statutory requirement to state the time of redemption. Wells v. Atkinson, 24 Minn. 161.

Construction of Minnesota Law.—By Minnesota Laws 1883, ch. 112, a sheriff's certificate of sale, executed either before or after the passage of the act, is made prima facie evidence that all the requirements of law in executing the power, including the publication of the notice of sale, have been complied with. The act is merely one changing the rules of evidence, which it was competent for the legislature to make applicable to existing causes of action. It also applies to such certificates made by a deputy sheriff, who is authorized by law to make foreclosure sales. Burke v. Lacock, 41 Minn. 250.

1. Johnson v. Day, 2 N. Dak. 295; Sanborn v. Petter, 35 Minn. 449.

Where the statute fixes no limit within which the certificate shall be recorded, it is sufficient to record it ten months after the sale. Ryder v. Hulett, 44 Minn. 353.

2. Cable v. Minneapolis Stock Yards, etc., Co., 47 Minn. 417.

Erroneous Description.—In Minnesota, the statute requires that the sheriff's certificate of sale (which must contain, among other things, a description of the property sold, the price paid for each parcel, the name of the purchaser, and the date of sale) shall be executed and recorded within twenty days after the sale; and that when so recorded it shall, upon the expiration of the period of redemption, operate as a conveyance to the purchaser. Property was sold to D. at a foreclosure sale, and a sheriff's certificate given to him, which was duly recorded, and which recited that the sheriff sold all the property described in the mortgage, but describe the property in controversy as being in section twenty-two, instead of section fifteen, as in the mortgage. There was no redemption attempted by the mortgagor. In an action to quiet title, the court held that owing to this error in description the certificate was incompetent as evidence of the purchaser's title under the sale, and that in fact he had no title. Smith v. Buse, 35 Minn. 234.

6. Certificate by Deputy Sheriff.—In Burke v. Lacock, 41 Minn. 250, the court said: "The law authorizes the deputy sheriff, as such, to make the sale; and consequently, when he does so, it is proper for him to execute the certificate in his own name as deputy sheriff. His certificate stands on the same footing, and has the same force and effect, as that of the principal sheriff. Both are, in popular language, known and called 'sheriff's certificates;' both are equally within the purview of the act of 1883, the same shall contain a description of the mortgage is sufficiently complied with by incorporating in the certificate a copy of the notice of sale, which contains a true description of the mortgage.¹

Although the statutory certificate becomes a muniment of title, it has been held that an omission to seal the certificate is not fatal to its validity.²

7. Deed Need Not Be Recorded.—The trustee's deed relates back to the date of the execution of the trust deed, and the record of the latter is sufficient to put all persons on inquiry as to whether a sale has been made in exercise of the power. Hence, as to attaching creditors, the trustee's deed need not be recorded.³

8. Right to Possession.—After the purchaser has received his deed, and the statutory period of redemption has expired, he need not give the party in possession notice to quit before bringing ejectment. The relation of landlord and tenant does not exist.⁴

The purchaser at trustee's sale is entitled to the growing crops, both as against the debtor and all persons claiming under him subsequent to the recording of the trust deed.⁵ He is also entitled to possession without paying the debtor or his privies for permanent improvements made since the creation or recording of the lien.⁶ It is presumed that the value of the improvements enhanced the purchase price paid at the sale, and hence that the owner of the equity has already received compensation for them.⁷

Where by statute a right of redemption is given for a specified period after sale, the mortgagor or owner of the equity is, as a general rule, not liable for the rents and profits during the period allowed for redemption.⁸

reasons existing why the one should be made prima facie evidence of a valid sale under the power as the other; and in the term 'sheriff's certificate,' the legislature evidently intended to include both."

6. Neal v. Hamilton (Tex. 1887), 7 S. W. Rep. 672; Childs v. Dolan, 5 Allen (Mass.) 319.

7. In Neal v. Hamilton (Tex. 1887), 7 S. W. Rep. 672, where the mortgagor claimed the right, as against the purchaser at a foreclosure sale, to recover for improvements made before the sale, the court said: "We know of no rule of law which would entitle him to other compensation for the improvements, than such as he is presumed to have received from the increased price which may have been paid for the land at the trustee's sale on account of the improvements. This is not a case in which a defendant, in an action of trespass to try title, is entitled to compensation for improvements made in good faith, nor is it a case in which a vendor of land, through an executory contract, is seeking to cancel it under circumstances which raise equities in favor of the vendee."

8. In Minnesota, where by statute the mortgagor is entitled to possession and the right to redeem for one year from the day of sale under a power in a mortgage, it is held that the purchaser at the sale cannot recover the rents and profits during that year, even though the mortgage purports to cover them. This decision is based upon the theory that from the time of foreclosure the mortgage ceases to be a security for the debt, and its provisions do not apply. Pioneer Sav., etc., Co. v. Farnham, 50 Minn. 315.

9. Affidavit of Proceedings.—In a number of states it is provided by statute that the preliminary proceedings in the exercise of a power of sale, and also the conduct of the sale, shall or may be proved by affidavits of the facts, made by the proper persons, and recorded in the registry of deeds. The prevailing doctrine is that in the absence of any such affidavits the fact of publication and other preliminary proceedings may be proved by common-law evidence.¹ And even though the affidavits are by statute made presumptive or prima facie evidence of the facts stated, they are subject to rebuttal by other proof.² It seems that to render the affidavit admissible as evidence it must be made within a reasonable time after the proceedings to which it relates. A delay of several years destroys its value.³ An affidavit, made on information and belief only, as to the service of the required notices, is of itself wholly insufficient, being no proof of the fact.⁴ Defects in the statutory affidavit of service of notice upon the mortgagor or other parties, may be supplied by parol proof.⁵

Unless expressly so declared by law, it is not necessary that the statutory affidavit of publishing and posting notices of sale, or of other proceedings, should be recorded in order to vest the title in the purchaser.⁶ Thus, neglect on the part of the mortgagee to file the affidavit of costs and disbursements as required by law cannot be allowed to affect the validity of the sale; a different rule could enable the mortgagee, by such neglect, to defeat the rights of a bona fide purchaser at the sale.⁷

In Mississippi, however, it is held that the right to the rents passed to the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, under a mortgage granting the premises and "hereditaments," etc. Dunton v. Sharpe (Miss. 1886), 11 So. Rep. 168.

In North Dakota, the purchaser at a foreclosure sale is entitled to recover rents from a tenant in possession, up to the time of redemption; and payment by the tenant to his lessor, after notice of the purchaser's rights, is no defense. Clement v. Shipley, 2 N. Dak. 430.

In California, the purchaser at mortgage sale is entitled to recover from the tenant in possession, the rents and profits or the value of the use and occupation, from the day of sale to the time of redemption. California Code Civ. Proc. 707; Walker v. McCusker, 71 Cal. 594.

Contents of Affidavit.—In Massachusetts, the affidavit of acts done, in selling under the power in a mortgage, is not required to contain any statement that the mortgagee has rendered an account to the mortgagor, or as to how he has disposed of the purchase-money. Childs v. Dolan, 5 Allen (Mass.) 319.

Failure to File Affidavit.—In Smith v. Provin, 4 Allen (Mass.) 516, the

Where the statute directs that the affidavit of publication shall be made by the "printer," an affidavit by a person describing himself as the "publisher" of the paper is sufficient; it will be presumed that the publisher is the printer, in the sense of being the person for whom, as principal, and by whose servants, the paper is printed.¹

XX. SEPARATE PARCELS SHOULD BE SOLD SEPARATELY.—Where the property covered by a mortgage or trust deed consists of separate tracts or parcels, it is, under ordinary circumstances, advantageous to the interests of the owner to sell each tract or parcel separately, as by that method a better price will usually be realized than by a sale en masse. It may be stated as the general rule, independently of statutory requirements, that it is the duty of the trustee or mortgagee to make a fair effort to sell the parcels separately before offering them all together.² A sale en masse will not be court said: "The allegation on the part of the plaintiff is, that the conditions annexed to the power of sale have not been complied with. The defect particularly assigned is, that the affidavit required to be made by the party making such sale, and containing a statement of a compliance with the requirements of the deed in that behalf, was not made and recorded in the registry of deeds for the county of Hampton, within one year after the sale. It is admitted by the answer of the defendants, that no such affidavit had been made and filed for record in the registry of deeds prior to April 21st, 1892, nearly three years after the sale, and long after the filing of the present bill. There was, therefore, a failure to comply with the conditions annexed to the power of sale, and the sale must be treated as a nullity. This court has held the rule very strictly as to mortgage sales under power of attorney." Citing Roarty v. Mitchell, 7 Gray (Mass.) 244. The foregoing decision was based upon a requirement in the mortgage itself.

In the later case of Field v. Gooding, 106 Mass. 310, the court said: "It is further insisted that the statute provision, requiring that the mortgagee, in case he should proceed to sell without a decree of court, shall file a copy of the notice of sale, and an affidavit of his doings, within thirty days, in the registry of deeds, is peremptory, and, if not complied with, the sale, itself, becomes void, and no title passes. This is not, in the opinion of the court, a sound interpretation of the statute. The provision is intended to secure the preservation of evidence that the conditions of the power of sale named in the deed have been complied with. It is for the protection of those claiming under the sale, and to prevent litigation. The title passes by the sale and deed, and immediately vests in the purchaser. It was not the intention to make it subject to a condition subsequent, and liable to be defeated by a failure of the mortgagee to perform an act which must follow the conveyance in point of time, and thus add to the conditions prescribed by the mortgagor in the deed. If this was the purpose of the statute, its language would have been more explicit. As it is, its provisions must be regarded as directory, and not precluding a resort to other evidence that the power of sale was duly executed. The mortgagor cannot complain if the conditions he has chosen to insert in the deed have been, in fact, complied with." Followed in Burns v. Thayer, 115 Mass. 89; Learned v. Foster, 117 Mass. 365.

disturbed, however, unless it is made to appear that the interests of the owner were prejudiced thereby.¹ If, in the exercise of a sound discretion, the trustee or mortgagee decides that a sale en masse is preferable, he may act accordingly and the court will not interfere.² And it will be presumed that the trustee will not attempt to sell any more of the property than necessary for the purposes of the trust.³ Even though the power confers upon the trustee the right to use his discretion as to selling en masse or in separate parcels, he must not act arbitrarily; and a sale en

"The criterion in all cases is, what mode of sale will realize the largest amount of money? If this object can be obtained by the sale of the whole mortgaged premises together, that is the proper mode to pursue, even if they are readily divisible. If the land is divisible into separate parcels, and is better adapted for use in parcels, then the presumption would seem to be that it would produce a larger amount of money if sold in that way, and the sale should be made accordingly." 2 Jones Mortg. (4th ed.), § 1858.

Request of Junior Mortgagee.—A mortgagee has no right to sell the whole premises in one parcel, where he has been duly requested to offer it in separate parcels by a junior mortgagee, who agrees to bid the entire amount of the first mortgage for a certain designated part of the tract, which is easily capable of division, even though the whole is described in the mortgage as one tract. Under such circumstances equity will set aside a sale en masse. Ellsworth v. Lockwood, 42 N. Y. 89.

suspicion of fraud, and it appears that a sale of each parcel separately would not have brought more. Keiser v. Gammon, 95 Mo. 217.

A sale in gross is not void, but merely voidable; and where there is no evidence of fraud or unfair conduct, subsequent purchasers of separate portions of the tract from the mortgagors who have made no objection to the manner of sale at the time, nor shown any excuse for not doing so, are not entitled to have it set aside merely because a sale in parcels would have enabled them respectively to redeem the tracts in which they were interested. *Clark v. Duty of Trustee as to Parcels.—In Michie v. Jeffries, 21 Gratt. (Va.) 334, the court said: "We do not mean to say that he (the trustee) must sell precisely so much as may be sufficient to satisfy the purposes of the trust, and no more. It may be difficult or impossible to do this, and it may, in fact, be a breach of the trust to do it. He cannot so divide and sell the land as to do unnecessary injury to the owner. He is the agent of both parties, and must consult and respect the rights of both. The sale of a part of a tract of land may injuriously affect the sale or value of the balance; and it may be the duty of the trustee to sell the whole tract, or more of it than is required for the purposes of the trust, especially if desired by the owner of the land to do so. By duly considering the rights, interests and wishes of the parties, an intelligent and faithful trustee will rarely find any difficulty in the discharge of his trust."

masse will be set aside where it is clear that a much better price would have been realized by selling in parcels.¹ In the exercise of a reasonable discretion, he may divide a tract of land and sell it in small lots,² and if it is easily susceptible of division and will bring more if sold in parcels, it becomes the duty of the trustee to so divide and sell it.³ When enough of the land has been sold to pay the secured debt, the trustee must stop the sale, unless he is also authorized to pay other liens out of the proceeds.⁴

Where the property consisted of a single tract at the time it was mortgaged, and was subsequently divided into small lots by the mortgagor, the mortgagee is not bound to notice such subdivision, but may offer the property for sale as one tract.⁵ And he may do this, even though the mortgagor has sold some of the subdivisions to third parties.⁶ Under some circumstances a sale in sep-

Where the mortgaged premises had been laid off into lots and streets, but had not been improved, and were cut into two parcels by a line of railroad, it was held that the mortgagee was not bound to offer each lot separately, but that he was bound to offer the premises in two parcels, according to the railroad division. Patterson v. Miller, 52 Md. 388.

Partial Release.—Where the mortgage covered a single tract, but subsequently the mortgagee released a portion of it, the remainder being in separate parcels, it was held that a sale of the remainder without recognizing the change of its condition, was void under the statute requiring separate tracts to be sold separately. (Comp. Laws Michigan 6915, 6918.) Durm v. Fish, 46 Mich. 311. See also Lee v. Lason, 10 Mich. 403; Udell v. Kahn, 31 Mich. 195.

6. Rights of Subsequent Purchasers.—Where at the time of giving a mortgage, the premises do not consist of two or more separate and distinct tracts, within the meaning of the statute, a foreclosure sale of the entire tract as one parcel, would not be invalid, even though by reason of a subdivision of the property subsequent to the giving of the mortgage, and an acquisition of interest by other persons in separate portions of it, such equities may have arisen that a court of equity, upon timely application, would have arate parcels would not be desirable, and might even be unreasonable, as where two separate tracts are used as a single farm.¹

Where two deeds of trust are given to the same creditor to secure the same debt, each covering an undivided half of the same tract, the whole should be sold together under both deeds, and not one undivided half at one time, and the other half at another.²

By statute in several of the states, sales under powers are required to be made in separate parcels if the premises consist of such, or are easily susceptible of division. But it is generally held that a sale in violation of the statute is not void, but merely voidable, upon a showing that it was done fraudulently or that prejudice resulted therefrom to the owner;³ though the statute says that the sale "must" be so made, it is held to be directory and not mandatory.⁴

A sale, in one parcel, of the premises mortgaged, and also of another tract not covered by the mortgage, does not affect the validity of the sale as to the former. The irregularity cannot be said to have affected bidders, because they must be presumed to know what property the mortgage covered.⁵ The mortgagee himself cannot be heard to object that his own sale was not made in parcels as required by the statute.⁶

Upon a sale in parcels, the power becomes exhausted as soon as a sufficient number have been sold to satisfy the debt and costs; any further sales would be wholly void.⁷

The objection that the trustee should have sold in parcels must be made directly by proceedings to set aside the sale, and not by a collateral attack upon the purchaser's title.⁸

Laches on the part of the owner in complaining that the sale was not made in parcels will justify the court in denying his application for relief.⁹

It was held in one case that where a party had previously and for a valuable consideration waived his right of redemption, he could not be heard to object that the sale was not made in parcels.¹

A person equitably entitled to have parcels covered by a power of sale mortgage sold in the inverse order of alienation, should apply to the court, as well as to the mortgagee, before the sale for that purpose; and if he does not, the sale will not be disturbed as against a bona fide purchaser.²

In giving notice of sale, a statement that the premises, "or so much thereof as may be necessary," will be sold, is the usual and proper form, and is not objectionable as failing to designate the precise parcels to be sold.³ Nor is there anything improper in advertising that the whole premises will be sold; it will be presumed that the trustee will sell no more than is necessary under all the circumstances, having regard to the interests of all parties.⁴

XXI. SALE FOR INADEQUATE PRICE.—The rule has long been settled that where a public sale under a power has been fairly conducted, it will not be disturbed on the sole ground that the purchase price realized was inadequate or greatly below the market value of the property. The sound principle upon which this rule rests is that when the grantor of the power authorized a public sale, he assumed the risk of sacrifice resulting from a lack of competition among bidders.⁵

The mortgagee advertised and sold on the premises one of the lots, realizing less than the mortgage debt and subsequently he advertised and sold the other lots. In Loveland v. Clark, 11 Colo. 265, the court stated the rule in the following terms: "One who sells and conveys his land to another and takes back a deed of was insane at the time of sale, which was made for an inadequate price, is not sufficient to vitiate it.¹

Mere inadequacy of price furnishes even less ground to complain of the sale where a period of redemption is given by statute.² An application to set aside a sale on the ground of inadequacy will not be considered in any case, unless it is shown that a larger price can be realized upon a resale,³ and the objection that the price was inadequate can be made only by parties having an interest in the land or in the fund.⁴ If the property has been conveyed since the sale, to a bona fide purchaser without notice, even the grossest inadequacy of price will not induce the court to set the sale aside.⁵

The fact that in a trust deed the value of each parcel of land is inserted, following the description, imposes no duty upon the trustee to sell for at least such price.⁶

trust to secure the promised payment of the purchase price, as in this case, is entitled, upon default, to either his money or his land. If he enforce his contract fairly and without fraud, there is no warrant for sacrificing him upon the altar of strict construction. Creditor and debtor stand in pari statu; and their contracts, like other contracts, are to be construed fairly and with justice to all parties. The bill of complaint does not charge, nor does the evidence disclose, any fraud in fact. There is no suspicion of any want of fairness and good faith upon the part of the trustees or of either of them. Every reasonable effort appears to have been made to dispose of the property at the highest and best price for the benefit of the parties concerned. A fair price was obtained, all things being considered. The preponderance of testimony is to this effect. There certainly is no ground for saying that the price was grossly inadequate. The mortgagors and mortgagee were all present and bidders at the sale, and found nothing to object to or criticize. The lands in question, since the date of the trust sale, have largely appreciated in value. Hence this suit. In the absence of any fraud or irregularity affecting injuriously the rights of the complainants, the purchaser at the trustee's sale and his grantees should be protected in their title."

The mere fact that the trustee's sale brought only about one-half the market value, is no ground for setting it aside. "To set aside sales for such inadequacy" observes Brace, J., in a recent case, "would have a tendency to impair, if not destroy, the value of such securities, to seriously embarrass business operations, be productive of incalculable injury, and is without precedent." Maloney v. Webb, 112 Mo. 575.

3. Farmers' Bank v. Quick, 71 Mich. 534.

4. In Taylor v. Von Schraeder, 107 Mo. 206, the rule stated in the text was applied as against the daughter of the grantor, notwithstanding the fact that the creditor, who bought at the sale, had previously agreed with the daughter to convey to her and take back a new trust deed.

Who May Raise Question of Inadequacy.—One who has made a fraudulent sale of a note and mortgage cannot, when sued by his purchaser for damages for the fraud, set up in defense that if the plaintiff had waited until a more favorable time, he would have realized a better price at his foreclosure sale. Franklin v. Greene, 2 Allen (Mass.) 519.

A cestui que trust who has received his share of the proceeds of the trustee's sale, cannot, while not attempting to set aside the sale, sue the purchaser on the ground that he was one of the parties to a fraudulent scheme to procure the property at an inadequate price. Richter v. Jerome, 123 U. S. 233.

5. Dryden v. Stephens, 19 W. Va. 1.
6. Parsons v. Rhodes, 22 Hun (N. Y.) 80.

Upon the question of the trustee's good faith, evidence is admissible to show the prices realized at former sales, and that the market value had not increased in the meantime.¹

The fact that the price realized for the property at private sale several years previous to the trustee's sale, or several years afterwards, was two or three times as large as that obtained by the trustee, is not alone sufficient to prove that the latter was grossly inadequate.² Even though the mortgagee or cestui que trust becomes the purchaser, mere inadequacy of price will not vitiate the sale, if it appears to have been in all respects fairly and honestly conducted.³ But a mortgagee is held to a higher degree of care and diligence in obtaining bidders than would be required of a trustee, in cases where he purchases the property at his own sale.⁴

To justify the court in setting a sale aside, on the ground of inadequacy of price, there must be some evidence of fraud, unfair conduct, or mistake.⁵ If the inadequacy is so gross as to indicate bad faith, or the want of reasonable judgment and discretion on the part of the trustee or mortgagee, the court will interfere;⁶

4. Horsey v. Hough, 38 Md. 130.

In Loeber v. Eckes, 55 Md. 1, where property, which was worth between $6,000 and $7,000, was sold for $4,550, and, at least one bona fide bidder, who was anxious to buy, and would have been willing to bid a much higher figure, was induced to stay away by certain representations made by the mortgagee, the court vacated the sale.

Failure to Adjourn Sale.—A leasehold interest in city property, consisting of a new house, located on a fashionable avenue, and worth, in the market, at least $3,500, was sold, under a power of sale mortgage, for $2,500. The day of sale was extraordinarily cold and disagreeable, no one being present but the mortgagor, auctioneer, and the assignees of the mortgage, who also owned the ground rent. There was but one bid made, which was cried for about two minutes, and struck off to the assignees. It was held that, under the circumstances, the holders of the mortgage did not exercise reasonable judgment in going on with the sale on that day, and that, in view of the inadequacy, the sale would be set aside. Chilton v. Brooks, 69 Md. 584.

Sale in Parcels.—At a foreclosure sale, at which the holders of the mortgage became the purchasers, one parcel was sold for a fair price, but the two remaining parcels, which were covered by a stone building, and really constituted but one parcel, were sold separately, and brought a grossly inadequate price. It was held that the entire sale should be set aside. Lalor v. McCarthy, 24 Minn. 417.

Violation of Promise.—Where a trustee had agreed with the debtor upon a minimum bid, which was the amount of the debt, a sale by the trustee to the beneficiary for less than the minimum bid, was held to be subject to the debtor's disaffirmance, although the beneficiary, in fact, regarded the trust debt as paid in full by the sale. Inadequacy of price is significant only when taken in connection with but the price must have been so inadequate as to "shock the moral sense, and create a suspicion of fraud."¹

It is a circumstance of fraud, that the notice of sale was published in a newspaper having no circulation in the vicinity of the property, in consequence of which no one was present but persons acting for the mortgagee.² An erroneous statement in the notice of sale to the effect that there are outstanding adverse claims to the property, in consequence of which bidding is deterred and the sale made at a sacrifice, will vitiate the sale.³ The same is true where it appears that bidding was prevented by the fact that the beneficiary claimed to hold a tax title to the property.⁴

No rule can be laid down by which to determine, in all cases, whether the inadequacy is so gross as to raise the presumption of fraud. Each case must necessarily depend upon its attendant circumstances.⁵ It has been decided that one-half the estimated value of the property is not grossly inadequate.⁶

XXII. PAYMENT AND DISPOSITION OF PROCEEDS—1. In General.—The purchaser at a trustee's or mortgagee's sale is not bound to see to the application of the proceeds. When he has paid the purchase price to the trustee or mortgagee, he is under no obligation to see what becomes of it.⁷

It is no ground for setting aside a sale that the proceeds were other circumstances "tending to show bad faith, mistake, or undue advantage taken of the ignorance or weakness of the persons whose property rights will be affected by the sale, or some other grounds of equitable relief." Hudgins v. Morrow, 47 Ark. 515; Fry v. Street, 44 Ark. 502; King v. Bronson, 122 Mass. 122; Graffam v. Burgess, 117 U. S. 839; Klein v. Glass, 53 Tex. 37; Kline v. Vogel, 11 Mo. App. 211.

4. Martin v. Swofford, 59 Miss. 328.

5. Gross Inadequacy.—A sale for about one-tenth of the value of the property was held invalid in Vail v. Jacobs, 62 Mo. 130. And in Meyer v. Jefferson Ins. Co., 5 Mo. App. 245, a sale for about one-fifth the cash value, made by a trustee who was the managing officer of the creditor corporation, and who knew that the corporation would have willingly bid much more, was held fraudulent. So, in Stoffel v. Schroeder, 62 Mo. 147, where property worth at least $8,500 was sold under a trust deed for $5,000, at a sale occurring at eleven o'clock instead of twelve (the usual hour), and no one was present but the debtor and the beneficiary, who became the purchaser, and at whose solicitation the trustee had been induced to make the sale at that hour, the court set it aside as fraudulent.

In Vail v. Jacobs, 62 Mo. 130, a sale by the trustee to the creditor, of property worth from $5,000 to $8,000, for the sum of $1,000, he being the only bidder present, was set aside.

In Runkle v. Gaylord, 1 Nev. 123, a sale by the mortgagee for about one-third the market value, without making any attempt to obtain a higher bid, was set aside as against a purchaser with knowledge of the facts.

Where property worth $8,000 would have brought nearly its full value if sold in parcels, a sale in gross by the mortgagee for much less, was set aside, Hubbard v. Jarrell, 23 Md. 66; and where property was bid in by the trust creditor for $6,100, and on the same day resold by him for $21,000, it was held that the trustee's sale was at a grossly inadequate price, justifying the court in setting it aside on the ground of fraud. Hope v. Valley City Salt Co., 25 W. Va. 789.

not actually indorsed upon the note secured. Such indorsement is merely evidence of the payment.¹

Several debts secured by the same trust deeds and held by the same persons, but with different sureties, stand on equal footing as liens, and should be paid out of the proceeds ratably, in the absence of some intervening equities.²

The fact that a creditor secured by a trust deed has reduced his claim to judgment, does not, in equity, preclude him from sharing in the proceeds of the trustee's sale.³

Unless restricted by the terms of the power, the mortgagee has the right to sell the property for cash, and a court of equity will not restrain him from so doing.⁴ But he must act in good faith; and if the purchaser offers to pay a large deposit in cash, and to give security for payment of the balance as soon as the sale is ratified by the court, the mortgagee cannot arbitrarily reject the bid and purchase the property for himself, at a lower price.⁵ He has a right to insist upon a reasonable cash deposit by the purchaser, even though the notice does not state the terms of sale, and though such a requirement might prevent a person present from bidding.⁶ Where the terms of sale are prescribed by the mortgage to be cash, a tender by the purchaser, of a note against the party entitled to the purchase-money, is not a compliance with the terms of sale;⁷ but under a mortgage authorizing the mortgagee to sell for cash or on credit, he may make a valid sale for a portion of the price in cash and the balance on credit.⁸ Under a mortgage providing that the terms of sale should be the amount of the debt in cash, and the balance on time, the mortgagee is not bound to realize at least the amount of the debt. He may sell for less, and sue for the deficiency.⁹

2. A debtor, to secure advances, assigned to the defendant four notes and a trust deed which secured the four notes and also secured an earlier note then held by the defendant. The deed provided for a sale on default in payment of any of the notes, the proceeds to be applied to the amount unpaid on the notes. At a sale under the power, the property brought less than the whole amount then due. It was held that the first note was entitled to receive only its pro rata of the proceeds. *Kitchin v. 6. Pope v. Burrage, 115 Mass. 282.

Payment Assumed by Auctioneer.—The purchaser at a foreclosure sale, being unable to make the required cash payment, arranged with the auctioneer to advance the amount for him, whereupon the auctioneer informed the mortgagee that the purchaser had paid the cash, and that it was ready for the mortgagee. It was held that this was equivalent to a cash payment to the auctioneer. Muhlig v. Fiske, 131 Mass. 110.

Payment by Check.—Under a sale advertised to be for cash, a bidder who gives his check for the amount of his bid, which would have been paid upon presentment, sufficiently complies with the terms of sale. McConneaughey v. Bogardus, 106 Ill. 321; Carey v. Brown, 62 Cal. 373.

7. Pursley v. Forth, 82 Ill. 327.

8. Markey v. Langley, 92 U. S. 142.

9. Shepherd v. May, 115 U. S. 505;

If the holder of the notes secured by a trust deed or mortgage, becomes the purchaser at a sale under the power, the indorsement on the notes of the amount of his bid is a sufficient compliance with a requirement that the sale shall be for cash.¹ Even though the sale be advertised or required by the power to be for cash, the fact that the mortgagee gives the purchaser a term of credit for payment of the amount of the mortgagee's debt is not prejudicial to the mortgagor.² And the fact that the purchaser pays no money to the mortgagee, but the amount bid is credited upon a debt due from the latter to the former, in pursuance of a previous arrangement, will not invalidate the sale.³ So long as the mortgagee applies the purchase-money to the satisfaction of his debt, and pays over the surplus in cash to the parties entitled to it, no one interested in the sale has any just ground to complain of the fact that the purchaser was not required to pay cash; usually the granting of time for payment, insures a more advantageous sale.⁴

If the holders of subsequent incumbrances are willing to accept notes from the purchaser at a sale under the prior mortgage, the mortgagor would have no reason to complain that such notes were taken at the sale in lieu of cash.⁵

Where a sale is made for part cash and part credit, as authorized by the terms of the power, interest continues to run on the balance of the mortgage debt, after deducting the cash payment, up to the time of receiving the deferred payments.⁶

2. Surplus Proceeds.—When a sale has been made under a power, the proceeds are first to be applied in payment of the costs and expenses of foreclosure, and then in payment of the debt secured; and whatever remains of the purchase-money after those items have been paid is usually termed the "surplus."

The question of the proper disposition of the surplus is an important, and sometimes difficult, one; and must be decided by the party executing the power, at his peril. In case of doubt, he should refer the determination of the question to the court, in a proceeding to which the various claimants of the fund are made parties.⁷ Ordinarily, the mortgage or trust deed itself provides

In Michigan, it is provided by statute that any claimant of the surplus may file his claim with the officer making the sale, and that a reference may be ordered to take proofs. It is held for the disposition of the proceeds; but it is clear that if such a provision should be contrary to the just and equitable rights of any person having a claim in, or lien upon, the property, the direction in the deed must yield.¹

The most approved form of provision, in a mortgage or trust deed, for the disposition of the surplus proceeds of sale, is that they shall be paid over to the mortgagor or grantor, his heirs, and assigns.² Though the power provides that the surplus shall go to that a petition for such reference must show the relation of the parties cited to the mortgaged property, and that notice must be given to all parties interested in the equity of redemption. Allen v. Wayne Circuit Judges, 57 Mich. 198.

E. mortgaged two adjoining tracts to I. and subsequently deeded one tract, subject to the mortgage, to A., who gave a mortgage back to E. to secure a note for purchase-money, agreeing in that mortgage to pay one-half of the I. mortgage. E. transferred said note to M., and also handed him the A. mortgage, but did not then formally assign it. Afterwards E. mortgaged the other tract to H., with full covenants of warranty, and H. took an assignment of the I. mortgage covering both tracts. M. then procured an assignment of the A. mortgage which he already held. All the conveyances were duly recorded. H. then sold both tracts under power of sale in the I. mortgage, realizing more than the debt and costs. At the time of sale, the value of the tract mortgaged to H. was greater than that of the other tract. In a suit by M. against H. for an account of the surplus proceeds of the sale, it was held that M. occupied the same position as if the A. mortgage had been assigned to him in the first instance; that the difference between the values of the two tracts, should be deducted from the surplus, and that M. was entitled to recover of H. one-half the remainder. *Mayo v. "Objection has also been made to the direction that the surplus shall be payable to the mortgagor, his heirs, or assigns, because, if the sale should be made in his lifetime, but his death should occur before the payment of the surplus, this would then go to his personal representatives, because the land had been converted into personalty at the time of his death. This form is also open to the objection of not being strictly correct in the case of a sale made after the death of the mortgagor, when he has, by his will, directed his executor to convert his real estate into personalty. The terms of the mortgage in these cases would have to yield to these circumstances under which they do not meet the equities of the parties. Although the direction that the surplus shall be paid to the mortgagor, his heirs, or assigns, does not fully meet these exceptional cases, no harm can come from this, because the surplus is, in all cases, bound by the actual rights and equities of the parties interested. No form of words can be used which will, in every case, fully point out to the mortgagee the persons to whom he is to pay the surplus; and that form which is correct generally, and is the most concise, is the best." 2 Jones Mortg. (4th ed.), § 1927.

The English statutory power of sale directs that the surplus be paid to the mortgagor, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, according to their respective rights and interests.

Rights of Heirs.—Mortgagees are not entitled to retain the surplus for their own use, as against the heirs of the mortgagor, though the latter had some years previously agreed to release all interest in the premises to the mortgagees, but had never done so nor surrendered possession. Rushbrook v. Lawrence, 39 L. J. Ch. 93.

When trustees are adjudged to have made an unauthorized sale, and are ordered to pay into court the fair value of the property at the time of sale, the surplus remaining after discharging the debt belongs to the estate of the debtor. Mosley v. Johnson, 86 Va. 429.

Interest of Husband and Wife in Surplus.—Where a wife gave a trust deed of her own property to secure a debt of the mortgagor, and does not name his assigns, yet his assignee in bankruptcy will be entitled to it.¹

In England, and also in some of the states, the rule prevails that in case of a sale after the mortgagor's death, the surplus belongs to his heirs or devisees and not to his personal representatives, and that the latter cannot sue therefor unless the money is needed to pay debts of the estate.² In Massachusetts, however, it is held that the executor or administrator is entitled to sue for the surplus in such cases, but that he holds the money, when recovered, in trust for the widow and heirs.³

Courts of equity, whenever applied to for directions as to the disposition of the surplus arising from a sale by a first mortgagee, consider the land as converted into money, and the lien of junior incumbrancers transferred from the land to the surplus; and the fund is applied to the payment of these liens in the order in which they existed upon the land. Accordingly, a second mortgagee will be entitled to the surplus, or so much of it as may be necessary, in preference to the owner of the equity of redemption.⁴ The surplus is held in trust by the trustee or mortgagee for the use of subsequent incumbrancers, and he should retain it until their rights are settled.⁵

A first mortgagee, upon sale under his power, becomes a trustee for all subsequent incumbrancers and parties in interest, and must act in good faith, with an eye to the best interest of all concerned.

After paying his own lien, he must apply the surplus to the other liens in their respective order.¹

It has been decided in England, that a mortgagee with power of sale is liable to junior mortgagees for damages caused by a misstatement, in his notice of the sale, as to the condition of the premises, in consequence of which the purchaser insisted upon, and obtained, a deduction from his bid, before he would complete it.²

In Minnesota, where by statute the surplus is directed to be paid to the mortgagor, "his legal representatives or assigns," it is held that a junior mortgagee is an "assign," and entitled to the surplus in the hands of a prior mortgagee.³

The consent of a subsequent incumbrancer that his share of the surplus may be paid to a purchaser of the equity of redemption, will not justify such payment as against the mortgagor, because he is entitled to have the mortgage debts discharged before his grantee, under a deed subject to the mortgages, receives anything.⁴

Notice of the incumbrances under which the surplus is claimed, should be given to the mortgagee or trustee making the sale, in order to hold him responsible for failing to pay them out of the fund.⁵

The levy of an attachment upon mortgaged lands does not give the plaintiff any vested interest in the equity of redemption, nor entitle him to share in the surplus proceeds of a mortgage sale consummated before he has reduced his claim to judgment; and a sale of the land under his execution subsequently levied, at which he becomes the purchaser, gives him no claim or lien upon the surplus, either at law or in equity,⁶ unless he files a bill within the statutory period of thirty days after the rendition of his judgment, and while the surplus remains in the hands of the mortgagee.⁷

As against subsequent lienors, the trustee or mortgagee cannot grantor, whether it existed at the date of the deed or not, can compel the trustee to apply the surplus of sale to the payment of his judgment. Hall v. Gould, 79 Ill. 16.

In Russell v. Duffon, 4 Lans. (N. Y.) 399, the view is taken that a mortgagee with the power of sale is not in any proper sense a trustee for subsequent incumbrancers, and is not accountable to them for any surplus until it has actually been paid over to him by the purchasers.

Where a mortgagor and a first mortgagee concurred in making a sale which realized a surplus, and such surplus was paid over to the mortgagor, it was held in an action against the second mortgagee by the first mortgagee that the latter was bound to account to the second mortgagee for the amount of such surplus. West London, etc., Co. v. The Reliance Soc., 27 Ch. Div. 187.

retain the surplus to pay an unsecured claim of his own.¹ Nor can he do this as between himself and the mortgagor.² If the mortgagor or grantor has sold his equity of redemption to a third person, the latter is entitled to receive whatever surplus would have belonged to the former.³

The trustee or mortgagee cannot refuse to pay over the surplus to a purchaser of the equity of redemption, on the ground that his purchase was without consideration and in fraud of creditors.⁴

When the mortgagee becomes the purchaser, his failure to pay over the surplus to the proper persons does not prevent the title from vesting in him.⁵ When he bids in the property for himself, for an excessive amount claimed in his notice of sale as due, and costs, he is personally liable to the mortgagor for the difference between that amount and the amount actually due.⁶

While the mortgagee would be chargeable with interest on the surplus during the time he wrongfully refused to pay it over to the party entitled to it,⁷ yet he is not so chargeable where the surplus has remained unproductive in his hands, awaiting the determination of adverse claims thereto, made upon him by different persons.⁸

Inchoate Title.—The purchaser of the premises at an execution sale, who at the time of a sale under a trust deed is not entitled to a conveyance, the time for redemption from the sheriff's sale not having expired, is entitled to share in the surplus held by the trustee only to the extent of his bid at the sheriff's sale, and the grantor is entitled to the balance. Hart v. Wingart, 83 Ill. 282.

Reimbursement of Surety.—A, the owner of land on which were four trust deeds, conveyed it to one who was a joint surety on A's debts. The surety paid part of the first three secured debts, but took no assignment of them. When the conveyance was made in 1851, the property was worth more than the amount of the secured debts, and the debts for which the grantee was surety; but during the war, it was greatly injured and impaired in value by the Union forces. In 1871, the trustee in the first two trust deeds sold the land under them, for a sum more than sufficient to pay the balance due on those debts. It was held that the surplus should not be applied to reimburse the surety, but should be applied first to the balance due on the third secured debt and then to the fourth secured debt. *Gayle v. Computation of Interest.—In taking an account against a mortgagee who has retained the proceeds of sale beyond the accrued interest and costs, under a sale of part of the premises, a rest must be made at the time of his receiving the proceeds, even though he may have entered into possession when the interest was in arrear. Thompson v. Hudson, 10 L. R. Eq. 497; 40 L. J. Ch. 28.

the trustee's authority and duty as expressed in the trust deed.¹

Purchasers at the sale are chargeable with notice of a provision in the power directing the disposition of the surplus, and have no right to rely upon contrary representations made by the mortgagee or trustee.²

The purchaser at a foreclosure sale has no personal interest in the surplus or its disposition after the incumbrances have been paid, and hence he cannot sue to recover it from one who has wrongfully appropriated it. That right belongs solely to the mortgagor or his assigns.³

As between a purchaser by warranty deed from the mortgagor, and a subsequent incumbrancer with notice of such conveyance, the former is entitled to the surplus arising from a sale under the prior mortgage.⁴ The mortgagee's liability for the surplus does not depend upon his having actually received it from the purchaser. If he gives the latter credit for the purchase price, he must account for the surplus the same as if he had received cash.⁵

Though not expressed in the deed, a resulting trust arises, in favor of the grantor or those claiming under him, as to the surplus after satisfying the secured debt.⁶

Unless authorized by the terms of the power, a trustee or mortgagee has no right to use any part of the proceeds of sale in discharging taxes or prior incumbrances, because the price realized is for the title subject to all incumbrances existing at the time of sale.⁷ But in an action by the mortgagor against the mortgagee to recover an alleged surplus, parol evidence is admissible to show that the consideration named in the mortgagee's deed to the purchaser, included the amount of a prior mortgage, and that the actual purchase price was smaller by that amount.⁸

Surplus proceeds arising from a sale upon default in payment of a portion of the debt secured, should be applied to the portion not due rather than returned to the mortgagor or owner of the

8. Payment of Taxes.—If a trust deed expressly provides that in case of sale the trustee may pay out of the proceeds all money advanced for taxes on the land, he may, out of such proceeds, redeem the land from tax titles. Gormley v. Bunyan, 138 U. S. 623.

8. O'Connell v. Kelly, 114 Mass. 97. See also Story v. Hamilton, 20 Hun (N. Y.) 133, where the mortgagee bid in the property for a sum which included the amount of a prior mortgage, which he then paid, and it was held that this amount was not surplus.

In an action by the mortgagor against the mortgagee, to recover an alleged surplus, the mortgagee is not estopped, by a statement in his affidavit of sale as to the amount of the purchase price, from showing that the sale in fact realized less than the whole amount of incumbrances, which were included in equity, unless a contrary intention can be drawn from the terms of the power.¹ And even though there be no direction as to surplus, or provision that the whole debt shall become due on default in payment of an installment, yet the mortgagee has a right to retain the surplus, subject to the same lien as the property, to satisfy the remaining installment.²

The sale of the entire property upon default in payment of an installment, exhausts the power, unless otherwise provided by statute, and no new sale can be made for a subsequent installment. The proceeds of the first sale represent the entire title.³

The word trustee is often applied to a mortgagee with power of sale; but it is held that he is not a trustee in such sense that the surplus in his hands constitutes a trust fund as between the mortgagor and himself. On the contrary, an action at law may be maintained against him for the surplus, to which he has the right to plead the ordinary Statute of Limitations.⁴ It is also held that the remedy against the trustee for recovery of the surplus is at law, and not in equity.⁵ Assumpsit for money had and received, is the proper form of action by the mortgagor or by other incumbrancers against the mortgagee, to recover the surplus.⁶

The mortgagor or grantor is the real party in interest, and may sue in his own name, or in the name of the mortgagee or trustee, the nominal purchase price, and that he received less than the amount of his own mortgage. Alden v. Wilkins, 117 Mass. 216.

Pleading.—A statement in the complaint, in an action to recover an alleged surplus, that on the day of sale a certain amount and no more was due on the mortgage, is controlled, on demurrer, by other allegations from which the amount due can be ascertained by computation. Perry v. Reynolds, 40 Minn. 499. Dak. 442.

to recover from the purchaser the surplus remaining after paying the debt secured.¹

Where, by statute, the sheriff is the proper officer to make the sale and receive the proceeds, a payment of the surplus to him by the mortgagee buying in the property at the sale, is a complete defense to an action against the latter by the mortgagor.²

An interested party who makes application to the court to have the surplus proceeds of sale paid to him, thereby ratifies the sale and all the preliminary proceedings.³

3. Dower in Surplus.—Where a mortgage is effectual against the inchoate dower right of the mortgagor's wife, she has no dower claim to the surplus proceeds of a sale made during the life of the mortgagor, either as against him or his assignee in bankruptcy.⁴ But if the sale is made after the death of the mortgagor, the widow's dower right having thereby become vested, she is entitled to her share of the surplus.⁵

XXIII. COMPENSATION AND EXPENSES.—A mortgagee with power of sale is not, in the absence of agreement, entitled to any compensation for his personal attention and services in the execution of the power. Whatever he does is done as much for his own benefit as for that of the mortgagor.⁶ Obviously, this reasoning does not apply to a trustee in a trust deed, who has no personal interest in the debt, and who acts as the agent of both parties. He should be allowed a reasonable compensation for his time and labor in the discharge of the trust.⁷ It has been held, however, that the appointment of a trustee in a deed of trust creates no implied promise to pay him for his services in executing the power.⁸

Under a trust deed providing that the grantor shall pay the trustees for their services, they must look to him personally, and cannot claim a lien on the trust property or proceeds of sale, unless there is a surplus.¹

The trustee has no right to withhold a deed from the purchaser who has complied with his bid, merely because the trustee's commissions have not been paid. His compensation is a matter with which the purchaser has no concern.²

In Maryland, the trustee selling under a power is usually allowed a commission of five per cent. of the proceeds; but in case he consents to an adjournment of the sale at the instance of the debtor, he cannot claim an extra allowance for commissions.³ If there is no provision, express or implied, in the deed, for an allowance of commissions to the mortgagee, the Maryland courts, in distributing the fund, will not allow any.⁴

It is usually provided in mortgages and trust deeds that all costs and expenses of executing the power shall first be deducted from the proceeds. Even if the instrument were silent on that point, the necessary and reasonable expenses would be allowed out of the fund produced by the sale.⁵ But if the sale is invalid, the mortgagor or debtor cannot be made to pay the expenses of it.⁶

Expenses of Trust.—A provision authorizing the trustee on foreclosure to pay certain specific claims and also "all other expenses of this trust," does not justify the trustee in paying $260 for an abstract of title, and procuring data before bringing a suit to foreclose. Cheltenham Imp. Co. v. Whitehead, 128 Ill. 279.

Taxes Paid.—The grantor in a trust deed reserved the right to make sales and pay over the proceeds to the trustee, after deducting the expenses of executing the trust. It was held that the expenses in connection with such sales by the grantor were properly classed as expenses of the trust, and that the grantor was entitled to deduct from the proceeds the amount of taxes paid on the land. Nickerson v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 3 McCrary (U. S.) 455; 17 Fed. Rep. 408.

Reimbursement for Permanent Improvements.—If a mortgagee, selling under his power of sale, has reasonably expended money in permanent works and improvements on the property, he is entitled, on prima facie evidence to that effect, to an inquiry whether the outlay has increased the value of the property, and if it has done so, he is entitled to be repaid his expenditure so far as it has increased such value. And, in such case, it is immaterial whether the mortgagor had notice of the expenditure. Shepard v. Jones, 21 Ch. Div. 469.

Costs of Abortive Sale.—The custom of auctioneers to accept on sale of large properties, a check in lieu of cash for the deposit, is reasonable, and a mortgagee vendor was held to be justified in acting on it and not to be guilty of negligence in the conduct of the sale, although the check was dishonored. And in such a case, a mortgagee who of foreclosure are to be construed strictly in favor of the debtor.¹ Unless expressly provided for in the instrument, no charge for an attorney's fee in foreclosing under the power can be made, either against the proceeds of sale or against the debtor, nor is such a charge warranted under a provision relating to the "expenses of sale."²

If a trust deed does not provide for an attorney's fee, none will be allowed in a suit to foreclose.³ A stipulation for an attorney's fee in case of sale under the power, is held not to warrant the allowance of such fee where, instead of executing the power, foreclosure is had by action;⁴ and if the stipulation is for an attorney's fee on foreclosure by the trustee, such fee should not be allowed on suit to foreclose brought by the beneficiary.⁵

In Michigan, it is held that stipulations in mortgages for the allowance of a specified attorney's fee, in case of foreclosure, fixed without regard to the extent or value of the attorney's services, are contrary to public policy.⁶ Redemption has been allowed because an excessive attorney's fee was included in the sum for which the property was bid in at the sale.⁷

Where a mortgage provides for payment of "all attorney's or solicitor's fees," out of the proceeds of sale, and the mortgage notes also provide for the payment of ten per cent. additional for collection after default, the mortgagee is not entitled to retain ten per cent. out of the proceeds, but only a reasonable attorney's fee. In Varnum v. Meserve, 8 Allen (Mass.) 158, where the power provided that the mortgagee might retain out of the proceeds "all costs and expenses of sale," the trial court, in an action to recover a surplus in the hands of the mortgagee after sale, allowed him to retain the sum of $30 for legal advice and services in making a deed to the purchaser. On exceptions to the supreme judicial court, this point seems to have been but slightly considered, the court saying merely that "the expenses for which the defendant asks allowance do not seem objectionable."

Under a provision for an attorney's fee, in case of foreclosure, no fee can be charged where the advertisement of sale, being defective, was withdrawn after a single publication, and a tender of the amount due was then made.¹ But after the mortgage has been placed in an attorney's hands for foreclosure, and he has drawn the notice of sale, and caused it to be set in type by the printer, the mortgagor cannot stop the foreclosure without paying, in addition to the mortgage debt, the reasonable value of the attorney's services, within the limit fixed by the mortgage, and also the printer's charges.²

A stipulation in a mortgage or trust deed for a "reasonable attorney's or solicitor's fee, not exceeding five per cent.," does not, of itself, render the contract usurious.³

XXV. REDEMPTION FROM SALES UNDER POWERS.—The power to sell, unless restricted by its terms, embraces the entire estate of the donor; and when the power has been executed in a valid manner, no right of redemption remains in the donor or his privies, except in those states where such right is expressly conferred by statute.⁴ Subsequent incumbrancers and lienors, as well as the donor and his assigns, are effectually cut off by the sale, and can resort only to the surplus proceeds, if there be any.⁵

The fact that the creditor, after selling the land under the power, and, realizing therefrom a portion of the secured debt, obtains and collects a judgment for the balance, does not operate to open the sale so as to enable the debtor to redeem. Weld v. Rees, 48 Ill. 428.

Extinguishment of Easement.—A mortgage with power of sale in fee simple contained a reservation to the mortgagors of the right to release certain easements over adjoining land, created by a former owner of both tracts. The mortgagors were, at the date of the mortgage, tenants of the servient estate. The mortgage description included "all the rights and easements," etc. Upon default, the power of sale was executed, and the premises conveyed to the purchaser in fee simple. It was held that the sale under the power extinguished the right reserved, and the mortgagor's subsequent release of the easement was null and void; also, that a building, in the nature of an obstruction of the easement, erected by the mortgagors on the servient estate while they were in possession, was an infringement, which the purchaser was entitled to have removed. Bull's Petition, 15 R. I. 534.

5. Lowe v. Grinnan, 19 Iowa 193; Plum v. Studebaker, 89 Mo. 162.

A regular and valid sale under the power is equivalent to a strict foreclosure by bill in equity in which the mortgagor and all subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers are joined.¹ But if a mortgage or trust deed with power of sale is foreclosed by proceedings in equity, the decree of foreclosure should provide for redemption, as in ordinary cases.²

If the foreclosure is attended by serious irregularities, the debtor, as is more fully explained elsewhere in this article, is given the right to disaffirm the sale and recover his property by paying the amount due; and this right is sometimes spoken of as the right to redeem; but it may more properly be called the right of disaffirmance.³

The fact that the debt secured was infected with usury does not entitle the debtor to redeem from a sale under the power; he should have tendered the amount legally due, before foreclosure.⁴

In any action to disaffirm or redeem, the purchaser at the sale is a necessary party.⁵

In a number of the states, it is now provided by statute that the owner, his assigns, and lien creditors, may redeem from the sale at any time during a certain period thereafter, by paying the amount realized from the sale, together with interest and costs of foreclosure. The effect of such statutes is, of course, to put a limitation upon all powers of sale in the states where they exist, and to render the purchaser's title defeasible during the statutory period.⁶

It is held that infancy or other disability cannot extend the

3. When the beneficiary in a trust deed containing a power of sale filed a bill to foreclose, and a decree was entered directing the trustee to sell the property upon giving a specified notice, and to report his proceedings for approval, it was held that the sale was not by virtue of the power, but under the decree, and that the right of redemption existed as in cases of mortgages without power of sale. *Fitch v. 5. The beneficiary in a trust deed agreed with the grantor that the property should be sold by the trustee, and bought in by the beneficiary and then conveyed in fee to the grantor, who was to give a mortgage back as upon an extension of the loan. The sale was accordingly made, and the property bought in by the beneficiary, who refused to carry out the arrangement, and quit-claimed the property to a third person having notice. It was held that the transaction was in effect a mortgage, and the grantor was entitled to redeem, as against such purchaser with notice. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Slee, 123 Ill. 57.

right of redemption beyond the period allowed by statute.¹ But an agreement, for a valuable consideration made during the statutory period, to extend the time for redemption, is regarded as superseding the foreclosure sale and deed.²

The right of redemption from a sale under a power is governed by the statute in force when the mortgage was executed, and is not affected by a subsequent act extending the time, or making it run from the date of filing notice of the sale.³ So, if there is no redemption after sale, allowed by the statute in force at the time of execution, a subsequent act conferring the right cannot apply to any mortgage or trust deed previously executed.⁴

Where the redemption is required to be made through the sheriff, and he accepts a certain amount as sufficient, which sum is enough to satisfy the purchaser's claim, it is a good redemption, and any shortage must be deducted from the sheriff's fees.⁵

Taxes voluntarily paid by the purchaser after the foreclosure sale cannot be tacked to the amount required to be paid by a redemptioner.⁶

The equitable rule that a mortgagor cannot be bound by a clause in the mortgage waiving his right of redemption, applies as well to power of sale mortgages as to any other kind.⁷

In respect to trust deeds, unless the statutory right of redemption is made to apply to them, the grantor may stipulate in the deed that there shall be no redemption from the trustee's sale.⁸

Section 3299 provides that no one shall have the benefit of the preceding section until he shall have given security for the payment of interest accruing after the sale. The court holds that such security must be given either at the date of the sale, or within a reasonable time thereafter; and that a delay of four months is fatal. *Udike v. XXVI. EQUITABLE JURISDICTION—1. Injunction to Restrain Sale.—To warrant a court of equity in restraining a sale under a trust deed or power of sale mortgage, a state of facts must be shown which would render the proposed sale clearly inequitable, oppressive, and unjust. A stronger case must be made out than upon an application to set aside a consummated sale.¹

The decisions are not entirely harmonious upon the question as to what circumstances will justify an injunction, some courts being more reluctant to interfere than others. Clearly, if the threatened sale would be absolutely void, even as against a bona fide purchaser, the party aggrieved has an adequate remedy at law, and is not entitled to have the sale enjoined.²

The fact that the mortgagor has become insolvent is not sufficient ground for restraining a sale;³ nor is the fact of a pendency of an action to redeem.⁴

In one case, where the complainant purchased land subject to a mortgage which had not then been recorded, and which he supposed was in the common form without a power of sale, the court restrained a sale under the power for a reasonable time, to enable him to raise the amount necessary to redeem.⁵

The trustee being the agent of both parties, and bound to act impartially between them, and to use every reasonable effort to sell the estate to the best advantage, the rule prevails in some courts that before proceeding to exercise the power of sale, in all cases where there is a cloud upon the title, a doubt or uncertainty as to the amount to be raised, or as to the relative amounts or priorities of the respective liens, or where the aid of a court of equity may be necessary to remove some impediment to the fair and proper execution of his trust, it is his duty to apply to the court for directions; and that if he fails or refuses to do so, the party threatened with injury by his default may have equitaright of redemption in case of sale, and that, in consideration of such waiver, the grantee agrees to make the property bring, at the sale, at least $4,000, the grantee is not bound to sell for that minimum unless he makes the sale free from the equity of redemption. Ordway v. White, 3 Lea (Tenn.) 537.

Power of Sale Must be Alleged.—An application to enjoin a foreclosure sale, alleging merely that the mortgagors "made their certain mortgage, and by the terms thereof mortgaged to the defendant the aforesaid premises," is insufficient to show that such mortgage contained any power of sale, and therefore a preliminary injunction should be denied, because if there was no power of sale, the threatened sale would be a nullity and create no cloud upon the plaintiff's title. Grant County v. Colonial, etc., Mortg. Co. (S. Dak. 1892), 53 N. W. Rep. 746.

4. Adams v. Scott, 7 W. R. 213.

5. Platt v. McClure, 3 Woodb. & M. (U. S.) 151. Referring to this decision, Mr. Jones says: "It is conceived that in those parts of the country in which power of sale mortgages are now the usual and common form, an injunction would not now be granted on like ble relief.¹ The mere fact that the trust estate is incumbered by other trust deeds and judgment liens is no reason for interfering with the trustee's sale, unless the amount or priority of such liens is in dispute;² and the fact that the trustee is insolvent is not alone sufficient to justify the court in restraining him from executing the power. He may be in every respect qualified to perform the trust, and yet be insolvent.³ Also, the probability that owing to the state of the weather, or the scarcity of money, the property will have to be sold for less than its real value, furnishes subsequent lienors no ground for restraining the trustee's sale.⁴

A trustee's sale will be enjoined where the secured notes were given without consideration,⁵ and this notwithstanding the conveyance was executed in fraud of the grantor's creditors.⁶

Payment of the entire debt secured affords ground for injunction;⁷ and a sale will be enjoined where all remedy under the trust deed has become barred by limitation, as in case of ten years adverse possession.⁸

Where the trustee is attempting to sell the property subject to conflicting and disputed liens, the parties interested are entitled to an injunction and an order in equity to administer the fund and ascertain the liens. Draper v. Davis, 104 U. S. 347.

In Drayton v. Chandler, 93 Mich. 383, the court said: "That the statutory foreclosure by advertisement is not adapted to cases where there are conflicting equities, which can only be properly considered and protected in a court of chancery, was clearly held by this court in Dohm v. Haskins, 88 Mich. 144, and we consider that as the settled law of this state."

Disputed Ownership of Mortgage.—B. and R. separately advertised to sell a parcel of land under a power in a mortgage which they both claimed to own. A preliminary injunction was granted restraining R. from selling under the power. At the hearing, it appeared that R. had the legal title to the mortgage, but that both were entitled to share in the proceeds. It was held that the injunction was properly dissolved, and that B. should be allowed to proceed with the sale and R. be admitted to share in the proceeds. Rappanier v. Bannon (Md. 1887), 8 Atl. his purpose being to coerce the mortgagor into paying another and unsecured claim, presents a proper case for an injunction.¹

A sale under a trust deed will be enjoined where the beneficiary, contrary to his agreement, has failed to procure a discharge of certain judgment liens upon the property.²

A sale about to be made in violation of an agreement, supported by a valuable consideration, for an extension of time of payment, will be enjoined;³ but it is no ground for enjoining a mortgagee's or trustee's sale, that the beneficiary owes the grantor, on a separate account, more than the amount of the secured debt.⁴ A claim by the mortgagee in his notice of sale, of a larger amount than the mortgagor claims is actually due, will sometimes warrant an injunction to restrain the sale until the amount due can be ascertained.⁵ But if there is no substantial question as to the amount of the beneficiary's debt, a sale under the power will not be enjoined for the taking of an account.⁶

Unless the insolvency of the mortgagee, or some other special circumstance, be shown, a sale under his mortgage will not be enjoined because of a pending suit to settle partnership accounts between the mortgagor and mortgagee, which are not connected with the mortgage debt.⁷

Where there have been mutual dealings between the parties and the balance due from the mortgagor is in dispute, a sale advertised under the power in the mortgage should be enjoined until the balance due is ascertained and declared by a decree of court. *Capehart v. not be enjoined merely because the surety has not actually paid the debt.¹

Where the mortgaged property greatly exceeds, in value, the amount of the debt, equity may interfere and confine the exercise of the power to a sale of such portion as will be sufficient to pay the debt and expenses.²

An attempted sale of a greater estate in the land than is authorized by the power, will not be enjoined, because such sale would be void, and adequate relief could be had at law.³

A vendee who has given a trust deed on the property to secure the purchase price, upon showing that the title is doubtful, is entitled to have the trustee enjoined from selling.⁴

A creditor secured by trust deed upon the landlord's interest in growing crops, is entitled to enjoin their removal by the tenant, contrary to the terms of his agreement with the landlord.⁵

A failure to give the notice prescribed by statute, or the terms of the power, is no reason for enjoining the sale, because purchasers are bound to take notice of such requirements, and if the proper notice is not given, the right of redemption is not cut off by the sale.⁶

Relief by injunction must be sought before the sale has been made, otherwise, the party injured cannot have further proceedings under the sale enjoined. He should have attended the sale and given bidders notice of his equities.⁷

A preliminary injunction will be continued in force until a hearing upon the merits, where the facts upon which it was granted are not clearly disproven, especially when the security will remain unimpaired.⁸

Under a statute requiring an application to enjoin a sale under mortgage to be made "immediately" after receiving notice of the sale, a delay of a month after such notice is not fatal to the application, in the absence of a showing of prejudice to the mortgagee by the delay.⁹

Ex Parte Application.—In South Dakota, under a statute authorizing application to be made to a district judge for an order enjoining foreclosure by advertisement, and directing that all further proceedings be had in the district court, it is held that the application is ex parte by the mortgagor, and that no resisting affidavits can be allowed. Commercial Nat. Bank v. Smith, 1 S. Dak. 28.

It is no answer to an application for a preliminary injunction against a threatened sale, that the filing of a notice of lis pendens would charge purchasers with notice of the applicant's rights.¹

The bill for an injunction must set out fully and distinctly the grounds upon which the complainant relies, and must present the facts in such manner that the court can determine upon the face of the bill the extent of the complainant's rights and the nature of the injury threatened. Mere conclusions or inferences will not be considered.²

The maxim that he who seeks equity must do equity, applies to cases where the debtor seeks to have the execution of a power of sale perpetually enjoined. He must be willing to pay the amount justly due under the mortgage.³

A grantee of a mortgagor cannot restrain an assignee of the mortgagee from selling, on the ground of fraud practised by the mortgagee upon the mortgagor in obtaining the mortgage, unless the plaintiff is willing to pay the entire mortgage debt, although the mortgage was assigned to the defendant as security for a smaller sum,⁴ or even though he took it with notice of the fraud.⁵

Payment or tender of the amount justly due, with legal interest, is a condition precedent to obtaining an injunction against a sale upon the ground of usury, even though by statute the effect of usury is to avoid the contract.⁶

Where the mortgage, though not technically usurious, provides for an unconscionably high rate of interest after default, equity will, it seems, interfere and enjoin the mortgagee from selling for more than the debt and lawful interest.⁷

In case of wrongful injunction, the mortgagee is entitled to recover, in addition to the usual costs, interest on the debt during the time the injunction was in force, and in case of a deficiency after the sale, the value of emblements removed by the owner.¹

A sale made under the power in violation of an injunction would be void.²

Having once acquired jurisdiction, equity will grant full relief, and if necessary, direct a sale of the trust property.³ But the substantial terms of sale as prescribed by the power cannot be disregarded or altered by the court without consent of all the parties interested.⁴ If deemed necessary in order to secure a fair sale, the court may order the sale to be conducted by its own commissioner, instead of the mortgagee or trustee.⁵

Jurisdiction to decree a trustee's sale of railroad property is not affected by the fact that a portion of the road lies outside the territorial limits of the judicial district. A sale under such decree passes title to the entire line.⁶

2. Setting Aside Sale.—Whenever it is made to appear to a court of equity that a trustee or mortgagee has acted fraudulently, unfairly, or oppressively in executing his power of sale, or has failed to comply with the essential requirements of the power, and that some party in interest has been prejudiced thereby, relief will be afforded by setting the sale aside and allowing an opportunity to redeem.⁷

Where the mortgagor seeks to enjoin a sale on the ground of usury, and offers, in his bill, to pay whatever may be found due, and submits himself to the jurisdiction of the court, a sale may be decreed without the filing of a cross-bill. Mooney v. Walter, 69 Ala. 75.

In a suit to restrain a trustee's sale on the ground of usury, the amount of usury having been deducted, the injunction was dissolved, and the trustee ordered to sell and report to the court. There were other liens on the property, some prior, and others subsequent, to the trust deed in question, and their amounts were not ascertained. It was held that the court erred in ordering the sale before having an account taken of all such liens. Alexander v. Howe, 85 Va. 108. See also Cole v. M'Rae, 6 Rand. (Va.) 644.

at the same time.¹ Though the sale was regular in form and fairly conducted, it will be set aside on proof that the mortgage was without any consideration.² Unimportant irregularities or defects in the sale proceedings, which are not shown to have caused injury, will not be allowed to affect the purchaser's title.³

(The doctrine of equitable interference with sales under powers will be found frequently illustrated throughout this article, in connection with the treatment of its various sub-titles. Accordingly, the general discussion of the doctrine and its applications under this head is not intended to embrace all the cases of equitable relief, for a large number of which the reader is referred to those sub-titles of this article dealing with the execution of powers by trustees and mortgagees.)

Literal Compliance.—In Thompson v. Heywood, 129 Mass. 401, Soule, J., citing Montague v. Dawes, 14 Allen (Mass.) 369, said: "One who undertakes to execute a power of sale is bound to the observance of good faith, and to a careful regard for the interests of his principal. A mere literal compliance with the terms of the power is not enough. And though a stranger to his proceedings, finding them regular in form, and purchasing in good faith, and who has paid value for the premises, might not be affected by his unfaithfulness, no one who participates with him in attempting to execute the power without regard to the interests of the principal, is entitled to reap any benefit from such fraudulent conduct." Drinan v. Nichols, 115 Mass. 353.

Sale of More Land Than Necessary.—An order dissolving an injunction against a trustee's sale, directed that only so much of the property should be sold as might be necessary to pay the debt as stated in the creditor's answer, without prejudice to the debtor's rights on final hearing. It was proved on final hearing, after the sale, that the debt was considerably less than the amount claimed by the creditor in his answer and at the sale. It was held that a resale should be ordered. Meyers v. Jones, 2 Lea (Tenn.) 159.

A court of equity will, where land mortgaged greatly exceeds in value the amount of the debt, interfere at the instance of the owner of the equity of redemption, and confine the sale to such portion of the land as will be sufficient to pay the debt and costs. And while such application should be made before the sale takes place, yet, where the mortgagor was absent on a foreign voyage as a naval officer at the time of the sale, and knew nothing of it, it was held that such absence was a sufficient excuse for failing to apply before the sale, and that the court would set the sale aside and order a resale of enough to satisfy the debt and costs. Johnson v. Williams, 4 Minn. 260.

Misrepresentations.—Where the mortgagee's agent at a sale under his mortgage stated that certain prior incumbrances on the property were much larger than the facts justified, and also represented a certain judgment and mortgage to be independent liens; whereas, in fact, they were merely additional securities for the other claims, the sale was set aside, though the mortgagee was not personally present, and the purchasers were relatives of the mortgagor, and there was testimony that the property brought its full market value. Wicks v. Wescott, 59 Md. 270.

The complainants gave a trust deed to L. and a second one to P., and afterward received an offer for the land which was more than sufficient to pay both debts, but L. dissuaded them from selling, by representing that the land would bring a better price at trustee's sale; that he would bid it in, buy up P.'s debt, and allow the complainants to remain in possession and redeem the land. In pursuance of a scheme between L. and P. to get the land and divide the profits, it was sold under both trust deeds at the same time, but in different places, and L. got possession as purchaser, whereupon he repudiated his agreement with the complainants. It was held that equity had jurisdiction to annul the sale and title so acquired. Long v. McGregor, 65 Miss. 70.

A trustee's sale will not be set aside merely because of an announcement made by the trustee that the title would

Equity will not interfere with a sale made or about to be made on default in payment of interest under a power giving the right to declare the whole debt due upon such default, merely on the ground of relieving against a forfeiture.¹ And a sale will not be set aside merely because a larger attorney's fee was claimed in the notice of sale than was authorized by the terms of the mortgage, where it is not shown that any prejudice resulted.² Nor can a sale, made in full compliance with the terms of the power, be set aside on the ground that its provisions were severe and the rate of interest high;³ nor that the mortgagor, through his own mistake or carelessness, did not attend the sale or protect his interests.⁴

A sale having been fairly conducted, it is no ground for setting it aside that the debtor was very ill at the time of the sale and soon afterwards died.⁵

It is incumbent upon the party who applies to a court of equity to set aside a sale on the ground that it was not properly advertised or fairly conducted, to establish such grounds by clear and satisfactory evidence.⁶ It will not be presumed merely from the relationship of the parties, that the purchaser at the sale exercised any undue influence over the person who executed the power.⁷

If the owner of the equity of redemption, with knowledge of irregularities in the sale, leads an intending purchaser from the holder of the trustee's deed to believe that the power was properly executed, he will not be allowed, as against such purchaser, to disturb the sale.⁸ Only persons interested in the trust estate at the time of sale are allowed to complain of irregularities in respect to giving notice of the sale. Thus a subsequent purchaser from the mortgagor, with knowledge of the sale, cannot raise the objection.⁹

is not entitled in equity to have the sale set aside. A court of equity will not assist a party who has lost his rights through his own negligence."

The defendants, in a suit to establish

As stated elsewhere, mere inadequacy of price is no ground for setting aside a sale under a power;¹ but when it is also made to appear that the inadequacy was caused by a failure on the part of the mortgagee or trustee to perform his duty in respect to obtaining the best possible price, or by his misconduct in any other respect, equity will set aside the sale if it can be done without disturbing the rights of innocent parties.² So if the successful bidder induces others present not to bid, or to withdraw their bids, and thus gets the property for less than its value, his conduct is a fraud against which equity will relieve.³

an equitable lien upon land pending the suit, transferred to the complainant certain notes secured by trust deeds on the land, which notes he agreed to collect, and to credit the proceeds upon his claim. The suit, however, was not dismissed, nor was the agreement filed until after the complainant had procured a sale of the land under the trust deeds for his benefit. It was held that the sale could not be set aside at the instance of the purchasers of the land subject to the trust deeds, and who had assumed the debt secured by them. Sawyer v. Campbell, 130 Ill. 186.

Rights of Unsecured Creditors.—A trustee's sale made on the request of the beneficiary, and consummated by a deed in which the debtor joins, is valid as against a creditor of the beneficiary, though the trustee had not given the bond or taken the oath required by statute. *Ferris v. Where a trust deed provided for a sale at public auction, and the trustee privately fixed the price at which the property should be sold, and got his attorney to bid it in at that price, which was much less than its value, for the benefit of the creditor, no other bidders being present, it was held that it was a mere private sale, though in form a public auction, and that the grantor could redeem. Williamson v. Stone, 27 Ill. App. 214; 128 Ill. 129.

Where the trustee agreed with the owner of the property to postpone the sale for an hour to enable him to procure a certified check with which to pay the entire debt, but, instead of waiting, the trustee sold the property within the hour for less than the debt, it was held that his conduct was fraudulent, and that the sale should be set aside. Ventres v. Cobb, 105 Ill. 33.

Fraud by Mortgagee.—A mortgagee with the power of sale, purposely published a notice of foreclosure in a newspaper published in a city distant from that where the mortgaged premises were situated, whereby the mortgagor and intending bidders were kept in ignorance of the sale. He refrained from demanding payment, discouraged at least one probable bidder from attending, claimed in the notice a portion of the debt which was not due—including an exorbitant attorney's fee, made no effort to get bidders, and bid in the property himself for about one-sixth of its value. It was held that his conduct was fraudulent, and the sale should be set aside. Newman v. Ogden, 82 Wis. 53.

3. Dover v. Kennerly, 44 Mo. 145; Fenner v. Tucker, 6 R. I. 551.

Generally, any secret agreement between the mortgagee or trustee and others, which tends to prevent competition in bidding, and which was carried out at the sale, entitles the holder of the equity of redemption to have the sale set aside.¹

A purchaser with actual knowledge of irregularities is not protected by a provision in the power that the purchaser shall not be bound to make any inquiries.²

A trustee's sale made in violation of an agreement between the parties to extend the time for paying the note until the debtors were notified by the holder that he desired payment, is a fraud against which equity will relieve.³ But a mere voluntary assurance to the holder of the equity that the property would not be sold so long as he paid the interest promptly, is not binding, even in equity.⁴

In proceedings to set aside the sale, the original purchaser and his successors in title are necessary parties.⁵

The defects or irregularities relied upon must be clearly and specifically set forth in the bill.⁶

Some refinements have been made by the courts in respect to the proper form of proceeding to test the validity of a sale under the power, it being suggested that the complainant should bring a bill to redeem, rather than one to set the sale aside.⁷ Practically, this is of little importance, as the relief afforded under a bill to set aside the sale is based upon similar principles, and subject to like conditions as govern a bill to redeem. The owner of the equity of redemption who succeeds in vacating the sale does not thereby extinguish the debt or the mortgage lien. He is simply restored to his right of redemption, as if there had been no sale.⁸

Where the court holds that no valid sale has been made, a decree may be entered, vacating the sale and allowing complainant

3. Rounsavell v. Crofoot, 4 Ill. App. 671. It was also held in this case that, inasmuch as the holder of the note had been receiving payments of interest at a place other than that designated in the deed, good faith required that, before demanding payment at the place designated, he should have notified the debtors that he would no longer collect at the other place as he had previously done.

Promise of Personal Notice.—A judgment creditor, whose lien is subordinate to a trust deed, cannot attack the title of a purchaser at a sale by the trustee, on the ground that a former owner of the trust note had promised the judgment creditor to give him notice of the sale, but which he had refrained from doing, at the instance of the purchaser, and by reason of which the creditor did not learn of the sale and was thus prevented from bidding. The public advertisement was all the notice to which the creditor was entitled. Tisomingo Sav. Inst. v. Duke (Miss. 1887), 1 So. Rep. 165.

to redeem within a specified time, by paying the amount found due; or, upon default of such payment, a decree that the bill be dismissed. There is no error in refusing to decree a sale.¹ If the sale was fraudulent, and the purchaser was a party to the fraud, the owner of the equity of redemption will not be required to pay the amount of the purchase price as a condition of setting the sale aside.²

Where the complainant's bill does not show a willingness to pay defendant the amount properly chargeable against the property, and defendant stands ready and willing to reconvey upon payment of such amount, the bill may be dismissed.³

Upon failure by the debtor to comply with the condition of payment imposed by the court in setting aside the sale, the decree becomes inoperative, and is no defense to an action of ejectment by the purchaser.⁴

3. Ratification and Laches.—In respect to irregularities in a sale under a power, equity will not permit the complaining party to remain inactive after he has learned of the defects, and still retain the privilege at some time in the future of letting the sale stand or setting it aside, according as it may then be found for his interest to do. He must act promptly, and within a reasonable time, or he will be barred by his own laches.⁵ There is no fixed period within which the suit to avoid the sale must be commenced. The question of laches depends upon all the circumstances of each particular case. The facts that the property has greatly increased in value during the period of delay, and that the rights of third parties have intervened, are often of controlling weight in determining the question.⁶

What Constitutes Laches.—Four years delay was held to constitute inexcusable laches in Cornell v. Newkirk, 144 Ill. 241.

In Learned v. Foster, 117 Mass. 365, a delay of thirteen years by the holder of the equity, in bringing suit to redeem,

In regard to notice of the defects complained of, knowledge by the mortgagor of the fact that a foreclosure sale has been made, is presumptively sufficient to put him on inquiry as to the regularity of the foreclosure proceedings.¹ If the sale was absolutely void, no acquiescence for a period short of that prescribed by statute will be considered as a waiver of the invalidity, or a confirmation of the sale.²

As against infants, there can be no ratification of an irregular and voidable sale under the power.³

4. Parties in Equity.—The general rule is, that in a bill to foreclose a mortgage the only necessary or proper parties are the mortgagor, the mortgagee or trustee holding the power of sale, and such persons as have acquired any interests from them subsequent to the mortgage. One who claims title from a stranger, or even from the mortgagor, anterior to the date of the mortgage, should not be brought in as a party defendant.⁴

While the cestui que trust is a very proper party to a bill by the trustee to foreclose, it is held that he is not ordinarily a necessary one.⁵ But the cestuis que trustent are necessary parties in proceedings against the trustee affecting the subject-matter of the trust.⁶

was held unreasonable, the complainant having lived within a mile of the property and known of the purchaser's possession, though he had no actual knowledge of the sale. So of a delay of nearly ten years in bringing suit to set aside a sale on the sole ground that the mortgagee became the purchaser. Askew v. Sanders, 84 Ala. 356.

In Bausman v. Eads, 46 Minn. 148, a neglect for eight years after a mortgage sale to make any objection to it, was held to justify a subsequent purchaser in relying upon the foreclosure as valid.

Diligence in Discovering Irregularities.—In Bush v. Sherman, 80 Ill. 160, the court, in discussing the question of laches, said: "The principle that lies at the foundation of all the cases in this court upon this subject is: The party who challenges a sale on account of irregularities that may have intervened must be diligent in discovering that which he alleges will avoid the sale, and diligent in his application for relief." This language was quoted with approval in the recent case of Cornell v. Newkirk, 144 Ill. 241. See also Hoyt v. Pawtucket Sav. Inst., 110 Ill. 399; McDonald v. Stow, 109 Ill. 40; *Breit v. The mortgagor cannot be required to bring his action to set aside a void sale before the expiration of the statutory period of redemption. Hull v. King, 38 Minn. 349.

Statutory Limitation.—A failure to state separately, in a notice of sale, the amount due on separate lots covered by a single mortgage, is a "defect in the notice," within the meaning of Gen. Laws Minnesota 1883, ch. 112, limiting to five years the commencement of actions to set aside foreclosure sales on account of defects in the notice of sale. Bitzer v. Campbell, 47 Minn. 221. The act of 1883 does not apply to a foreclosure sale, absolutely void on account of an absence of authority to execute the power, as where the mortgagee was dead at the time of sale, and the foreclosure was made in his name. Bausman v. Kelley, 38 Minn. 197.

Where the validity of the trust deed is involved, the trustee is not, by virtue of his office, a proper representative of the cestuis que trustent; they must be brought into court.¹

The trustee, as well as the owners of the equity of redemption, is a necessary party to a bill for foreclosure.² And it has been held that he is an indispensable party, and that the objection of non-joinder may be raised at any stage of the proceedings.³

One of three trustees may sue alone for foreclosure, upon a showing that one of his co-trustees is dead, and that the other is claiming an adverse interest in the estate.⁴ In proceedings to remove the trustee, or to appoint a successor, the grantor of the trust, and also purchasers from him, are necessary parties.⁵

Foreclosure After Release by Mistake.—Defendant's grantor purchased land from plaintiff by a warranty deed, and gave plaintiff a purchase-money mortgage, with power of sale. These were duly recorded. Subsequently, to correct an alleged defective description, plaintiff gave defendant's grantor a quit-claim deed of the land, which was not intended by the parties as a release of the mortgage. This was also recorded.

Thereafter defendant bought the land, with notice of the purpose for which the quit-claim deed was given. Plaintiff proceeded to foreclose the mortgage by advertisement and sale under the power, and bought in the land at the sale. No redemption was ever made from this sale. In an action brought by plaintiff to have the effect of the quit-claim deed limited so as not to release the mortgage, and for other relief, the trial court held that the legal effect of the quit-claim was to discharge the mortgage; that, therefore, the foreclosure under the power was null and void; but that, inasmuch as the quit-claim was not intended by the parties to have that effect, plaintiff was entitled to a decree limiting its effect as to the mortgaged property, and reinstating the mortgage, and directing judicial foreclosure. From so much of the decree as held the foreclosure by advertisement void, plaintiff appealed. The decree was affirmed, the court saying: "To entitle one to foreclose a mortgage by advertisement, he must have a legal mortgage in which is a power of sale. It must have been duly recorded, Gen. St. 1878, ch. 81, § 2. The statute authorizing this method of foreclosure, evidently designs that there shall be of record a legal mortgage, and that the record shall be so complete as to satisfactorily show the right of the mortgagee or his assigns to invoke its aid. There can be no foreclosure under this statute, of an equitable mortgage, and that was all plaintiff had after the record of the deed, which operated to release and discharge gage debt to judgment, so long as the judgment remains unsatisfied, does not suspend or extinguish the power of sale.¹ On the other hand, payment of the debt before sale, absolutely extinguishes the power.² Such, also, is the effect of a valid tender of the amount due.³ Any sale under the power after its extinguishment by payment in full, is a nullity,⁴ but as to bona fide pur-

the previously existing incumbrance. At least, not until the entry of the judgment appealed from." Benson v. Markoe, 41 Minn. 112. It may be seriously questioned whether this decision does not proceed upon erroneous views. The statute cited merely required the mortgage to be recorded, and this had been done. If the quit-claim deed was not intended by the parties to operate as a discharge of the mortgage, it is difficult to see how the court could hold that that was its legal effect, but even if it were technically discharged, the mortgage was still of record, had not in equity or in fact been satisfied, and the defendant had purchased with full knowledge of the intention of the parties. It would seem that the power of sale given by the mortgage was thus left in full force and operation, as against all parties interested, and having been exercised by the mortgagee upon default, and the statutory formalities complied with, the sale under it was entirely valid as against the defendant who had notice of the facts. Yet here the court, sitting in equity, declares a power of sale wholly extinguished by reason of a mere technicality, contrary to the intention of any of the parties interested, and in the absence of any statute forbidding the exercise of the power so long as it actually existed.

As said in Fergusond v. Glassford, 68 Mich. 36, "It is an elementary rule that equity will consider an incumbrance in force if the ends of justice can thereby be obtained."

A deed of trust was given to a husband and wife on lands of the wife. She having died, the husband and her heirs conveyed the land to a third person and took the purchase-money notes, secured by vendor's lien, payable to the trustee, one of them being given to the cestui que trust in payment of the trust debt. Subsequently, the vendee, without the knowledge of the cestui que trust, reconveyed to the husband, who, in consideration of the surrender of the note held by the cestui que trust, deeded him a part of the land, from which he was afterwards ejected by the wife's heirs. It was held that as against the heirs, he had not lost his superior title under the trust deed. McKinney v. Matthews (Tex. 1888), 6 S. W. Rep. 793.

Rights of Other Creditors.—A conveyed land to a trustee to secure a debt to B, with power to sell on default. After default, A conveyed absolutely to B, who indorsed on the trust deed that it was satisfied by the purchase of the land. After such indorsement, but before recording A's deed to B, a creditor of A levied on the land and it was sold by the sheriff. B then procured and recorded a deed from the trustee. It was held that his title was superior to that of the purchaser at the sheriff's sale. Scruggs v. Williams, 5 Lea (Tenn.) 478.

Power Not Affected by Judgment.—

The rule is well established in Virginia that the power of sale in a mortgage or trust deed is not in any way affected by obtaining judgment for the debt secured. Hanna v. Wilson, 3 Gratt. (Va.) 232; Coles v. Withers, 33 Gratt. (Va.) 186; Bowle v. Poor School Society, 75 Va. 300; Stimpson v. Bishop, 82 Va. 190; Paxton v. Rich, 85 Va. 378; Gibson v. Green, 89 Va. 524.

2. Lycoming Ins. Co. v. Jackson, 83 Ill. 302; Redmond v. Packenham, 66 Ill. 434.

Under the Missouri statutes, payment of the debt to the trustee in a deed of trust is valid and operates to discharge the deed. Whelan v. Reilley, 61 Mo. 565.

Conveyance by Debtor to Creditor.—A quit-claim deed from the grantor in a trust deed to the beneficiary, will not be treated as a satisfaction of the debt, in the absence of evidence that such was the intention of the parties. Collins v. Stocking, 96 Mo. 240.

chasers, a mortgagor who stands by and allows the sale to be made without giving notice of the extinguishment of the debt, will be estopped from questioning the validity of the sale.¹

The party aggrieved by the refusal of a trustee or mortgagee to discharge the incumbrance of record upon payment in full of the debt, has his remedy either by an action for damages, or by suit in equity to remove the cloud upon his title.²

Trust deeds are so essentially mortgages, that they may be discharged by an entry of satisfaction upon the margin of the record, where the statute provides for such method of satisfying mortgages. A reconveyance by the trustee is not necessary.³

A release of a trust deed, duly executed and acknowledged, is prima facie valid, and the mere fact that the debt remained unpaid when the release was given is not sufficient to raise a presumption of fraud, accident, or mistake.⁴

One who purchases property from the original owner, after the trustee has executed and recorded a release of the trust deed, is not bound to search the records to see if any conveyance has been made under the power after its release.⁵

A release, or conveyance, by the mortgagee, of a portion of the mortgaged premises, does not impair his right to sell the remainder under the power.⁶

Whenever all the parties in interest so request, the trustee is bound to discharge the trust deed, even though the evidences of debt are not actually canceled.⁷ A discharge, to be valid, must be with the consent of all the secured creditors; and the rights of one who does not authorize it, and whose claim has not been paid, are in no wise affected by putting it on record.⁸

In Minnesota, the court holds, "that when a mortgage containing a power of sale has been in fact discharged, it is the duty of the mortgagor or owner of the equity of redemption, as between him and third parties having no notice thereof, to procure the evidence of the discharge to be properly put upon record; that a failure so to do leaves the mortgagee apparently still clothed with power to foreclose; and that, upon a foreclosure under such apparent authority, an innocent purchaser, if his evidence of title be first recorded, will be protected. The mortgagor or owner of the equity of redemption cannot rest on the fact that the mortgage has been paid and the power to foreclose extinguished, and cannot assume that no attempt will be made to exercise the power, if he permits it to appear by the record to be in full force. As between him and innocent purchasers for value under the power, he will be bound by the record." Gilfillan, C. J., in Bausman v. Eads, 46 Minn. 148, following Merchant v. Woods, 27 Minn. 396. And see Bausman v. Faue, 45 Minn. 412.

Where certain of the beneficiaries under a trust deed released the grantor

The trustee, though nominally possessed of the legal title, has no right to release the trust deed without payment of the debt, or authority from the beneficiary; and if he wrongfully executes a release without such payment or authority, it is void in equity, and the deed remains in full force.¹ A purchaser of the property, with notice of the trustee's want of authority to release, takes subject to all the rights of the beneficiaries.²

A personal action by the beneficiaries against the trustee, for damages caused by his wrongful release of the deed, will not bar an action to set aside the release.³ If the discharge was wholly unauthorized and void, an action to set it aside is not necessary before proceeding to foreclose.⁴ But it is the duty of a creditor, upon learning of an unauthorized release by the trustee, to promptly repudiate it; if he does not, and permits others to deal with the property upon the faith of the release, he becomes estopped to deny the trustee's authority.⁵ It is not necessary that the beneficiary's consent to the trustee's reconveying the property to the grantor should be in writing. A release of the trust by such conveyance is effectual if the beneficiary consent to it by parol.⁶

XXVIII. RECORDING ACTS.—Statutes regulating the recording of mortgages are generally held to apply to trust deeds without special mention.⁷

In Louisiana, a trust deed becomes extinguished as to third persons, if not reinscribed within ten years from the date of its

in consideration of his conveying to them a portion of the property covered by the trust, it was held that the beneficiaries not parties to the arrangement were not bound by it, and did not lose their right to enforce the trust deed. Barcroft v. Lessieur, 48 Mo. 418.

Purchase by Trustee.—A trustee cannot, by obtaining title to the property in his own name and then executing a release of the trust deed and giving another to secure his own debts, cut off the rights of the beneficiary in the first trust deed which was duly recorded. Swift v. Smith, 102 U. S. 442.

Priority; Recitals.—A recital in a trust deed that certain land covered by it had been previously "conveyed by deed in trust to secure payment of a debt to" plaintiff, gives plaintiff's trust deed priority over the other, though otherwise, owing to a failure to record it, it would have been a subordinate lien. Hinton v. Leigh, 102 N. Car. 28. See also, as to the effect of recitals, United States Mortg. Co. v. Gross, 93 Ill. 483.

original registry,¹ but neither the mortgagor nor his heirs can take advantage of the failure to reinscribe.²

In some states, a failure to record the power, when required by statute, prevents its being executed, and limits foreclosure to a suit in equity.³

2. Shields v. Shiff, 124 U. S. 351.

3. Fry v. Martin, 33 Ark. 203; Thorp v. Merrill, 21 Minn. 336. In the case last cited, the mortgage was duly delivered to the register of deeds for record, but by his mistake in copying the description into the record, it was made to read the "N. E. quarter" instead of the southeast. The court held that a sale under the power was invalid. The court said: "The effect of the error in the record is that the mortgage is not recorded; and as to entitle any party to foreclose a mortgage by advertisement, it is 'requisite' that the same should have been 'duly recorded' (Gen. Stat., ch. 81, §§ 1, 2), it follows that the attempted foreclosure under which the plaintiff claims title, is invalid and wholly ineffectual, the mortgage sought to be foreclosed not having been so recorded. . . .

We do not at all assent to the doctrine of the authorities cited by counsel for plaintiff, to the effect that the statute, in requiring a mortgage to be recorded before foreclosure by advertisement, has in mind the protection and benefit of the purchaser at the foreclosure sale only. The requirement is for the benefit of all parties interested, and, among others, of the mortgagor and those who claim under him. That the record should correctly show the authority of the mortgagee or his assigns to sell, is important to the mortgagor, because it is for his interest that the title should be as marketable as it may be, since he may be liable for a deficiency; and it is important to the mortgagor, or those claiming under him, because they may be entitled to a surplus." The court further held that the register's certificate upon the back of the mortgage that it had been "duly recorded" in a certain book, was not conclusive on the point.

Material Alteration Must be Recorded.

—An agreement signed by sureties and secured by trust deed, to the effect that they will not foreclose except in case of actual loss on account of their suretyship, materially alters the conditions of the trust deed, and must be recorded. Munson v. Ensor, 94 Mo. 504.

Assignment Need Not be Recorded.—

"The law in this state is well settled that an assignment of a debt secured by mortgage operates as an assignment of the mortgage. It is not necessary in such cases that there should be an assignment of the mortgage to entitle the assignee to the benefit of the same, and where an assignment is made there is no reason why it should be recorded. In equity, the mortgage is but a security of the debt, and the assignment of the latter necessarily carries with it the former, unless there is some statutory provision in this state contravening this well-established rule in equity. The appellant, however, contends that, under the act of 1868 (chapter 373), it was necessary that the assignment should have been recorded, in order to perfect his title to the mortgage lien as against a subsequent assignee, claiming under an assignment executed and recorded. Such is not our opinion of the proper construction to be placed upon the act in question. It was not the purpose of the act in question to affect in any manner the equitable assignment of mortgages by the mere assignment of the mortgage debt, nor to impair the rights of assignees thereunder." Robert, J., in Western Maryland R., etc., Co. v. Goodwin (Md. 1893), 26 Atl. Rep. 319, citing Byles v. Tome, 39 Md. 464; Harnickell v. Orndorff, 35 Md. 343.
